the United States have disappeared. For twenty years, while we have sought to have this restriction removed, under the peculiar rules of Congress there has not been a moment given for hearing upon this bill until this present day. But he says, in the interest of labor, he would have it postponed. Why in the interest of labor? Most of these pilots receive $1,500 a year. Forty-one of them man two little pilot boats at Pensacola, with an average of entrance and clearance of one vessel for each day. Must they be supported at $1,500 a year while the poor sailor who treads the deck shall only receive $10 a month? Is it in the interest of labor to postpone the consideration of this bill—to postpone removing the tax upon the laboring men before the mast a single instant?

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that some officers of the Knights of Labor have written to members of this House, without giving a single reason, asking them to vote against this bill. But the Knights of Labor—I do not mean the officers; I mean the laborers who stand behind them—will look to you and me for intelligent action. They will overthrow the action of their leaders. They will say, "You had a chance to act, and when it came to an opportunity to vote away this tax upon labor, the real labor, entering into this business, you voted still to allow this little coterie of men to levy this tribute, which comes out of the wages of the seamen." Sentiment is invoked. They say they ask you to continue a pension system to the widows and orphans of pilots. What other business in the United States furnishes a private pension for civil services performed? I would rather give something to the men who are struggling against adverse circumstances, who are struggling to maintain their families on a small wage, than to try to keep up by levying upon their industry a tax to support men—42 of them in two little pilot boats, required for one vessel entering and one clearing a harbor every day. No; in the interests of labor, in the interests of commerce, in the interests of keeping our flag floating over the seas, in the interests of training up the American sailor to prepare us not only to take care of our commerce in time of peace, but to take care of our country and our flag in time of war, every patriotic citizen should rise to the occasion and vote "yea" upon the passage of this bill. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, my constituents are interested in this bill, and I ask permission to print some remarks on the bill in the RECORD.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PAYNE. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 117.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. Eleven gentlemen have risen; not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. On this question the ayes are 52, the noes 117; the noes have it, and the bill is refused a third reading.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Florida, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the bill to a third reading was laid on the table. [Applause.]

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I report back from the Committee on Appropriations and call up for consideration the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont reports from the Committee on Appropriations the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia, which was recommitted to the committee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I reserve points of order upon the bill, if there should be any doubt.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, the report tells the whole story with reference to the bill. It tells just what is stricken out and just what is inserted; and if the Clerk will read the report to the House, it will explain fully just what the committee have done to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have the report read as a part of his remarks.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit that this bill should be first considered in Committee of the Whole, as it involves an appropriation from the public Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman upon that point.

Mr. DINGLEY. The bill has been considered in Committee of the Whole and reported from that committee to the House.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I will say, for the information of the Chair and of the House, that the bill as reported back by the committee carries precisely the same sum of money that it carried as it was reported from the Committee of the Whole to the House. It is simply in a little different form; that is all the change that is made in the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have no anxiety myself as to whether this particular bill shall be considered in one way or in the other; but it is well, when these questions come up, to have a correct ruling upon them. Therefore I think it is not improper for me to take time enough to state that to all intents and purposes this appropriation bill is as if it had not been considered before. The action of the Committee of the Whole was disapproved by the House, and the House, as I now remember, though I will not be positive, recommitted the whole bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Not the whole.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Well, even if the House did accept certain parts, it recommitted the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to recast a portion of it. That portion had not been considered and disposed of by the Committee of the Whole. On the contrary, the House recommitted the bill to the Committee on Appropriations for the readjustment of that portion of it, and the committee has readjusted it, involving, I believe, about $100,000, though the amount is immaterial. That portion of the bill has not had the consideration in Committee of the Whole which the rules of the House contemplate. To hold differently, Mr. Speaker, would leave us in this attitude: That if, at any time, it should be desired to escape the rule which provides that appropriation bills and bills making donation or dedication of public lands shall have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole, all that it will be necessary to do will be to go into Committee of the Whole, to consider one or two or three sections of the bill, to become dissatisfied apparently with one section or more, and to recommit it, and when that bill came back it would escape consideration in Committee of the Whole if this bill is entitled to escape such consideration. That, I think, is all that it is necessary to say in this case; but it strikes me that beyond that, when the rule is construed with that breadth which gives full intendment to the power of the Committee of the Whole over money and land bills, this whole bill comes up, under our rules, for consideration in Committee of the Whole. I have said thus much, not having any special anxiety as to this bill. If consent were asked for consideration in the House I would not myself object, but I have thought it proper to state what I believe to be the proper interpretation of the rule. This is to all intents and purposes a new section. I am not proposing by this to criticise what the committee has done, but to defend the right to have any appropriation bill considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter comparatively indifferent to me whether this bill be considered in Committee of the Whole or in the House, but I should like to have the rule settled. It is hardly necessary for me to say anything as to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, but I want to call attention to the fact that no specific instructions were given to the Committee on Appropriations. On the 5th of February, 1896 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1342), I find this:

> Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to reexamine and report a new paragraph of so much of the bill as appears under the subhead "For charities."

That is, that whole portion or subdivision of the bill is sent back to the Committee on Appropriations with no specific or limited instructions, but the whole matter is left open. Now, I find that on February 7, 1893, in the Fifty-second Congress, when a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], in reference to the appointment of a commission, was considered as part of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, it was considered in Committee of the Whole, although the words of the resolution were identical with a provision adopted or considered in the appropriation bill. In this case the words are not identical and the general subject is left open to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion, I think this very question was decided by Speaker Carlisle in the Fiftieth Congress on an appropriation bill. The bill having been considered in Committee of the Whole and reported to the House, was recommitted by the House to the committee which had originally reported it. When that bill was reported back to the House the point of order was made that it should be considered in Committee of the Whole, but the Speaker ruled that, there being no additional appropriation involved, the bill was not required to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In that connection, if my friend from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] will permit me, I would suggest to the gentleman from Maine that when he examines this bill he will find that there were certain objects of appropriation in the bill as originally reported to the House that are entirely omitted from the bill in this form. The amount may be the same, but the object is different.

appropriation without the point of order being affected at all. If no additional appropriation has been incorporated in the bill since it was considered in Committee of the Whole, the point of order fails.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. In reply to the gentleman from Maine, I desire to say that there is an additional appropriation in this bill, because we find here some $94,700 given to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. And in the bill previously considered nothing was given to the Commissioners under that head. So it matters not whether the amount proposed to be appropriated by the bill is identical or not with a large aggregate of sums devoted to particular charities, the fact is that the Commissioners—new beneficiaries—receive the gift, receive $94,700, whereas before they received nothing.

Mr. GROUT. Oh, Mr. Speaker, the Commissioners receive no "gift." They are simply intrusted with the expenditure of the money. That is all.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I can say in a minute all that I desire to say about this question of order.

Under the rule, the Committee of the Whole considered the District of Columbia appropriation bill, took action thereon so far as recommendation was concerned, and reported it back to the House. Then it was entirely competent for the House to defeat the bill, amend, recommit it, or make any other disposition of it that might be deemed proper. The House chose instead of amending it, to refer it back to the committee with a specific instruction—namely, to recast the paragraph touching charities. In pursuance of the order of the House, the bill is reported back for consideration. The House was competent to deal with it before it was recommitted; and it is competent to deal with it now, the whole matter, so far as the Committee of the Whole is concerned, having been formally considered.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, this matter involves a very important question. If the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] be correct, then it is competent for this House to consider a bill embracing numerous items, like a sundry civil bill, and then recommit it with instructions to recast it, and have it come back here in the form of a bill appropriating sums of money for purposes other than those originally in the bill; for instance, to maintain the Navy—something entirely different.

The SPEAKER. How could that be done under the rules of the House, which declare that upon a motion to recommit no amendment can be ordered, even by the House itself, which is contrary to the rules?

Mr. WHEELER. Strictly according to the rules it could not be done, but very frequently those things are done in violation of the rules.

The SPEAKER. If done, they must be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WHEELER. But it is not necessary to go as far as that. The proposition involved here goes at least to this extent, that this bill may be recommitted and may come back recast in a form involving new legislation. There is presented to us now in this bill legislation which many might contend to be violative of the Constitution. It proposes to appropriate money for other purposes than those designated in the bill when formerly before us without considering the new legislation in Committee of the Whole. To tolerate such a practice would be to utterly nullify the force, effect, and purpose of the rule which I believe prevails in all parliamentary bodies, and has always prevailed in our Congress, that (I read from clause 3 of Rule 23)—

> All proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole.

Of course we understand that the reason the gentlemen in charge of the bill desire to demand the previous question and put the bill upon its passage without going into Committee of the Whole is to cut off amendments. Now, I desire to offer the following amendment, to get the judgment of this House upon it:

Insert, after the word "control," line 13, page 42:

> But this shall not apply to any institution which invites, receives, and cares for all needy and proper persons without discrimination as to their religious belief or creed.

I believe if the House were permitted to vote upon this amendment they would adopt it.

To say that this measure need not now be considered in Committee of the Whole is certainly violative of the rule requiring measureswhich appropriate money to receive their first consideration in Committee of the Whole. I do not wish to detain the House. I simply make this suggestion. It seems to me it would be the safer practice to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the third section of Rule XXIII——

Mr. McRAE. Before the Chair decides the point of order, I want to call attention to the instructions given to the Committee on Appropriations when this bill was recommitted to it. The language of the instructions was "to reexamine and report a new paragraph of so much of the bill as appears under the subhead 'For charities.'" I understood some gentleman to say that the committee had reported back substantially the same paragraph. That is not correct. Under the instructions the committee was required to report a new paragraph. I am perfectly indifferent as to what the ruling may be, but I thought it proper to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the instructions were that we should have a new paragraph, not a recasting of the old.

The SPEAKER. In the third clause of Rule XXIII there is a provision that "all motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people and all proceedings touching appropriations of money shall first be considered in a Committee of the Whole." Taken alone, that expression is very ample, and seems to cover everything. But it is quite evident that it has very many limitations, as gentlemen will see if they consider the practice of the House. After a bill has been reported by a Committee of the Whole to the House, the House has power then to add any other amendments which it sees fit to add, in conformity to the rules, without any reference of them to the Committee of the Whole. If the recollection of the Chair is correct, a number of important bills, such as general tariff bills, after having been very much modified in the Committee of the Whole, were, upon their return to the House, changed by the adoption of a substitute, which substitute involved taxes and charges on the people, but which nevertheless was not considered in Committee of the Whole. In fact, it is a matter of almost everyday occurrence that bills coming under this general description, having amendments which also come under this description, are acted upon by the House without any previous examination by the Committee of the Whole, the examination of the whole subject generally being supposed to inform the House upon the question.

In the Fiftieth Congress—unless the Chair is mistaken as to the time—this question arose in very much its present form; and the Speaker pro tempore decided that the bill would not under the rule go to the Committee of the Whole, because if it did all the paragraphs which had been passed upon and approved by the House would have to be gone over again, or else the anomaly would be presented of a bill partly in Committee of the Whole and partly not. Without going any further than that decision, or undertaking to say what would be the effect if a general recommittal was ordered on the whole bill, the Chair thinks that this is not within the rule cited, and therefore that it should be considered by the House.

Mr. GROUT. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the Clerk will read the report, as I have said, it will explain very fully all that is provided in this bill since its recommittal, and show what the committee has done with respect to it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this report is to be read as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont.

The SPEAKER. As a part of his remarks.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I desire to raise two points of order. Will I be debarred from making the point of order if the Clerk commences to read the report?

The SPEAKER. What point of order is made by the gentleman? It depends, of course, on the nature of the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I desire to raise the point of order that this is a change of existing law. The point is made against that part of the appropriation contained in the bill reported from the committee on pages 41 and 42, and also against the item, "Industrial Home School," on pages 43 and 44. If there is to be any question in the mind of the Speaker as to whether the point of order will lie——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Now, I assume, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order can be taken now; that is, that the point of order can be raised at this time.

The SPEAKER. It is a question whether it can, after the instruction given by the House.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will address myself to that question first.

If specific instructions had been given to the Committee on Appropriations to insert a specific item or adopt any special line of legislation, I concede that the point of order could not now be raised. But in view of the language selected by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] when he moved to recommit the bill, which was simply a motion to recommit to the committee, to do what? With instructions to reexamine and report a new paragraph on the subject of charities in the District of Columbia, or with reference to so much of the bill as appeared under the subhead "For charities"; that is, the whole subject-matter of charities was turned over, and therefore no restriction or limitation was put upon the Committee on Appropriations, the whole matter having been recommitted to them.

I call the attention of the Speaker to a decision on February 7, 1893, in Committee of the Whole. That decision is referred to in the Manual; that is, a reference is made to the portion of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in which it appears. On an investigation of the subject, I find that that decision was made in Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] being in the chair; and the question came up on the following resolution, which had been referred to the Committee on Appropriations in considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. It was a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], and was embodied in the following language, which I will read:

Resolved, That the resolution of Mr. DOCKERY be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and said committee is hereby authorized to insert in one of the general appropriation bills a provision authorizing the creation of a commission for the purpose indicated in said resolution.

Then some remarks were made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], and the Chairman said:

The CHAIRMAN. If there were such a precedent the Chair would be glad to have it, in order to try to conform his ruling with it, if it is in order and is applicable to this case. Here is a resolution, however, reported in an appropriation bill, that is in identically the language of the resolution considered by the House. The Committee on Rules reported the resolution and submitted a report instructing or authorizing the Committee on Appropriations to include these words in an appropriation bill. The Chair hardly thinks that it would be proper, or in order, for a committee of the House to undertake to say that the House did wrong in instructing the Committee on Appropriations to report this provision.

The Chair then went on and held that because—that is, pursuant to the reasons stated—the identical words had been used and were inserted in the bill, a point of order would not lie; plainly implying that if it were a general instruction the point of order would lie.

That is the only precedent I have been able to find.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the gentleman from New York to ascertain, if possible, the point of order, but have been unable so far to ascertain what it is.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I understood the Speaker to state that I was first to address myself to the question as to whether the point of order would lie.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the whole subject.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I naturally did not wish to trespass on the time of the House or the Speaker if my point of order was clearly untenable.

Now, I submit, sir, that the language incorporated by the committee in this bill in the paragraph on pages 41 and 42 is a change of existing law. That paragraph reads as follows:

For the relief and care of the poor and destitute, and for such charitable and reformatory work, and such care and medical and surgical treatment of poor and destitute patients in the District of Columbia as have been heretofore usually provided for by direct appropriations to private institutions, and as the District Commissioners may deem necessary, the sum of $94,700, to be expended under the direction of said Commissioners, either under contract with responsible and competent persons or institutions or by employing for the purpose the public institutions or agencies of said District, where practicable: Provided, That no such contract shall extend beyond the 30th day of June, 1897, and that no payment shall be made under any such contract except for service actually rendered, for which compensation shall be provided in said contract; and that said Commissioners shall report to Congress on or before the first Monday of December in each year a detailed statement of their expenditures theretofore made under this appropriation, and of all contracts made by them hereunder, giving the names of the persons and institutions contracted with, and stating what further expenditures will be required thereunder: And provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be paid for the purpose of maintaining or aiding, by payment for services or expenses, or otherwise, any church or religious denomination, or any institution or society which is under sectarian or ecclesiastical control.

By a provision which is substituted here for the direct appropriation we delegate a part of our legislative function, a function of a legislative body such as this—for our duties are twofold, to legislate and to appropriate money; but now the Committee on Appropriations, or the House, if you please, abdicates its ordinary legislative function of appropriating money and delegates that function to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. In other words, these Commissioners, having no power to-day under any provision of the statutes, having no power, sir, because it would contravene the express provision of the Federal Constitution that exclusive authority over the District shall be vested in the Congress of the United States, we abdicate our constitutional power and undertake to delegate it in part to these Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Now, suppose that point were not well taken in so far as I have already stated it. If the Speaker will examine the Revised Statutes for the District of Columbia, that is, the volume compiled by Messrs. Abert and Lovejoy, in chapter 19, referring to the District of Columbia and its organization, will be found two sections, 25 and 36. What do those sections provide? They limit explicitly and expressly the power of the Commissioners of this District to appropriate not only the taxes but all the other revenues. What are the limitations? That the taxes and all other revenues shall be used or expended by the Commissioners for certain defined purposes, for the police, for the fire department, for the schools, for the payment of current debts, and for the payment of debts to the employees and laborers and board of works of the District. Section 25 is a little broader than section 36, but like express limitations are found in the two sections. Section 25 is a little more expansive; but we find words of limitation contained in both sections. Now, if under existing statutes, if under a statute which has existed since 1875 or 1878, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have no power to spend one dollar of revenue—because the term is broad—one dollar coming in to them from any source whatever except for certain express purposes, I say that we can not now, in a general appropriation bill, give them a new power of expending money unless we first repeal sections 25 and 36 of chapter 19, referring to the organization of this District.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not understand that you claim that there is any existing law which requires Congress to appropriate any money to these various charitable institutions.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. No; certainly not.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Now, as I understand, you raise the point that the appropriation changes existing law.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this is a question or an argument? If it is an argument I should like to have the gentleman wait until I finish.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, well——

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. But if it is a question I will answer it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I asked you whether you made any claim that there was any existing law that required appropriations to be made to these institutions?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. No; the point I make is this, that there is by existing statute a limitation upon the powers of the Commissioners, and until we change that existing law we can not give them any money to be expended for any purpose other than those purposes provided in the existing statute.

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. In one moment. Now, Mr. Speaker, I make the further point of order against the rider which is contained on page 42, and which provides that no part of this money shall be given to any institution or society which is under sectarian or ecclesiastical control—I say that it is a change of existing law, a change of the provision now found in section 52 of chapter 19, which says that these institutions shall do only one thing—that they shall report to the Government. That is now the only limitation. Here we change the law, and provide, in reference to these charitable institutions, that they can not receive any money.

Further, in reference to the Industrial Home School, I raise the point of order that the provision contained therein, on page 44, that the appropriation shall not take effect unless the charter be surrendered, is a change of existing law and that it imposes an impossibility. That is, the only condition upon which the money can take effect is the going out of corporate existence of the present entity. That is, it is a gift conditioned on the corporation ceasing to exist, involving, it would seem to me as a lawyer, a manifest absurdity.

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman allow me a question there?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask the Chair to send for the statutes of the District of Columbia if there is any doubt in the Speaker's mind.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt, as the gentleman states the matter, that the statute exists with regard to the Commissioners as he describes it.

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman from New York allow me a question or two? I think I shall not need to say anything further on the subject if he will allow that.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Certainly.

Mr. GROUT. Then I ask, in reference to the Industrial Home School, if the condition is not that it shall be transferred to the board of children's guardians, an institution now in existence in the District, which institution shall afterwards manage that school?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to say to the gentleman from Vermont that I have never found in my practice—and it has covered considerable corporation practice—any provision of law by which a corporation could transfer its charter and go out of being and yet the charter be kept alive. I do not know any general provision of law which covers that. They may do it in Vermont.

Mr. GROUT. Not at all, and that is not done here. Another question with reference to the first point which the gentleman made, if he will answer, whether the sections he has read provide that the Commissioners shall not pay money which has been appropriated to them to pay? I ask if there is anything in the sections which the gentleman has read prohibiting that? If so, I should like to have him call special attention to it. Is there anything prohibiting them from paying out money appropriated by Congress to them with an order to pay it?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the distinguished gentleman from Vermont, I would say that I understand it to be a familiar principle in law that the expression of one is the exclusion of the other, and it being provided in the statute that the Commissioners shall have certain express powers—that is, it being provided that they can use the public moneys in only one way or in several ways—necessarily, by implication at least, they can not expend money in any other way, for the reason that they are not part of the legislative power. That is contained in the Congress of the United States. They are by statute the executive. They form the executive, and it would be manifestly improper for them to dole out largesse in this way.

Mr. GROUT. Now, one other question, if the gentleman will permit me. The first item on this subject is, "For the relief of the poor, $13,000." That is as it appeared in the bill before recommittal; and it has always been expended by the Commissioners. Would not the Commissioners, if the gentleman's construction of the statute be correct, be prohibited from paying out that?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I am not discussing that part of the bill. I am limiting my point to the part under consideration.

Mr. GROUT. But is not this paragraph first reported by the committee an extension of the first paragraph, which is stricken out, for the relief and care of the poor; and then, further, for these other charitable enterprises? Is not that a fact?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I charge that this is a radical change, and I regard it as an extraordinary piece of legislation.

Mr. GROUT. As a matter of fact, the $13,000 appropriated in this first item is the same, and has to be paid out by the Commissioners to the poor.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. GROUT. Is not that the way the bill reads?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. You are giving more power to the Commissioners in this bill. It is a piece of legislation without precedent.

Mr. GROUT. It is the same power more largely exercised.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Section 25 provides, referring to the Commissioners, in the first sentence:

> And shall have power to apply the taxes or other revenues of said District to the payment of the current expenses thereof, to the support of the public schools, the fire department, and the police, and to the payment of the debts of said District secured by a pledge of the securities of said District or board of public works as collateral, and also to the payment of debts due to laborers and employees of the District and board of public works.

And section 36 provides:

> The Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have power, subject to the limitations and provisions herein contained, to apply the taxes or other revenues of said District to the payment of current expenses thereof, to the support of the public schools, the fire department, and the police, etc.

Now, I submit that here we have a statutory board, a complex or joint executive, created by statute, without any general powers, with all their powers expressly defined and limited by statute. We can not give them any powers except those which are already set forth here.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman think no power can be given to an individual?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I do not think we can delegate our legislative power to any individual.

The SPEAKER. Can not we employ an individual to do certain work?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that we can give $94,700 to anybody to distribute among charities; certainly not in an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The ultimate thing to be sought after in this matter is what the appropriation is. The appropriation is for the care of the poor and destitute, and for charitable and reformatory work. It is evident that such an appropriation as that is not contrary to law; at any rate not for the present purposes. That question has been fully considered in Committee of the Whole, and no point of order was made in regard to it. Hence, for the purpose of this decision, it must be taken to be true that Congress has the right to make the appropriations named, as it has already been making such appropriations. If it has a right to appropriate, then it has the right to select whatever instrumentalities it thinks suitable for the purpose; and the fact that the Commissioners are officers, also, of the Government does not, in the judgment of the Chair, interfere with the matter at all, because Congress can impose that duty upon individuals, and certainly upon the Commissioners. As to the absurdity, or supposed absurdity, involved in the appropriation for the Industrial Home School, that is a matter for the House to pass upon, as it would be upon a constitutional question, the Chair not being able to decide upon either a constitutional question conclusively or upon a question of absurdity. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, the distinguishing feature of the amendment reported by the committee is, that it strikes out the private institutions and places the money heretofore appropriated in the hands of the Commissioners of the District for the same purposes heretofore used. If the Clerk will read the report, it will be sufficiently understood.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. 5210) making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1897, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report it back herewith and recommend its passage, amended as follows:

Strike out of the bill, as indicated on pages 37, 38, 39, 40, and 41, the following:

"For relief of the poor, $13,000.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, it is the desire not only of the committee, but of members generally, so far as I have heard, to dispose of this bill in as little time as possible. The whole subject was discussed at length when the bill was before the House on a former occasion, and the newspapers of the city have published in full the amendment, showing just what is proposed to be done, so that every member probably knows what they are. Gentlemen on the other side have said that they wanted some time for debate. I have had some doubt whether they really desired to debate this question, but if they do, I am willing to make an arrangement for reasonable time.

Mr. TALBERT. I notice from the reading of the report that the committee recommend striking out pages 37, 38, 39, 40, and 41. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if the same amount of money is appropriated here as the bill appropriated in its original form?

Mr. GROUT. Precisely the same.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, as I am a member of the subcommittee which considered this bill, I should like time to take part in the debate to a limited extent.

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman from New York is on the subcommittee and has indicated a desire to be heard on the bill, and, if he insists upon it, should be heard. Otherwise I should be glad to move the previous question. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. One hour for this side.

Mr. GROUT. Oh, we ought to reach a vote in less time than that.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Say forty-five minutes, then.

Mr. GROUT. I understood the gentleman to say once to-day that thirty minutes would satisfy him.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Yes; but other gentlemen—the gentleman from Alabama and others—on this side desire to speak. I shall not occupy more than half an hour myself.

Mr. GROUT. Can not the gentleman carve out of half an hour time enough for himself and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER]?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Make it forty minutes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that an entire change of the system which has prevailed for many years in relation to a considerable number of the charities of this city ought to be entitled to some discussion, and that three-quarters of an hour for that purpose ought not to be begrudged. I say that, not wishing myself to take any part in the debate, but in the interest of others who do.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask consent that a vote be taken upon this bill at 4 o'clock, or earlier if the member who has control of the time does not see proper to use it; the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] being allowed forty-five minutes.

Mr. GROUT. I accept the suggestion and make that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I want five minutes, and as I have no arrangement yet by which I can get it, I shall object unless I am provided for.

Mr. CANNON (to Mr. BARTLETT of New York). I suppose the gentleman from New York will give the gentleman from Arkansas five minutes?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman with pleasure if he is in favor of my views.

Mr. MCRAE. I have not heard your views. I prefer this provision to the old arrangement, but am not satisfied with it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I suggest that the gentleman from Vermont give the gentleman from Arkansas five minutes, as he is on his side.

Mr. GROUT. I shall have but fifteen minutes, but will give the gentleman five minutes; but nobody else must ask. [Laughter.]

MRS. MAYBRICK.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] to allow me to present at this moment a privileged report which will not bring on any discussion.

Mr. SAYERS. But it will take time.

Mr. GROUT. The vote on this bill is to be taken at 4 o'clock, and gentlemen on the other side are entitled to forty-five minutes.

Mr. HITT. But you have fifteen minutes' leeway.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Vermont yield?

Mr. GROUT. Yes, sir, if no discussion follows.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. HITT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the accompanying House resolution No. 240, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report the same back with the recommendation that it be adopted, namely:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the House, if not incompatible with the public interests, such correspondence and other information as the State Department has in its possession in regard to the imprisonment of Mrs. Florence E. Maybrick, formerly of Mobile, Ala., and the steps that have been taken by our Government to secure her liberation or an inquiry by the Government of Great Britain into the merits of the case in which she was condemned."

The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House, I am not responsible for the injecting into our deliberations of a religious or semireligious question. It would be far from my wish personally to bring up this question again for discussion, but, having been a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, to which subcommittee this District appropriation bill was referred, I feel bound, not only for myself, but for the Democratic party, to call the attention of the House and of the country to the very peculiar condition of affairs existing with reference to the bill now under consideration. It will be remembered that some weeks ago the District of Columbia appropriation bill was brought into this House and was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole. There was then presented to the House, by the unanimous report of the Committee on Appropriations, a schedule providing for the appropriation of certain sums of money for the charities of this District.

The bill came into the House with the unanimous report of the Committee on Appropriations, Republicans and Democrats alike, and it was not until we got into Committee of the Whole that an onslaught upon the whole bill was made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER].

In consequence of his attack, after deliberation of one or two days, certain charities were excised or cut out from the bill, those charities being Episcopal or Roman Catholic in nature, or at least alleged so to be, while other charities were allowed to remain within the bill. A conflict arose with reference to a Lutheran charity—the German Hospital—and although that charity had been cut out in the Committee of the Whole, yet, owing to the enormous number of telegrams with which members of the House, it is said, were deluged, a more favorable spirit attended our deliberations in the House, and the Lutheran charity was returned to favor. The outcome of the whole matter was that the bill failed to pass; that the onslaught of the gentleman from Nebraska was successful in so far only as it defeated for the time being the appropriation bill, but was not successful in so far as it was intended to carry out the views of himself or his followers.

Now, what is the question before the House to-day? I say that to the newly reported bill we find two salient objections. The bill, you will find upon examination, cuts out every specific appropriation for charities, but gives the whole sum, amounting to some $94,700, to the Commissioners of this District to be expended according to their discretion. In other words, the Committee on Appropriations says: "We are too cowardly; we dare not exercise our legitimate legislative functions; we dare not appropriate this money to these specific charities; but we throw the whole onus, the whole burden, upon the Commissioners of this District and authorize them to expend this money as they see fit."

Whether the point of order which was overruled by the Speaker was well taken or not—and I must assume for the purposes of this argument and in the light of such high authority that the point of order was not well taken—I say that this character of legislation is not healthy legislation. It lies at the fundamental basis of all constitutional governments that the three departments shall exist concurrently, but that the powers and functions of the one department shall never be trenched upon by the other; that is, that the legislative, the judicial, and the executive departments shall each in its particular sphere remain unassailable and inviolate.

I say that that is not only the rule in this country—in the United States of America—but in every sovereignty forming part of our Federal Union or our confederation. I could cite the decisions of the various courts of last resort in State after State, laying down this as a fundamental doctrine. I could call your attention to a great decision by the supreme court of Indiana—the case of The State vs. Jameson—where it was laid down as fundamental that the powers of one department should never be trenched upon or violated by either of the other departments, and that the legislature of the State of Indiana could not exercise the appointing power, that function properly belonging to the executive department. I could call your attention to a decision in the court of appeals in the State of New York, which will be found reported in the fifty-fifth volume of its reports—the case of The People on the relation of Bolton vs. Albertson—where it was laid down that that was the most essential underlying principle in the State of New York; that it was absolutely essential that that principle should be maintained for the preservation of our existing system of local self-government in the various subdivisions of the State—counties, cities, towns, and villages. So I say that the first objection to the measure now under consideration is that in it we abdicate our legislative functions, that we give to these purely executive officers the right to legislate with reference to the charities of the District of Columbia; and for that reason I submit that this bill should not become a law.

What is the other objection? It is the provision, the "rider," which is in its nature similar to one of the planks of the platform of the American Protective Association. I refer to the sixth article of the creed of the American Protective Association, which declares that—

> We condemn the support, out of the public Treasury, by direct appropriation or by contract, of any sectarian school, reformatory, or other institution, not owned or controlled by the public authority.

I say that the provision now submitted to the House for approval, contained in these words:

> Provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be paid for the purpose of maintaining or aiding, by payment for services or expenses, or otherwise, any church or religious denomination, or any institution or society which is under sectarian or ecclesiastical control—

I say that this "rider," this new provision inserted in this appropriation bill, is in essence the same as the plank of the American Protective Association, to which I have just called attention. I wish the members of this House could read the recent exultant article contained in the Illustrated American, signed by a member of the American Protective Association, in which he denounces everyone who believes in the Roman Catholic creed, and says in reference to the A. P. A.:

> It wields the balance of power in Congress to-day.

Now, gentlemen, the position I take is this: For years these charities have grown up in this District; for many years we have had in force the system of making specific and special appropriations for the benefit of these various institutions; we have appropriated money to these institutions, because they have been found to be excellent in character and efficient in their working capacity. These appropriations have been made without regard to the creed or the sect to which it might be claimed any one of these institutions belonged.

Now, it must be borne in mind that when this bill was considered in the Committee of the Whole certain charities were cut out. Two of those charities were under the control, or alleged to be under the control, of members of the Protestant Episcopal Church. I refer to the Church Orphanage of St. John's Parish and the reformatory institution known as the Association for Works of Mercy. These two charities were cut out; and in addition four Roman Catholic charities were deprived of the benefits which they had received in years past under this bill. I refer to the St. Ann's Infant Asylum, the House of the Good Shepherd, the St. Rose Industrial School, and St. Joseph's Asylum. I propose to devote the remainder of my remarks to the consideration of these specific charities. And I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT], whether it is or is not his assumption that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia under the power given them in the bill would be obliged to refuse any aid to these charities which were excised from the bill when we had it under consideration before?

Mr. GROUT. Does the gentleman wish a reply now?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to have an answer to the question.

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman ought not to be in doubt upon that point; he should remember that I stated distinctly, on the occasion when the bill was before the House heretofore, that I considered these institutions to be of a sectarian character, all of these institutions, and consented that they should be stricken out of the bill, and voted to strike them out.

What the Commissioners may do I will not undertake to say. It is for them to determine. The administration is with them.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Then I assume that the four charities which I have named, which are alleged to be under the control of the Catholic Church, and the Protestant Episcopal charities named, will be debarred from any benefit derived from this general fund placed in the hands of the Commissioners.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me just there?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. We enact legislation; the judiciary construes it, and the powers of the Commissioners under this provision and appropriation will be construed by the judiciary, or that which stands for it—the Comptroller—when the law is presented to him for construction by the Commissioners.

The claim of gentlemen in debate on this bill that any given charitable institution comes within the provision limiting the appropriation does not bring it within the limitation and should not and will not affect the action of the judiciary when it comes to construing the scope of this limitation. It is not what is in my mind or what is in the mind of the gentleman from New York or any other gentleman that would control or ought to control in the construction of this legislation when enacted. This, like all other acts, will be construed in the light of the real facts, and not according to the hopes, fears, or prejudices of anyone.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois that he concedes that there will be so much doubt under this provision that it will be necessary to have a contest in the courts?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the gentleman from New York understands that the accounting officers of the Treasury pass the accounts, and under our law the District Commissioners have the right to ask the accounting officers of the Treasury for the construction of any act. What would be the construction they might put upon it, of course I do not know, nor could the gentleman from New York know. But it seems to me only proper, as we could not affect it, if we are satisfied with the legislation enacted, that we had better not attempt to construe it by affirming or admitting what may or may not be the facts upon which the law will operate when it does come to be construed.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. The action of the accounting officers of the Treasury is not always satisfactory, I believe. I might call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the action with reference to the sugar-bounty cases. There the accounting officer of the Treasury acted, construed the law, and yet litigation was not avoided.

Now, is it a good thing for us to undertake to pass bills here which are doubtful in their character, or which would involve the necessity of an appeal to the accounting or auditing officers of the Treasury before their construction can be understood?

Mr. CANNON. Our fathers—practical men—in the inception of this Government, thought it proper to create a legislative and judicial department entirely distinct and separate from each other. They may have been very foolish old fellows, and I would be very glad if the gentleman from New York and myself were perfect and could legislate and adjudicate and construe. But I suggest to him that until the Constitution is changed he can not do it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois has in his mind so clearly defined the separation between the various functions of government, and in view of that condition of mind I should like him to account to the House for the fact that he supports a bill which gives the District Commissioners functions clearly not executive, but which are unquestionably legislative in their character, and certainly do not belong to any executive officers under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman and I do not want to switch off on a discussion of something else. The District Commissioners, under this and all other appropriations, expend the appropriation because they are authorized to do so by the law. They are the mere servants, the instruments used by Congress for expending the money in this District, but they have to expend the appropriation according to the law we create, and the judiciary passes on that law if there is any doubt as to its meaning—the Comptroller standing for the judiciary in this instance.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. We did not start out in this case with the broad assumption that it is wrong for the State or the Government to give public money in aid of charity. Some gentlemen in the House believe it to be wrong in any case to take the funds of the Government derived by taxation and give them for the benefit of private charities. That position may be a logical one. I think some argument can be made in its favor, although Cooley, who is certainly the greatest authority on constitutional law, tells us that the maintenance of charities is clearly a public use, and has been so held in every country and State for many years past.

The subcommittee on appropriations—its majority—does not say that we must not give public money in aid of proper charities, but say that we have not enough knowledge, we have not enough intelligence to apportion the money which has been apportioned by our predecessors satisfactorily, but that we must delegate our functions in that regard to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. In the first place, because they are better fitted than we are to discharge that duty or that function; and in the second place, because we escape all responsibility, although it would seem to be somewhat cowardly, still it would relieve us of all onus and all responsibility.

No charity can appeal to us for aid. The question whether an institution be sectarian or not can not be determined by us, but all these charities are referred to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in what hope? In the hope, perchance, that they will evade the very terms of the law which we enact. In the hope, perchance, that they may give to a charity clearly debarred by the provisions of the law some portion of this money, or, if they fail to give it, that all the responsibility for such failure will rest, not upon the Congress of the United States, but upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

So the position that the majority take in reference to this bill is that it is all right to give $94,700 of the public money to the various charities of the District, but that there must be one limitation placed upon the power of giving, and that is, that no money shall be given to any institution which is influenced or controlled to the slightest extent or in the faintest degree by any Christian sect, by any religious body, by any member of any religious body. In other words, we proscribe not only Roman Catholicism, not only the Protestant Episcopal Church, but we proscribe every Christian sect, and we make the belief in any Christian faith almost a crime. We say that if the institution be an institution where a voice is raised in prayer that that institution shall be debarred from any benefit of the provisions of this gift made to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Now, are you willing to take that position? Are you willing to go back to your constituents and say, "We are against religion; we do not believe in it; we think it is wrong; we think it is a crime?"

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twenty-four minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. There are special reasons why the gift to these charities—that is, to the four Roman Catholic charities and to the two Protestant Episcopal charities—should be continued. I will call attention to two or three of these charities, because in the limited time which remains I can not call attention to the others.

The Church Orphanage of St. John's Parish receives girls and small boys, regardless of creed. The St. Joseph Male Orphan Asylum is an asylum in this District where the daily attendance of orphan boys is about 100, and these inmates are orphan boys of the city and District, and are received irrespective of creed.

In reference to St. Ann's Infant Asylum, that is the best foundling or infant asylum in the District, and I was informed only two or three days ago by a distinguished physician of this city that it is the best administered institution of the kind in the country, and that if this institution were not kept up, the cases of infanticide would increase enormously in the District of Columbia, and that the police authorities were unanimous in their recommendation of the practical working of this infant asylum. In the official report to the Government it is stated that no worthy application for admission to the asylum was refused; that children of all nations and creeds, white and colored, Protestant and Catholic, are admitted and cared for.

Now, I submit, gentlemen, that charities of this kind and character should not be debarred from the benefits of this appropriation, and I shall offer as an amendment to the section under consideration the whole of the former section reported to the House by the Committee on Appropriations, with a further proviso added that no part of the money shall be paid to a teacher or professor of theology or religion, making my amendment conform exactly to the amendment with reference to Howard University, which received the support of this House only a few days since.

Mr. GROUT. Of course the gentleman understands that that amendment would not be in order. The previous question takes effect at 4 o'clock.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. That is neither here nor there. It shows the true position which should be taken. The purpose of offering this amendment may be to call the attention of the House to the legislation which should find favor here.

The proper thing for the House to do to-day would be to vote down the section absolutely and to force the adoption of the section recommended by the Committee on Appropriations when this bill first came up for consideration; that is, giving to these various charities the specific sums which we all favored when the bill was first considered, and adding thereto the qualification or proviso which we adopted a few days ago in reference to Howard University. For if that were considered proper for Howard University, it certainly should be considered proper in reference to all these other charities.

I reserve the balance of my time, and yield now to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. CANNON. Is there any theological chair in St. Ann's Asylum?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois that the object of the amendment adopted in reference to Howard University was to prevent the expenditure of any of the public money for the teaching of any special doctrine. Now, if that is what they aim at in this proviso or amendment offered to-day, I say in behalf of all these charities, we will not expend one dollar for instruction in any doctrine, or in any creed, or in any system of theology. All we want is the money for the poor and helpless, for the orphan boys, for the little children of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that if the gentleman wants to take care of the children, in my judgment this bill takes care of every child that is entitled to care at the hands of the public Treasury and has been receiving care heretofore.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has fifteen minutes remaining. How much time does he yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I yield the gentleman eight minutes.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment which has been incorporated in the bill upon several grounds.

The amendment should be defeated, because it is not in the line of economy and good legislation. It takes away money where it has been economically, judiciously, and usefully expended and puts it in a new field where there has been no experience in this line of work, and the inhibitions in the proviso are such that it can not be used to the best advantage and may result in casting upon the District an expenditure of more than a million dollars which heretofore has been assumed by the charitable people of this city.

The amendment inhibits the use of any of the money appropriated for any of the charitable institutions of the city which are controlled in any manner by religious associations or are under sectarian or ecclesiastical control.

This is legislation upon religion.

Heretofore we have appropriated money for all of the charitable institutions of the city without inquiring into or considering the religion of those who controlled them.

This amendment appropriates in such a manner that the money must all go to those institutions which are not under religious control, and none of it can go to the institutions which are superintended or controlled by any of the various churches.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION VIOLATES THE CONSTITUTION.

There is no one who will go further than myself in opposition to any legislation which tends to build up any one church or creed over another, and it was to prevent this that our forefathers incorporated in the Constitution the prohibitions on this subject which are contained in that instrument.

Article VI of the Constitution says:

> No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

The duties reposed in the charitable institutions by virtue of appropriations as formerly made were in the nature of a public trust, and for thirty years the Congress of the United States has given such appropriations to these institutions; and now, for the first time in our country, a religious test is imposed requiring a qualification as a condition to this public trust, which is certainly violative of the spirit if not the letter of our Constitution.

Also, the first amendment to the Constitution provides:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one effect of this provision is most certainly to inhibit the exercise of religion.

Judge Story, in referring to the constitutional prohibitions, section 1877 of his work on the Constitution, says:

> The real object of the amendment was not to countenance, much less to advance, Mahometanism, or Judaism, or infidelity, by prostrating Christianity, but to exclude all rivalry among Christian sects and to prevent any national ecclesiastical establishment which should give to a hierarchy the exclusive patronage of the National Government. It thus cuts off the means of religious persecution (the vice and pest of former ages) and of the subversion of the rights of conscience in matters of religion, which had been trampled upon almost from the days of the Apostles to the present age. The history of the parent country had afforded the most solemn warnings and melancholy instructions on this head; and even New England, the land of the persecuted Puritans, as well as other colonies where the Church of England had maintained its superiority, would furnish out a chapter as full of the darkest bigotry and intolerance as any which could be found to disgrace the pages of foreign annals. Apostasy, heresy, and nonconformity had been standard crimes for public appeals, to kindle the flames of persecution, and apologize for the most atrocious triumphs over innocence and virtue.

Judge Story here mentions that New England was at one time guilty of the darkest bigotry and intolerance, and singularly the intolerance which we object to in this bill is largely due to the intolerant expression in the Republican platform lately adopted in the Massachusetts State convention.

I contend that it is a dangerous innovation for Congress to legislate in any manner about religion.

WRONGS COMMITTED BY WELL-MEANING PERSONS.

I do not doubt the good intentions of the gentlemen who framed this bill, but the history of the world shows that all persons who have attacked the cause of religion in any form have believed they were actuated by the best possible intentions. Certainly no one will question that in his persecutions of the Christians before his own conversion, St. Paul was actuated by the best intentions. It is even contended by historians that Nero, Trajan, Diocletian, and other Roman emperors thought they were serving the gods they worshiped when they tried to destroy Christianity.

I suppose that no one will deny but that the Mohammedan Turks believe that they are obeying the mandates of the God they worship in the cruel crimes now being committed by them. I by no means charge the gentlemen responsible for this objectionable clause with any intentional wrong or any intention to assault the Christian religion or any intention to injure that sacred cause, but according to them, if you please, excessive religious zeal, I with confidence predict that this action is of a character which enlightened history will some day denounce as a species of religious persecution, animated by the same spirit of intolerance which actuates the Turks in the murders of the Christian Armenians and which actuated the persecutors in the darkest days of the inquisition.

It was to prevent people with good intentions assailing the Christian religion and Christian forms and Christian worship that our forefathers placed the restrictions in the Constitution. It may be contended, Mr. Speaker, that this measure does not violate it; but what is the fact? Here are a number of institutions; some under religious control, and some not. Ninety thousand dollars is appropriated, and then a proviso is put in that none of this $90,000 shall be used for those institutions which are controlled by religious or ecclesiastical denominations. That is an inhibition of religion. It is legislation upon religion; and if we establish a precedent of legislation upon religion in one form, it is a precedent which may be used to violate every purpose which was sought to be prevented when our Constitution was framed, and might finally destroy religion itself.

The effect of the objectionable and, as I contend, unconstitutional proviso will be to, at least in a measure, paralyze the Christian work of those who are doing much in the cause of charity.

ALL DENOMINATIONS ENGAGE IN THIS CHRISTIAN CHARITY.

These God-anointed, Christ-anointed, heaven-anointed, saintly beings, whose entire lives are devoted to Christ's service; these beings who connect this earth to heaven; these beings likened unto angels, who bring earth and heaven together, who, possessing the form of humanity, are endowed with angelic attributes; these beings whose daily appeal to heaven is, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me do?" And the answer is: "Charity; be charitable"—and in the language of Christ's greatest apostle, St. Paul:

And though I have the gift of prophecy and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing.

In obedience to this admonition, this character of people of all denominations—Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Baptists, and Catholics—by contributing their own fortunes and their entire time and by procuring donations, have built up charitable and reformatory institutions which now own property to the amount of $1,283,000.

The beneficiaries of these institutions are the kind of people who are cared for by the municipalities of all civilized countries. The institutions have not been able to meet the many demands upon their charity, and for many years it has been the custom of the Government to appropriate small sums to these institutions on condition that they would care for the orphans, the sick, the reformed, and the aged, the indigent, and unfortunate of ever kind to whom civilized people extend comfort and care. To show how almost entirely these people have been cared for by the institutions, and how little aid they have had from the Government, I have prepared the following table, the figures being taken from the report of Colonel Tracey, the superintendent of charities:

Table showing the amount which was proposed to be appropriated to certain institutions when the bill was first reported to the House, and the average number of inmates during the past year.

Institutions.	Proposed appropriation.	Average number of inmates.
Woman's Christian Association	$4,000	91
Washington Hospital for Foundlings	6,000	34
Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish	1,800	95
German Orphan Asylum	1,800	39
St. Ann's Infant Asylum	5,400	130
Association for Works of Mercy	1,800	26
House of the Good Shepherd	2,700	91
St. Rose's Industrial School	4,500	65
St. Joseph's Asylum	1,800	100
Young Women's Christian Home	1,000	328
Total	30,800	999

This shows that the annual cost to the Government for the care of each of these persons is $31.03, the daily cost being but 8 cents, and the cost to the Government of St. John's Episcopal Asylum is only about 4 cents per capita per day.

BURDEN THAT THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION MAY CAST UPON THE GOVERNMENT.

These institutions alone own private property valued at $594,000, and all the institutions engaged in this charitable work own private property amounting to $1,283,000, and if the entire burden were assumed by the District government it would cause an immediate outlay of at least, if not more than, that sum of money. Now, to ascertain the least possible cost to the Government for maintaining these institutions, we will compare them with three institutions which are so conducted, and which all will concur are conducted with most commendable economy and with much more economy than is common in Government institutions:

Table showing amount expended by the Government to maintain the Reform School, the Girls' Reform School, and the Washington Asylum.

Institutions.	Appropriation.	Average number of inmates.
The Reform School	$41,902	201
The Girls' Reform School	9,425	60
The Washington Asylum	62,415	522

This shows that these economically conducted institutions now cost the Government $145.26 annually for each beneficiary, about five times as much as the cost of maintaining them in institutions which have so long and so commendably done this work. It is therefore plain that if the entire burden of these dependents were placed upon the Government, we would have to appropriate at least $1,283,000 for buildings, and for maintenance the cost would be at least five times as much as is now being contributed by the Government.

The reason why so much good has been done with but little means is that good ladies of this city of all denominations devote their time, their energies, and their means to this work.

PRACTICAL ECONOMICAL WORKING OF THE OLD PLAN.

The practical working of the plan which is sought now to be overturned is this: Take the Church Orphanage of St. John's Parish as an illustration. They have their buildings and property, all of which have been donated by charitable people, and are worth $60,000. The contributions last year from private sources amounted to $7,521. Every cent of this was spent in the maintenance and education of orphans, not one farthing, as shown by the superintendent of charities in his report, page 73, being paid for salaries. The income of the asylum was not sufficient to maintain and educate all the orphans that could be sheltered in their buildings. The asylum, therefore, received about 36 orphans which otherwise the District Commissioners would have been compelled to provide for; and all will admit that to provide education, shelter, clothing, and food for 36 orphans, under ordinary circumstances, would cost the Government about $6,000 or $7,000 a year, and yet all this is done by St. John's Orphanage at an expense to the Government of $1,800. I make these calculations upon the basis of the average cost of maintenance in that most economically managed institution, the Reform School, which we have seen cost the Government $41,902 for 201 inmates, the cost for each inmate therefore being $208.41 per annum, of course making proper allowance for necessary expenses, heat, light, etc. In a word, my contention is, that the $1,800 given to St. John's by the Government enables them to maintain 36 more orphans than they could without that contribution, and that for the Government to give these children the same advantages where the District would have to bear all expenses would cost at least six or seven thousand dollars.

But we should also remember that all the inmates of St. John's Orphanage numbering, as they frequently do, as many as 115 are public charges upon the District, and were it not for the charitable people who have maintained that asylum, the District would be compelled to bear the entire expense, which at the rate expended by the Reform School would be $23,967.95 a year. And this would apply equally to all the institutions; therefore we see if it were not for these charities, an enormous burden would be cast upon the District, appropriations for which Congress would be compelled to make.

CONSTITUTIONAL FATHERS ON RELIGION.

People who oppose legislation simply because its effect will be to aid and encourage the cause of religion, and who seek to justify their action by the clause of the Constitution on that subject entirely misapprehend the purpose sought to be attained by our constitutional fathers. Before the adoption of that instrument our fathers in the Congress of the Confederation unanimously adopted the following:

Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

The debates upon this subject by those who adopted the Constitution show that the purpose they sought to attain was—

To exclude all rivalry among Christian sects and to prevent any ecclesiastical establishment from having exclusive patronage of the National Government.

They were emphatic in their expressions of advocacy of the cause of religion.

STORY'S COMMENTARIES ON RELIGION IN THE CONSTITUTION.

Judge Story, in referring to the constitutional prohibition, paragraph 1873, says:

Now, there will probably be found few persons in this or any other Christian country who would deliberately contend that it was unreasonable or unjust to foster and encourage the Christian religion generally as a matter of sound policy as well as of revealed truth.

Further down the same paragraph, this eminent writer on the Constitution says:

Indeed, in a republic there would seem to be a peculiar propriety in viewing the Christian religion as the great basis on which it must rest for its support and permanence.

Paragraph 1874, Judge Story says:

Probably at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and of the amendment to it now under consideration, the general if not the universal sentiment in America was that Christianity ought to receive encouragement from the state so far as was not incompatible with the private rights of conscience and the freedom of religious worship,

I will now read from the next paragraph, No. 1875:

It yet remains a problem to be solved in human affairs, whether any free government can be permanent where the public worship of God and the support of religion constitute no part of the policy or duty of the state.

The entire text of Judge Story's chapter on the "freedom of religion" shows that he alludes to the encouragement and support of the Christian religion in general as a necessary safeguard of the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, an enforced absence on account of illness at the time this matter was discussed before must answer for my wearying you at this time.

If I understand the present parliamentary status of this appropriation bill it is too late for any amendment to be offered, and the members of the House must content themselves with voting in the affirmative or in the negative when the vote is taken.

When this matter was discussed before the gentlemen who advocated striking out the provisions for the so-called sectarian institutions proclaimed in the strongest terms their freedom from any religious bigotry and prejudice, and said they were actuated by a desire to rid the Government of all contact with denominational or sectarian institutions.

Yet I find during this very week, when the bill appropriating money for the Howard University, a private denominational school, was being considered, these very same men, having found a way to distinguish between "tweedledum and tweedledee," voting in favor of that proposition.

Mr. Speaker, there is no need of any concealment as to who are the real instigators of this movement to take away these appropriations from the Catholic institutions.

It is an open secret that on the night before this bill was reported a committee of the American Protective Association waited upon the members of the Committee on Appropriations and demanded that they strike out of the bill the provision granting aid to the Catholic institutions in the District of Columbia.

They gave no reasons. They did not deny that those institutions were worthy in every respect or that they expended in an economical and praiseworthy manner every dollar that was appropriated for them and were doing a noble and Christian work in this city, helping the orphans and taking care of the unfortunate.

The members of this notorious organization have taken an oath against the Roman Catholic Church and its members, and the hand of the organization has been clearly shown here in Congress in the defeat of appropriations for Catholic institutions in the District of Columbia, and for Catholic Indian schools.

Appended is the oath taken by every member of the American Protective Association:

I do most solemnly swear that I will not allow anyone a member of the Roman Catholic Church to become a member of this order, I knowing him to be such; that I will use my influence to promote the interests of all Protestants everywhere in the world; that I will not employ a Roman Catholic in any capacity if I can procure the services of a Protestant; that I will not aid in maintaining or building by my resources any Roman Catholic Church or institution of their sect or creed whatsoever, but will do all in my power to retard and break down the power of the Pope; that I will not enter into a controversy with a Roman Catholic upon the subject of this order, nor will I enter into any agreement with a Roman Catholic to strike or create a disturbance whereby the Roman Catholic employees may undermine and substitute the Protestant; that in all grievances I will seek only Protestants and counsel with them to the exclusion of all Roman Catholics, and will not make known to them anything of any nature matured at such conferences; that I will not countenance the nomination in any caucus or convention of a Roman Catholic for any office in the gift of the people, and that I will not vote for nor counsel others to vote for a Roman Catholic, but will vote only for a Protestant; that I will endeavor at all times to place the political positions of this Government in the hands of Protestants. To all of which I do most solemnly promise and swear, so help me God.

Is this free America that such an organization as this can live in our midst? And is it necessary in this, the enlightened nineteenth century, for Roman Catholics to apologize for serving God in any manner they see fit? I stand upon the floor of this House a Roman Catholic born and bred and proud of it, and I deny the right of any secret, oath-bound organization to come before the legally chosen representatives of the great American people and, by its dark, deep, and insidious methods, seek to deprive me and the members of the church to which I belong of the honest rights and privileges of American citizenship.

These same men, if war should break out to-morrow with England on account of the Venezuelan matter, or with Spain on account of the Cuban resolutions, would be found taking the steamer for the British provinces to put themselves under the protection of Queen Victoria and the British flag, as their fathers did in the war of the rebellion.

I challenge any member of the A. P. A. organization or any member of this House in sympathy with it to name any instance in the history of our country where the Roman Catholics, either individually or collectively, have been false or recreant to their trust.

Are not the Roman Catholic people of this country entitled to fair treatment and consideration? Was not the banner of the cross the first symbol of religion waved upon these shores? Was not the holy sacrifice of the mass the first form of worship paid to Almighty God here, and were not the hymns to the Blessed Virgin the first notes of music wafted from one end of this broad land to the other?

Was it not the genius and energy of a Roman Catholic—Christopher Columbus—that opened up to the Old World the treasures and resources of the New? And only a few years ago, on the occasion of the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America, did not the people of two worlds, without distinction of race or country, join warmly and sincerely in honoring the name of this great Catholic?

All over America the people with one accord commemorated the event and honored the discoverer.

The historian, the artist, the poet rivaled one another in their desire to do honor to the memory of that great man. Statues and monuments were erected and pageants and processions formed in every part of our glorious Union.

Every city, every State, and the nation itself appropriated thousands and thousands of dollars, and vied with one another in organized movements to do honor to this great discoverer.

Thus we have seen the celebration of the discovery of Christopher Columbus, who was the true offspring of the ages of faith of the undivided church Catholic, enlisting strongly and powerfully the sympathies of the great American people. How grandly before our eyes loom up the record of the daring deeds and heroic martyrdom of the Catholic missionaries. Their noble sacrifices will forever stand as a beacon light for the admiration of all mankind. Look at Père Marquette. Look into the life of the brave priest whose mobile face now gazes on the multitude as they throng to and fro through Statuary Hall and reflect on the trials of that great discoverer and missionary, who labored far from the haunts of civilization, with no hope of personal reward and animated solely by a desire to promote the cause of the Almighty and His church.

Contrast with this if you will the base minds and ignoble souls of those who, blinded by ignorance and prejudice, demand the removal of that noble work of art from yonder hall.

The divinity of that religion which nerved the hearts and gave strength and force to the arm of that great hero will never permit that sacrilege. What a glorious record the Catholics made for themselves during the war of the Revolution! Who can forget the kind and noble words uttered by George Washington when speaking of the valor and faithfulness of the Catholics in that great struggle? And does history not tell us that some of his closest friends and advisers were the Catholic members of his staff?

What American can ever forget the name of Capt. John O'Brien, who achieved the first naval victory against Great Britain off the coast of Maine? What American does not reverence the name of Commodore Jack Barry, the father of the American Navy? Did not Catholic France, when the army of Washington lay starving and in rags during that cold, bleak winter at Valley Forge, send food and money and munitions of war? And did not the aid received from France at that time mark the turning point in the war? Consider carefully the names of the great heroes of that struggle, and you find the names of Barry and Kosciusko and Pulaski and Lafayette going down to posterity with those of Washington and Adams and Hancock and Warren. In those days you could not find men banded together in secret, stealthily creeping around from one end of the country to the other stabbing their fellow-citizens in the back and intriguing against their religion. Broader and nobler sentiments guided the minds of the American people in those days.

A great many of my fellow-members here can testify from personal experience to the bravery and devotion of the Catholic soldiers in the war of the rebellion.

Were not your eyes gladdened on many a bloody field by the sight of the green flag waving side by side with Old Glory as those Irish Catholic boys charged against the enemy, and did you ever see that green flag waver or fall back?

Whichever way, says a Northern general with a splendid record, we turn for the history of Irish-America, the case is the same; we meet with nothing but cause for honest pride; they are true patriots, good citizens, splendid soldiers.

Said General Longstreet, the manner in which the Irish Catholic Brigade breasted the death-storm from Maryes Heights, Fredericksburg, was the noblest sight in the war. Six times in the face of withering fire before which whole ranks were mown down as corn before the sickle, did the Irish Brigade rush up the hill, rush to inevitable death. I looked with my field glass, said the adjutant-general of General Hancock's staff, and I looked for a long time before I was certain of what I saw. I at first thought that the men of the brigade had lain down to allow the showers of shot and shell to pass over them, for they lay in regular lines. I looked for some movement, some stir, a hand or a foot in motion, but no, they were dead; every man of them, cut down like grass.

Again and again, they had braved the terrific fusilade, and out of twelve hundred who bore a green badge at the beginning of that eventful day, 1,000 lay upon the field, mown down like grass.

This story of men Irish by blood, American by birth and adoption, was seen on every battlefield from the Potomac to the Gulf, and their brave deeds and heroic actions will be held in sacred memory by their offspring for all time.

It is the undisputed testimony of every officer in that war that no braver or more heroic men ever fought for the Union than those who wore the green badge and plume.

Let the men who fought under Sheridan and Rosecrans and Meagher testify to the love and devotion with which they followed the Stars and Stripes.

Did anyone stop to consider when Sheridan was riding toward Winchester town whether he was a Catholic or not?

Will the brave men of 1861–1865 ever forget the devotion and love with which the white-robed Sisters of Charity ministered to the wants of those famished and dying soldiers, and did they not move about from bed to bed in Southern hospitals and prisons like white-winged angels of peace, comforting the sick and ministering to the dying?

Mr. Speaker, I have briefly outlined the story of the devotion of the Catholic people to this great nation of ours. Their work and history speak for themselves and need no defense at my hands.

By their blood have they shown their loyalty to American institutions, and the past four centuries have been the witness of their noble lives, their heroic labors, and their glorious sacrifices.

They have toiled in the forest and on the sea, in the mountain and on the prairie, amid the pleasant scenes of the village and in the dark surroundings of the cities, and in every walk of life have they been faithful and true.

They have aided in the construction of our railways; they have cultivated the soil; they have dug from the mountains their vast treasures of gold and of silver, of iron and coal, and they have linked their destinies and their children's destinies forever with those of this great Republic.

If the glory of nations springs from the graves and brave deeds of their sons, then surely gratitude and justice demand that the services performed by the Catholics of America should be transmitted to posterity with admiration and reverence, not with calumny and abuse. Side by side with the oath taken by the members of the A. P. A., I wish to place the words of our noble martyred President, Abraham Lincoln, who when asked forty years ago in regard to the Know-nothing movement, said:

I am not a Know-nothing; that is certain. How could I be? How can anyone who abhors the oppression of negroes be in favor of degrading any classes of white people? Our progress in degeneracy appears to me to be pretty rapid. As a nation we began by declaring that "all men are created equal." We now practically read it, "All men are created equal except negroes." When the Know-nothings get control it will read, "All men are created equal except negroes and foreigners and Catholics." When it comes to this I shall prefer emigrating to some country where they make no pretense of loving liberty—to Russia, for instance, where despotism can be taken pure and without the base alloy of hypocrisy.

William H. Seward, who has been termed the father of the Republican party, said, in answer to a question regarding the Know-nothing movement:

Secret societies, sir! Before I would place my hand between the hands of other men in a secret lodge, order, class, or council, and bending my knee before them enter into combination with them for any object, personal or political, good or bad, I would pray to God that that hand and that knee might be paralyzed, and that I might become an object of pity and even of the mockery of my fellow-men. Swear, sir! I, a man, an American citizen, a Christian, swear to submit myself to the guidance and direction of other men, surrendering my own judgment to their judgment, and my own conscience to their keeping? No, sir; no!

Proscribe a man because he was not born in the same town or country in which I was born? No! Mr. President, you know now the length and breadth of my connection with the new and mysterious order of patriots, the Know-nothings.

Our glorious Washington said in 1790, answering an address of Catholics of America:

As mankind become more liberal, they will be more apt to allow those who conduct themselves as worthy members of the community as equally entitled to the protection of the civil government. I hope ever to see America among the foremost nations in examples of justice and liberality, and I presume that you, fellow-citizens, will not forget the patriotic part which you took in the accomplishment of their Revolution and the establishment of their Government, and the important assistance they received from a nation in which the Roman Catholic religion is professed.

Mr. Speaker, these sentiments express the opinions of three of the greatest Americans that ever lived.

It is in the spirit of their utterances that I appeal to this House to be fair, to be liberal, to be just in their treatment of these Catholic charities. [Loud and long-continued applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I reserve the residue of my time—two minutes—until the other side has been heard from.

Mr. GROUT. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] five minutes.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I propose the following amendment, which I will read so as to save time:

Transpose the proviso in lines 8 to 13, on page 42, to the end of the new paragraph, after line 25, page 44: "And provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be paid for the purpose of maintaining or aiding, by payment for services or expenses, or otherwise, any church or religious denomination or any institution or society which is under sectarian or ecclesiastical control."

Mr. Speaker, while I do not approve all the provisions of the new paragraph on charities, and while I think the Committee on Appropriations has not met this question with that courage which should characterize a matter of this importance, I admit that it is a vast improvement upon the unjust and inconsistent paragraph that was in the bill at the time it was recommitted. I am in favor of the largest freedom and right of conscience, and I shall always insist that all religious denominations shall have what our Constitution guarantees to them, the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences. Nothing has conduced more to the honor and glory of our country than the protection against all enemies of its religious and personal liberty. The Christian churches have done much for the poor, for the unfortunate children and feeble women of this city; but if they desire to continue as worthy instruments in the enforcement of God's great laws of mercy, humanity, and compassion they should not ask any aid from the Government. The church that must appeal to the Federal Treasury for charity to be by it dispensed among the unfortunates of its charge will soon become spiritually dwarfed and ruined so far as its influence for good is concerned.

This paragraph looks to me as if Congress were now turning its attention in the direction in which I have insisted it ought to have gone years ago—that of providing some rational and just system of public charities in the District of Columbia. The committee has not proposed a complete and permanent system, as it should have done; yet if the provision be amended as I have proposed it will put the whole of the appropriations in the hands of and under the control of the District Commissioners and treat all private institutions alike.

I will not undertake to say whether any of the institutions mentioned in this or the other paragraph are sectarian or not. Their friends say that they are not; others allege that they are; but all admit that they are not public and not under public control. No religious organization or private institution should ask to be aided in the works of charity which it does by appropriations from the public Treasury. If the Committee on the District of Columbia will devise some proper system for distributing such public charities as should be dispensed within this District, I dare say that every man in this Congress will give his hearty support to a liberal appropriation for that purpose. Some of us may insist that all of the appropriations for such purposes shall be taken out of the District funds, but whatever the source from which the money comes, there should be a sufficient sum appropriated to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, shelter the houseless, and care for the sick and feeble of all ages, sexes, and color; and I hope that no amount of clamor in favor of or against one or another religious denomination of this country will prevent Congress from doing that which it ought to do for the helpless unfortunates who are here.

While I myself believe that the appropriations for all these charities should be paid from taxes collected from the people of the District, yet I do not insist that we should withhold all charitable appropriations for the current year because that method of payment can not be adopted. I do not subscribe to the doctrine advanced by some gentlemen that we can determine the correctness of our appropriations by the nonsectarian test, for there are many other ways of misappropriating money than that of aiding religious organizations, and I think this bill is an example of it. If we grant aid to private institutions because they are controlled by people who profess no religion, and refuse it to those managed by God-fearing Christians, it is a discrimination against religion. I deny the right to do this and insist that the greatest good will be accomplished by keeping the public, private, and church charities separate and independent of each other. I think the amendment now proposed by the committee is subject to much criticism and objection, unless my amendment is adopted. The proviso declaring that no part of the money appropriated shall be paid to or be used for sectarian purposes should attach to every institution in the District, and not merely to a part of them. The insertion of this proviso in the midst of the committee's amendment, I think, will make a discrimination against some institutions in favor of others. Some have money given them directly, while others have none, but are remitted to the Commissioners. I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will consent that the amendment I have proposed may be adopted, so that none of the institutions will have any preference, and will all have the same opportunity to be employed by the District Commissioners. [Applause.]

Mr. GROUT. I ask now that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] use his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] is entitled to two minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, if this debate has served no other purpose——

Mr. McRAE. I had proposed this amendment which I read. I suppose it will be considered pending.

Mr. GROUT. I yielded to the gentleman for remarks, not for an amendment. Of course it is subject to objection.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, if this debate has served no other purpose, it has at least demonstrated the lack of wisdom and political judgment on the part of the majority of the Committee on Appropriations in bringing in an amendment such as that now under consideration. I do not believe that the majority of the gentlemen on the other side of this House believe that the injection of this religious question into the discussions of this House is a wise political move. I do not believe that they would favor any such amendment as that which has been offered by the gentleman from Vermont if they had a fair opportunity to express their opinions thereon.

There are two objections to this proposition—first, that it is a blow, and is designed to be a blow, struck at the Roman Catholic religion; and in striking that blow I say that you gentlemen of the Republican party make a great mistake, because you necessarily alienate from yourselves the Roman Catholic voters who have heretofore cast their ballots for your candidates.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, there is left me only one minute in which to close this debate, but that is all that is necessary.

I deny that this amendment is an attack on the Roman Catholic Church. If so, the Democratic party in 1876 made an attack on the Roman Catholic Church, because they put into their national platform precisely the same principle contained in the limitation to the expenditure of the money herein appropriated. The whole charge of the gentleman is false. No church is attacked. The limitation simply provides that none of the public money shall go for the support of any church or of any institution under sectarian or ecclesiastical control. The hour for this discussion has been entirely consumed, except this minute, by the other side of the House, and the more they have talked against it the more it has become apparent that this it is the only ground on which the American people can safely stand.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have a vote on my amendment first.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty is, however, that the time for taking the vote agreed upon by the House has arrived.

Mr. McRAE. But, Mr. Speaker, I moved the amendment in time. This is simply to transpose the words——

Mr. GROUT. I made no agreement with the gentleman to allow an amendment to be offered. I yielded him time, but not for an amendment.

Mr. McRAE. I did not suppose that it would require your consent to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty is that the gentleman read the amendment himself, and did not send it up to the Chair until after the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] had taken the floor, when it was too late.

Mr. McRAE. I read it in order to save the time of sending it to the desk, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman will see that it would be inadmissible now, under the agreement, because the previous question is practically ordered, it having been agreed that the vote should be taken at 4 o'clock.

Mr. McRAE. This is simply for the transposition of the language. I hope the gentleman from Vermont will not object to it.

Mr. GROUT. Well, the gentleman has read the amendment. I do not see any necessity for transposing. I must object.

The question being taken on the adoption of the amendment reported from the Committee on Appropriations, the House divided; and there were—ayes 134, noes 21.

Mr. SULZER and Mr. FITZGERALD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GROUT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for present consideration the bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means with reference to filled cheese.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio will permit the Chair first, there are some House bills with Senate amendments that the Chair will place before the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly; I yield for that purpose.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE CHATTAHOOCHEE RIVER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 6996) to authorize the construction of a wagon and foot bridge across the Chattahoochee River at or near the city of Columbia, Ala., with Senate amendments.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California desire to call up the Post-Office appropriation bill?

Mr. LOUD. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Senate amendments.

Mr. LOUD. I do not ask for the reading of the amendments, Mr. Speaker, and will not ask the House to consider them at this time. I shall move, when the bill is laid before the House, that we nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

Mr. LOUD. I move to nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and ask a conference on the disagreeing vote thereon; and I ask also that the bill with the amendments be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. LOUD, Mr. SMITH of Illinois, and Mr. KYLE.

JURISDICTION OF THE CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to-morrow to file a minority report on the bill H. R. 7370.

Mr. DINGLEY. What is the bill?

Mr. BAILEY. This is a bill relating to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of appeals and the Supreme Court over matters of appeal from the supreme court of the Territories.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

FILLED CHEESE.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill H. R. 8008, which is a substitute for the bills H. R. 3010 and 5213, and is known as the filled-cheese bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio calls up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8008) defining cheese, and also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of "filled cheese."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purposes of this act the word "cheese" shall be understood to mean the food product known as cheese, and which is made from milk or cream, and without the addition of butter, or any animal, vegetable, or other oils or fats foreign to such milk or cream, with or without additional coloring matter.

SEC. 2. That for the purposes of this act certain substances and compounds shall be known and designated as "filled cheese," namely: All substances made of milk or skimmed milk, with the admixture of butter, animal oils or fats, vegetable or any other oils, or compounds foreign to such milk, and made in imitation or semblance of cheese.

SEC. 3. That special taxes are imposed as follows:

Manufacturers of filled cheese shall pay $400 for each and every factory per annum. Every person, firm, or corporation who manufactures filled cheese for sale shall be deemed a manufacturer of filled cheese. Wholesale dealers in filled cheese shall pay $250 per annum. Every person, firm, or corporation who sells or offers for sale filled cheese in the original manufacturer's packages for resale, or to retail dealers as hereinafter defined, shall be deemed a wholesale dealer in filled cheese. But any manufacturer of filled cheese who has given the required bond and paid the required special tax and who sells only filled cheese of his own production at the place of manufacture, in the original packages, to which the tax-paid stamps are affixed, shall not be required to pay the special tax of a wholesale dealer in filled cheese on account of such sales.

Retail dealers in filled cheese shall pay $40 per annum. Every person who sells filled cheese at retail, not for resale, and for actual consumption, shall be regarded as a retail dealer in filled cheese, and sections 3232, 3233, 3234, 3235, 3236, 3237, 3238, 3239, 3240, 3241, 3243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are, so far as applicable, made to extend to and include and apply to the special taxes imposed by this section and to the persons, firms, or corporations upon whom they are imposed: Provided, That all special taxes under this act shall become due on the 1st day of July in every year, or on commencing any manufacture, trade, or business on which said tax is imposed. In the latter case the tax shall be reckoned proportionately from the first day of the month in which the liability to the special tax commences to the 1st day of July following.

SEC. 4. That every person, firm, or corporation who carries on the business of a manufacturer of filled cheese without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law, shall, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not less than $400 and not more than $3,000; and every person, firm, or corporation who carries on the business of a wholesale dealer in filled cheese without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law, shall, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not less than $250 nor more than $1,000; and every person, firm, or corporation who carries on the business of a retail dealer in filled cheese without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law, shall, besides being liable for the payment of the tax, be fined not less than $40 nor more than $500 for each and every offense.

SEC. 5. That every manufacturer of filled cheese shall file with the collector of internal revenue of the district in which his manufactory is located such notices, inventories, and bonds, shall keep such books and render such returns of materials and products, shall put up such signs and affix such number to his factory, and conduct his business under such surveillance of officers and agents as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation require. But the bond required of such manufacturer shall be with sureties satisfactory to the collector of internal revenue, and in a penal sum of not less than $5,000; and the amount of said bond may be increased from time to time, and additional sureties required, at the discretion of the collector or under instructions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

SEC. 6. That filled cheese shall be packed by the manufacturers in wooden packages only, not before used for that purpose, and marked, stamped, and branded with the words "filled cheese" in black-faced letters not less than 2 inches in length, in a circle in the center of the top and bottom of the cheese; and in black-faced letters of not less than 2 inches in length in line from the top to the bottom of the cheese, on the side in four places equidistant from each other; and the package containing such cheese shall be marked in the same manner, and in the same number of places, and in the same description of letters as above provided for the marking of the cheese; and all sales or consignments made by manufacturers of filled cheese to wholesale dealers in filled cheese or to exporters of filled cheese shall be in original stamped packages. Retail dealers in filled cheese shall sell only from original stamped packages, and shall pack the filled cheese when sold in suitable wooden or paper packages, which shall be marked and branded in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Every person who knowingly sells or offers to sell, or delivers or offers to deliver, filled cheese in any other form than in new wooden or paper packages, marked and branded as hereinbefore provided and as above described, or who packs in any package or packages filled cheese in any manner contrary to law, or who falsely brands any package or affixes a stamp on any package denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall upon conviction thereof be fined for each and every offense not more than $500 or be imprisoned not more than one year.

SEC. 7. That all retail and wholesale dealers in filled cheese shall display in a conspicuous place in his or their sales room a sign bearing the words "Filled cheese sold here" in black-faced letters not less than 6 inches in length, upon a white ground, with the name and number of the revenue district in which his or their business is conducted; and any wholesale or retail dealer in filled cheese who fails or neglects to comply with the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction thereof be fined for each and every offense not more than $200.

SEC. 8. That every manufacturer of filled cheese shall securely affix, by pasting on each package containing filled cheese manufactured by him, a label on which shall be printed, besides the number of the manufactory and the district and State in which it is situated, these words: "Notice.—The manufacturer of the filled cheese herein contained has complied with all the requirements of the law. Every person is cautioned not to use either this package again or the stamp thereon again, nor to remove the contents of this package without destroying said stamp, under the penalty provided by law in such cases." Every manufacturer of filled cheese who neglects to affix such label to any package containing filled cheese made by him or sold or offered for sale by or for him, and every person who removes any such label so affixed from any such package, shall be fined $50 for each package in respect to which such offense in committed.

SEC. 9. That upon all filled cheese which shall be manufactured there shall be assessed and collected a tax of 1 cent per pound, to be paid by the manufacturer thereof; and any fractional part of a pound in a package shall be taxed as a pound. The tax levied by this section shall be represented by coupon stamps; and the provisions of existing laws governing the engraving, issue, sale, accountability, effacement, and destruction of stamps relating to tobacco and snuff, as far as applicable, are hereby made to apply to stamps provided for by this section.

SEC. 10. That whenever any manufacturer of filled cheese sells or removes for sale or consumption any filled cheese upon which the tax is required to be paid by stamps, without paying such tax, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, within a period of not more than two years after such sale or removal, upon satisfactory proof, to estimate the amount of tax which has been omitted to be paid and to make an assessment therefor and certify the same to the collector. The tax so assessed shall be in addition to the penalties imposed by law for such sale or removal.

SEC. 11. That all filled cheese as herein defined imported from foreign countries shall, in addition to any import duty imposed on the same, pay an internal-revenue tax of 8 cents per pound, such tax to be represented by coupon stamps; and such imported filled cheese and the packages containing the same shall be stamped, marked, and branded, as in the case of filled cheese manufactured in the United States.

SEC. 12. That any person who knowingly purchases or receives for sale any filled cheese which has not been branded or stamped according to law, or which is contained in packages not branded or marked according to law, shall be liable to a penalty of $50 for each such offense.

SEC. 13. That every person who knowingly purchases or receives for sale any filled cheese from any manufacturer or importer who has not paid the special tax herein provided for shall be liable, for each offense, to a penalty of $100 and to a forfeiture of all articles so purchased or received, or of the full value thereof.

SEC. 14. That whenever any stamped package containing filled cheese is emptied it shall be the duty of the person in whose hands the same is to destroy the stamps thereon; and any person who willfully neglects or refuses so to do shall, for each such offense, be fined not exceeding $50 or imprisoned not less than ten days nor more than six months.

SEC. 15. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to have applied scientific tests, and to decide whether any substances used in the manufacture of filled cheese contain ingredients deleterious to health. But in case of doubt or contest his decision in this class of cases may be appealed from to a board hereby constituted for the purpose, and composed of the Surgeon-General of the Army, the Surgeon-General of the Navy, and the Secretary of Agriculture, and the decision of this board shall be final in the premises.

SEC. 16. And then (on motion of Mr. GROSVENOR) the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to have the general debate proceed for a short time this afternoon, with the hope that at an early period we can make an agreement to limit general debate. Not desiring to proceed at this time, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOK].

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I had the honor to introduce a bill (H. R. 3010) on this subject soon after the present Congress convened, which bill was the basis of the investigation made by the Committee on Ways and Means that resulted in the reporting by the committee of the pending substitute bill. For this reason and because I am deeply impressed with the necessity for the proposed legislation I avail myself of the courtesy of the House to submit a brief statement in support of the measure. I believe the propositions contained in the bill are sound and good, and that they are asked for and will be indorsed by 95 per cent of the people of the United States. The object of the bill is to correct a great wrong that is being perpetrated upon the dairy interests of the country. It contains no proposition that can fairly be called an injustice to anyone. The real purpose of the measure is to put a stamp of disapproval upon a gigantic and ruinous fraud, for it can be shown to the satisfaction of every unprejudiced person that the manufacture and unrestricted sale of the article known as "filled cheese" is a fraud and an imposition upon the people of the country. "Filled cheese" is an imitation cheese and is sold to the people by means of deception which disguises the facts as to what the article really is. Such deception is a fraud and should be publicly branded as a fraud.

The proposed bill is practically in line with the legislation by Congress a few years ago controlling and regulating the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. What oleomargarine is to pure dairy butter "filled cheese" is to pure dairy cheese. Every argument that was presented in favor of the oleomargarine legislation will apply with equal force to the legislation contemplated in the pending bill. If the proposed legislation will cut down the income of any persons in this country, those persons are the "filled cheese" manufacturers, who number, according to the statistics of the Department of Agriculture, about 200 in the United States. On the other hand, under the existing conditions, nearly 70,000,000 of people of this country are being imposed upon and wronged by the unrestricted sale of "filled cheese." If this imposition is to continue, as it is shown by the testimony of dairymen and produce dealers and Government officials, the great dairy industry of the United States will be seriously crippled, if not ruined.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that the introduction of the measure was not the result of a hasty conclusion on my part, nor did I introduce it altogether on account of the vast amount of facts and figures furnished me by those who were in a position to give direct and reliable information in regard to this article known to the trade as "filled cheese," and the damaging effect it has had upon the market for pure cream cheese, and the far-reaching and ruinous effect it is having on a great industry in the United States; but I have observed the situation for several years, and from a plain, business standpoint, and from all the facts I could collect, I became convinced that one of the great industries of the United States was being steadily and surely undermined and would soon be in the deplorable state in which we find it to-day. This condition of the legitimate cheese industry is due very largely to the article called "filled cheese" and the manner in which it is placed upon the market, it being usually branded as "cream cheese." Many of the facts to which I shall briefly invite your attention are well known, and the situation generally presented should cause every American citizen who is aware of the facts to blush because of the reflection it casts upon us in all countries that purchase our dairy products.

As evidence of the feeling among the dairymen of the Northwest with respect to the filled-cheese business and its effect upon the pure-cheese industry, I have to say that ex-Governor Hoard, of Wisconsin, whose thorough knowledge of the dairy interests of the United States is unquestioned, writes me in response to my inquiry relating to filled cheese, the amount manufactured in the United States, and its effect on the market for our dairy products:

> The article filled cheese is a fraud, and the manufacturers of same keep it as secret as possible, but the wretched effect of it seems to require scarcely any argument to prove. Protests were sent the late Secretary Rusk and to me while governor of Wisconsin, and to Wisconsin's present governor, W. H. Upham, from foreign markets, appealing to them to stop this swindle, declaring it to be destructive to the entire confidence of foreign markets as to the character of our cheese, and that there can be no question as to the fact of the very serious falling off in our exports of cheese from the United States to English markets, amounting to nearly 40 per cent in the last few years, due to the filled cheese, which is doing tremendous damage to the dairy interests of the United States.

Since the original bill 3010 was introduced I have had a large amount of correspondence with dairymen, manufacturers, and dealers in cheese concerning the objects and purposes of the measure. Among the first letters I received was one from Hon. H. C. Adams, dairy and food commissioner of Wisconsin, who commended the measure very warmly and suggested such amendments as he deemed needful, several of which were embodied in this substitute bill by the committee.

I am of the opinion that it would be a benefit to the great dairy interests of the United States if the manufacture of skimmed-milk cheese could be prohibited, or so plainly branded that it would have to be sold for what it is, and it is well to keep in mind the fact that, in justice to producer and consumer, every product known as cheese should be branded to indicate precisely what it is, whether "full cream," "skimmed-milk cheese," or "filled cheese."

Filled cheese is made at butter factories, where they have centrifugal machinery to take all the cream or butter fat out of the milk. The cream is made into butter and sold for "finest creamery," and then they take the skimmed milk that is left and put lard and neutral oils into it. This is done by "heating the milk and injecting the neutral into the milk," and this is made into what is known to the trade as filled cheese.

According to advices I have secured from well-informed persons, the ingredients of the article are as follows: Raw materials—skimmed milk, lard, neutral oils, rennet, salt, and coloring. These cost about as follows: One hundred pounds of skimmed milk, 18 cents; 3½ pounds of lard and neutrals, 10½ cents; sundries, 4 cents; making a total of 32½ cents to produce 10 pounds of filled cheese. Approximate cost, 3¼ cents per pound.

The manufacturers of the filled article get this skimmed milk practically for nothing, and they, not the farmers, get what benefit there is in its production. The cost, therefore, of filled cheese is practically the cost of the lard, neutrals, or whatever foreign fat is introduced into it, and something for the coloring, bandage, and boxing. The labor can hardly be considered, because the manufacturers are compelled to have the labor for the production of their butter. Filled cheese is produced at a very low cost, and the profit to the manufacturers, in my judgment, is enormous.

This cheese has been sold quite recently as high as 7½ to 8 cents a pound at wholesale, and some time ago, before the trade had become so badly demoralized from the effect of placing filled cheese on the market, when cream cheese was selling for 11 cents a pound, filled cheese was sold in competition for 10 cents a pound, being branded, of course, as cream cheese, showing a profit of over 6 cents a pound, while the manufacturers of full-cream cheese could hardly realize a profit of ¼ cent a pound.

It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that, while the producer of cream cheese is damaged to an alarming extent, the consumer of "filled cheese" is not benefited, for he pays very nearly the price of cream cheese, and at the same time pays at retail from three to five times as much as this filled article cost to produce it, besides being deceived as to what he is using as a food, being misled by the brand. Many jobbers are forced to use this class of goods, because they are obliged to meet competition.

I can not give with absolute certainty the amount of filled cheese made, but it is estimated at not less than 20,000,000 pounds per annum, which is an enormous quantity, all of it a surplus that is not needed, and takes the place of the genuine article, and as an inevitable consequence destroys the value of pure cheese and lessens the consumption of pure cheese about 50 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I ask any member of this House who may feel inclined to oppose this bill: Who is benefited by the manufacture and sale of filled cheese? Not the farmer; not the manufacturer of pure goods; not the consumer, for the latter pays about the same price for filled cheese as for the pure dairy article, and very often it is sold to him for cream cheese. It may give employment to a few persons who are required to operate the factories wherein is produced the spurious product. The enormous profit is to the less than 200 manufacturers of this article, and this profit to the few who are engaged in producing it is insignificant when compared with the great loss to our country by reason of the manufacture of the article "filled cheese," and the manner in which it is marketed. It is no argument in favor of it to say that filled cheese is an article of "cheap food," as it has been shown that the consumer pays about the same price for it as for cream cheese. A proper tax should be placed on the manufacture and sale of filled cheese, with a stamp on each and every box, package, or wrapper containing the article bearing the words "filled cheese," as is well provided for in the bill, and be so stamped before it leaves the factory where it is manufactured. As showing the necessity for this safeguard, I will relate an incident which illustrates the point very clearly:

An official of the Agricultural Department, while visiting various parts of the United States looking up facts concerning this product for official information, found a lot of 200 boxes of filled cheese on the sidewalk in front of the store of a large dealer in cheese in Chicago, Ill. The boxes bore the mark of having been returned to him. This fact attracted the official's attention particularly to the article, and he saw that the boxes were also marked "Wisconsin cream cheese." He stepped into the office and inquired regarding the cheese and the cause for its being returned. He was informed by the dealer that it was a lot of 200 boxes of filled cheese that had been ordered by a customer of his in the South, who had asserted that to maintain his trade he required some cheaper goods, and that they "must send him 200 boxes of filled cheese." The firm claimed that they disliked to deal in the article, but this Southern dealer was one of their good customers and they decided to fill his order. They shipped the 200 boxes of filled cheese at about 7 cents per pound; the customer tried it, found he could not use it, and returned it. The question was asked how it came to be marked "Wisconsin cream cheese," and the answer was that they knew nothing about that, as it had no such mark upon it when it was originally shipped. This is only one of thousands of such cases, but it serves to illustrate the damaging effect such traffic must have in foreign markets and the distrust that is created with respect to our American products, resulting in a great falling off in the demand in foreign markets for American dairy cheese.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the Agricultural Department sent officials who were practical men into various States and Territories to gain the most reliable information possible as to the amount of filled cheese sold and the manner in which it is placed upon the market. I am credibly informed that of seven principal cities in the Southern States in six of those cities they did not find a pound of pure dairy cheese on sale. But they found plenty of filled cheese, and most of it branded "cream cheese," "dairy cheese," or some fictitious name that was misleading, and the consumers were paying the price of pure dairy cheese.

Many communications have been sent to this country from various boards of trade in Liverpool, London, Bristol, and Glasgow, appealing to governors, legislatures, and other agencies in the West to stop the manufacture of this swindling article, declaring it to be destructive to the entire English market for American dairy cheese. These communications referred to can be obtained from the Secretary of Agriculture or from governors of Wisconsin and other States.

The statistics show that filled cheese is driving our cream cheese out of the best foreign markets on account of the distrust it has produced, because the fraudulent article is placed in those markets under the name of "American cream cheese." This practice has bred a distrust as to the quality of our best dairy cheese (which in outward appearance the filled article very much resembles), and the result is that foreign buyers are choosing to buy cheese from countries whose governments see to it that the manufacture of filled cheese is prohibited, or that it is branded and registered and sold for just what it is. But we see that this "filled cheese" has caused foreigners to lose confidence in American cheese, thereby depriving us in an important degree of those markets.

Mr. Morton, the Secretary of Agriculture, gives us the fact that to one foreign country alone the shipment of our cheese has fallen off about 13,100,000 pounds in eight months, while Canada, our immediate neighbor and competitor, has not only held her own, but has increased her shipments into that country. Shall we, as American citizens, acknowledge that Canadian cheese makers are superior to American cheese makers? Such is not the case, but the Canadian's advantage is due to the rigid manner in which the Canadian Government guards against the manufacture of adulterated goods, together with the interest it takes in convincing the Canadian people of the necessity of keeping up a high standard in the quality of their dairy products.

Mr. OTEY. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow an interruption?

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. OTEY. What part of the cheese is it that is filled? I desire to obtain some information on this subject.

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. If the gentleman had attended any one of the dozen hearings, he would have found plenty of information and all the filled cheese he would care to eat.

Mr. OTEY. Cheese is composed of certain things, and I should like to know what the articles composing this cheese are.

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. I stated that. Perhaps the gentleman did not hear my statement.

Mr. OTEY. I was listening to the gentleman, and tried to hear what he was saying.

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. Filled cheese is made from skimmed milk, rennet, neutral oils, salt, and coloring.

Mr. OTEY. What part is taken out of the milk that is supplied or filled in in the making of filled cheese?

Mr. NORTHWAY. The butter.

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. The butter fat. Every particle of butter fat or cream is taken out of the milk and other fats put in in the place of it in the form of lard or neutral oils. This is done by heating the milk and injecting the oils, or "neutrals," as they are called, into the milk.

Mr. OTEY. The object of this bill is to tax that article, as I understand. Now, is there any reason why we should tax the manufacturers of this cheese if they put in something else that is just as good as the cream?

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. The object is to brand it so that the sale of it can be controlled; and I will ask the gentleman, does he think lard or such fats or oils "just as good as cream"?

Mr. OTEY. This seems to be on the same principle as oleomargarine, and I can not tell that from butter.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman ought to have his taste revised.

Mr. BRUMM. I should like to see you, or anybody else, tell good oleomargarine from butter.

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. There is no desire to tax filled cheese out of existence. It is simply to get it branded, so that it may be sold for what it is.

Mr. OTEY. You do not propose to tax it, then?

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. OTEY. Do you tax it for revenue?

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. Yes, sir; and to so brand it that it may be sold for what it really is.

Mr. OTEY. To get revenue, and not tax it out of existence?

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman stated in the beginning that the principle object of this was to brand a fraud.

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. Yes; to brand a fraud and place it under the control of the revenue officers.

Mr. McMILLIN. So the gentleman admits that the question of taxation is a secondary question, if it is involved at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, Mr. Chairman, we do not want to get too many admissions of record at this time. There may be developments. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. As the gentleman opened the case, I took him on his own statement, and I have correctly stated his position.

Mr. CHICKERING. There may be some additional evidence later on.

Mr. McMILLIN. This much the gentleman will admit—and I state it in justification of the gentleman who has made that statement—that the report does not state the necessity for the raising of the revenue proposed to be raised.

Mr. CHICKERING. Everybody knows that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to say that I have not to-day stated that there is necessity for the sun to shine nor the rains to fall; but there are a few things in this country that we have learned so thoroughly that we do not need to keep stating them.

Mr. McMILLIN. But I suppose that with a Treasury that has $262,000,000 of money now——

Mr. TAWNEY. That we have borrowed. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Whether borrowed or not it is there, and subject to all the uses of the Government. I think it would not be contended that we require additional taxation.

Mr. DALZELL. But we have to pay it back.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We will quote Philip sober against Philip's present statement.

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us consider the evidence of a Government official as to the condition of our cheese export trade. Secretary Morton, of the Department of Agriculture, in speaking of the American cheese trade, offers the following significant comments on the subject of the falling off in our export trade in cheese:

> Throughout the year United States cheese has commanded the minimum figure upon the English market, and as by the operation of an invariable law the lower grades always suffer the most by a material fall in prices, our cheese has suffered disproportionately to other makes by the depressed condition of the English cheese markets, and has reached in 1895 the lowest price yet quoted for American cheese in that country, namely, $2.17 per 100 pounds.
> Our agent and correspondent reports in explanation that "United States cheese is, as a whole, the poorest in quality that reaches the English market, and the British public are not only aware of the fact, but are prejudiced against it because so much in the past has been adulterated." While accusations that "filled cheese" is being dumped on the British markets from the United States go unrefuted, the very first statement impugning the Canadian product in the same manner was met with cabled denials from the Canadian Government, denials from the Canadian agent-general in London, and Canadian exporters. The incident, it seems, has actually turned out to be an excellent advertisement for Canadian cheese, and it is now perfectly well understood by the British public that Canada is maintaining with strenuous care the quality of her exports.
> During the first eight months of 1894 Canada and the United States stood side by side in supplying the English market with cheese; but whereas Canada, in 1895, not only held her own, but made a gain, shipments from the United States have fallen off 13,100,000 pounds. In fact, every country shipping cheese to Great Britain did in 1895 increase its trade to that country except the United States, which has lost over 21 per cent of its last year's business.

N. Simonds, esq., of the firm of Simonds & Co., one of the largest manufacturers and dealers in dairy products in Wisconsin, and, as I am informed, the only manufacturer of edam cheese in the United States, writes me that he personally knows that the report of the Secretary of Agriculture is correct as to the manner in which our markets for dairy products have suffered and fallen off by reason of the distrust in foreign countries of American cheese, caused by filled cheese being shipped there branded as American cream cheese.

> The dairy business of this country has been a profitable one for the United States until two years ago, when they commenced to manufacture filled cheese to a large extent and placed it on the market branded as cream cheese, since which time the filled cheese has done a great damage to the dairymen of the United States, with the exception, perhaps, of a few who are interested with the filled-cheese manufacturers.

I do not claim, Mr. Chairman, that the large decrease in the export of cheese is due entirely to the flooding of the European markets with filled cheese. There is no doubt that the shipment of adulterated goods has had a great deal to do with it, but the greatest damage to our manufacturers of pure cheese comes from the flooding of manufacturing, mining, and other large purchasing centers in our own country, especially in Southern sections, with filled cheese, many thousands of boxes being shipped, taking the place of the genuine cheese, much of it bearing the brand "New York," "Illinois," "Minnesota," and "Wisconsin cream cheese," as the dealer may choose to have it branded. I am not prepared to say that all manufacturers of filled cheese do this, or that they would not prevent it being done by others on goods manufactured by them if they knew it and could prevent it; but it passes out of their hands with a brand that is easily erased, or with no brand at all upon it, and much of this false branding is done after it passes from their control.

It may be well to mention in this connection that vigorous efforts have been made by the legitimate cheese makers and dairymen in several States to stamp out the filled-cheese frauds.

I am informed by Hon. H. C. Adams, dairy and food commissioner of Wisconsin, that there was at one time in Wisconsin alone about 150 factories manufacturing filled cheese, and the annual product of the article was about 8,000,000 pounds. But with a prohibitory law passed last winter by the State legislature of Wisconsin it is supposed that no filled cheese is now being made in Wisconsin. In round numbers the dairy cheese manufactured in Wisconsin for the year, including parts of 1894 and 1895, was about 50,000,000 pounds, and the butter for the same time about 70,000,000 pounds. The total value of the dairy products of Wisconsin for that year was in the neighborhood of $30,000,000.

I have received petitions, memorials, and letters numbering among the thousands from various parts of the United States on this subject. I invite your attention to a few that time will permit me to present. I will read an appeal from the Provision Trade Association of Glasgow, Scotland, to the governor and legislature of the State of Wisconsin, furnished to the committee by Hon. H. C. Adams, of Wisconsin:

GLASGOW, March 13, 1895.

To the Governor, Senate, and Assembly of the State of Wisconsin, U. S. A.

GENTLEMEN: We, the Glasgow Provision Trade Association, in view of the serious and, we fear, permanent injury which is being done to the trade here and in Scotland generally in Wisconsin cheese by the large imports from your State of filled or spurious cheese made of skim milk, lard, beef fat, etc., hereby beg most respectfully to call your attention thereto.

The matter has now become so serious that we venture to say, unless immediate action is taken by you to prohibit the manufacture and shipment of these spurious cheese, it will be quite impossible to sell Wisconsin cheese in this country, in consequence of the suspicion attached to them under existing conditions by all honest dealers, who are liable to prosecution and conviction for selling what they bought as genuine Wisconsin cheese, but which on analysis were found to be, not cheese, but a compound as above stated. We further regret to say that there are a number of dealers on this side who, for the sake of the large profits on the sale of this compound, do not scruple to force it on the public as genuine cheese, and are therefore content to run the risk of being fined from time to time by the authorities here.

In view of these facts, we therefore most respectfully beg to call upon you to at once take steps to put a stop to this nefarious and dishonest trade, by making such laws as will prevent the manufacture and shipping of these goods, and thereby remove the odium and suspicion attached to all cheese presently coming from the State of Wisconsin.

In name of and by authority of the association.

JAS. HAMILTON, President.
A. G. WATSON, Secretary.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Glasgow, Scotland:

I, Allen B. Morse, consul of the United States of America at Glasgow, Scotland, do hereby certify that James Hamilton and A. G. Watson signed the foregoing memorial in my presence, and that I know the said James Hamilton to be president and the said A. G. Watson to be secretary, respectively, of the Glasgow Provision Trade Association therein mentioned, and duly authorized to act for such association.

Witness my hand and consular seal this 13th day of March, 1895, at Glasgow aforesaid.

[SEAL.]

ALLEN B. MORSE,
United States Consul, Glasgow, Scotland.

I will append a statement furnished by the Department of Agriculture, giving statistics as to filled cheese.

The attention of the House should be called to the able and interesting statement made before the committee by Mr. T. F. Shields, of the New York Produce Exchange. Mr. Shields showed that for many years American cheese was very popular in England and throughout Great Britain. It was exported from this country in large quantities, and with this continued good demand, together with a constantly growing home trade in all our large cities, prices were well maintained, and the manufacturers, and through them the dairy farmers, received a fair return for their product.

I quote the following from Mr. Shields's statement, together with the figures submitted by him:

In our own city, within ten years, we had at one time over 40 different exporters whose business was almost entirely confined to the purchasing and exporting of cheese to Great Britain, and many, if not all, of these gentlemen were sent over here by the large importing houses of Great Britain as their agents to buy and ship their cheese to them. Unfortunately within the past few years this has all changed; the "filled cheese" made its appearance in England, having been sent over there by some enterprising Western dealers as fine full-cream cheese.

At first the English buyer was deceived. To be sure, the cheese did not taste the same to him, nor did the cheese have the keeping qualities of the genuine article, but for a time the deception was kept up, but gradually it dawned upon him that large quantities of adulterated cheese were being exported from this country and sold to him as pure, full-cream cheese, and soon it was discovered that all cheese imported from the United States was more or less suspected of being adulterated. The English dairy farmer was not slow to use this to his advantage, for he had long felt the competition of our fine, full-cream cheese and was only too glad to discredit our goods, if possible. Through their efforts laws were passed in Great Britain compelling, under penalty of the forfeiture of the goods, that all cheese imported into the United Kingdom from the States must bear on the package in plain letters the words "Product of the United States."

American cheese was already discredited in England; there was no longer the demand for it that there had been, but to more completely discredit them and prevent the sale of the genuine article on its merits these laws were passed, so that intending buyers would be affected by the prejudice against our goods which existed in the minds of the English buyers. The result has been a continued decrease in our export trade. Where ten years ago we had 40 exporters here in our city, ready at all times to buy our goods, we have to-day not over 10. While we exported in 1879 from New York City to England 2,775,800 boxes of cheese, valued at over $16,500,000, we have been decreasing in our exports every year, until this year our total exports from the city of New York will not be over 600,000 boxes, valued at $3,000,000—a falling off of $13,000,000 and over in seventeen years. When you consider the percentage of this shrinkage it is astonishing—a falling off of over 80 per cent in seventeen years.

There must be some good reason for this great decrease in our exports. I do not think I will be contradicted when I say that the explanation of this is the discredit which has been cast upon our goods by unscrupulous dealers, who have sent the substitute abroad and sold it to unsuspecting buyers as the pure article. The low cost of producing these substitutes and the prospective large profits in selling them as the genuine article has furnished a strong temptation to unconscientious dealers, and the evil has grown.

It can not be said that the English people are not using as much cheese as formerly. Like the English dairy farmers, Canada was not slow to help us along in our decreasing exports. The Canadian Government passed laws prohibiting the manufacturing for export of anything but full cream cheese. They appropriated large sums of money to foster and encourage the manufacture of cheese among the farmers. They sent into our State and hired at liberal salaries American expert cheese makers to teach the farmers and manufacturers how to reach our high standard of quality. They went further than this. They fitted out perfectly equipped cheese factories on large wagons and traveled from town to town, teaching the farmer how to care for his milk and how to manufacture the cheese, until now, from Montreal to the Detroit River west, there are thousands of cheese factories running constantly, not to mention those around the Quebec section, Prince Edward Island, and Manitoba. These efforts have borne good results, for while the exports of cheese from Montreal in the year 1879 were 525,000 boxes, valued at $3,150,000, they have increased every year, until this year they foot up the enormous total of 2,148,854 boxes, valued at nearly $13,000,000. What a tremendous increase in seventeen years and what a lesson for us! These cheeses all go to England and are consumed by the English people.

Thus we see that from an export of 2,775,829 boxes of cheese, valued at over $16,000,000, in 1879, we have dwindled down to 600,000 boxes this year, valued at $3,000,000; while Canada, from an export of 525,000 boxes, valued at $3,150,000, in 1879, has steadily increased every year until now they have shipped the year just passed 2,148,854 boxes, valued at nearly $13,000,000. Canada has increased every year and we have declined, until now there is so little business passing in the article for export that it is almost a waste of time to engage in it.

Exports of cheese from May 1 to April 30.

Think of it, Mr. Chairman! Such a vast industry, still practically in its infancy, being ruined to the sole end that a very few may be allowed to make some money manufacturing filled cheese! But it is the quality of filled cheese and not the quantity alone and the manner in which the spurious goods are sold to consumers that have done so much to injure the market for dairy products. New York, Wisconsin, Ohio, Minnesota, and many other States have passed prohibitory laws against filled cheese, but such laws do not totally prohibit. They prohibit a person making it in New York, Wisconsin, or such States as have passed the prohibitory laws, but they do not prevent the outrageous practice that is carried on by some manufacturers and dealers in filled cheese in different parts of the United States, and also in Europe, who place a brand on the article, "Full cream cheese," "from New York, Wisconsin, Minnesota," or some other State noted for the fine quality of its cream cheese, thereby giving to such State the reputation for sending out filled cheese branded as cream cheese.

Moreover, the fact that New York, Wisconsin, and other States have passed prohibitory laws against the manufacture of filled cheese only serves to make it answer the purpose of the people handling filled cheese to use the "full-cream" brands of these States to mark the spurious article, and then say to their customers, "This must be good cheese, as those States have stringent prohibitory laws against the manufacture of filled cheese." And it is to prevent this damaging practice that I ask the cooperation of this House in the passing of this bill. It meets the approval of the great masses of the people of these United States. I am sure that every manufacturer and every person who supplies the milk and every dealer in unadulterated cheese will cooperate with you and welcome the passage of the bill.

This business of making and selling adulterated cheese is confined to a small section of the United States, a few dealers in cities who are apparently willing to sell anything so long as the business is profitable. Like oleomargarine, it is well understood that filled cheese will not be sold on its merits except under compulsion. While the manufacturers and wholesale merchants who handle it know, and perhaps sell it for what it is, when it goes to the consumer, like all other adulterated foods, it is sold for genuine; and as it is generally sold to and consumed by the laboring people and poorer classes of the community, the outrage seems to be greater as these people, at least, should have honest goods and all they can get for their money. The production and sale of filled cheese is a serious injury to the manufacturer who is making honest cheese.

Mr. Chairman, there is surely no good reason why the filled-cheese business, if it is to be carried on, should not be put under such regulations as will clearly and unquestionably show to the dealer, the consumer, and to the markets of the world that it is not cream cheese.

It has been shown that 4 to 5 cents a pound is about the difference between the cost of making filled cheese and dairy cheese. I believe, however, that with a license of $400 per annum on manufacturers at each and every factory, $250 for wholesale dealers, $40 for retail dealers, and a revenue tax of 2 cents a pound, to be paid by the manufacturer, with revenue stamp and marks placed on each and every cheese before it leaves the factory (as provided for in this bill), together with the penalty clause, the industry can be fairly well regulated.

Every dealer and manufacturer of cheese now understands that we have almost lost the English markets for our cheese, and this has resulted from the fact that the English have lost confidence in our goods and have transferred their orders for cheese to Canada, where the law is very strict and no adulterations are allowed; nor are the Canadians permitted even to make skim cheese for export, so that the English buyer has no fear of being imposed upon with Canadian adulterations.

Mr. LACEY. Is there a law in Canada prohibiting the manufacture and export of this kind of cheese?

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. There is.

Mr. McMILLIN. I believe they are allowed to make cheese from skimmed milk here.

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. Chairman, only a few years ago the export of cheese from New York City alone amounted to about 75,000 boxes and often to 100,000 boxes in a single week. The exports in two months at such times amounted to about as much as they do now in a whole year. This is a serious and damaging situation for the cheese-making interests of our dairy sections, and if there is any class of people in this country who need protection against fraud of any kind it is our farmers and dairymen. In fact, the agricultural interests of our country—the people who do the hard work on the farms—are above all others entitled to the special care and protection of the Government.

I hope, gentlemen, that you will give this bill your support; and I am sure that every manufacturer, dealer, and believer in honest goods will sustain you. No doubt there are large profits in the manufacture and sale of filled cheese; and the people who are engaged in the business exert a great influence when any legislation is attempted against this great evil, and what to most men appears to be a dishonest business. What we should have in this country and what there should not be opposition to by honest and loyal men throughout these United States is a general law prohibiting adulterations of all food products, and it does seem that no man could oppose a measure of this kind. There is not an intelligent person who does not know that the first object of all adulterations is to cheat somebody, to sell something by misrepresentation, and thereby obtain an unwarranted profit. This is the prime and real motive that every man has in the adulteration of anything. Therefore, on behalf of the farmers, manufacturers, dealers, and consumers of dairy products of these United States I appeal to you that you support this bill to regulate and control the manufacture and sale of filled cheese, that it may be enacted into law. [Loud applause.]

DATA AS TO CHEESE AND FILLED CHEESE.

Cheese production of the United States according to the census.

NOTES.—Nine-tenths of this cheese is made in the States of New York, Wisconsin, Ohio, Illinois, Vermont, Iowa, Pennsylvania, and Michigan, ranking in the order named.

The New York product alone is almost one-half the total, and this State and Wisconsin together make over two-thirds of all. The reputation of these two States as to quality of cheese is about the same, and they have such a preponderating influence that they give character to the entire cheese output of the country.

It requires the entire milk of about 1,000,000 cows to make the cheese annually pressed in the United States.

The value of the annual cheese product of the United States varies from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000.

Cheese imported annually into the United States, about 9,000,000 pounds.

Rate of consumption of cheese in the United States, about 3 pounds per capita per annum. Consumption apparently on the decrease.

Composition: Good cheese is approximately composed of one-third water, one-third milk-fat, and one-third casein, with some sugar and ash.

Exports of cheese from the United States and Canada.

NOTES.—For the year ended June 30, 1895, value of cheese exported from United States, $5,497,539, or $9.09 per hundredweight; from Canada, $14,253,002, or $9.76 per hundredweight.

Nearly 10,000,000 pounds of cheese made in the United States annually are exported to Canada to be reexported to Great Britain.

Since 1860 the increase in quantity exported by Canada is a thousandfold; then Canada exported less than one-hundredth part of the quantity sent from the United States. Now, the cheese export of the former is more than double that of the latter in quantity and nearly 10 per cent greater in value per pound.

Canada prohibits by law the manufacture or sale of skimmed cheese and of filled cheese, and there are no indications of effort on the part of makers or merchants to evade or violate these laws.

The reputation of Canadian cheese in the British markets has increased very greatly in consequence of a knowledge of these facts.

The very best cheese from the United States now sells more readily in London if bearing a Canadian brand than under the names which but a few years ago were accepted as a guaranty of all that was honest and best in cheese.

FILLED CHEESE.

Factories and product in the United States as estimated:

1895: Factories in Wisconsin, 200; in Illinois, 65; total annual product, 14,000,000 pounds.

1896: Factories in Illinois, 90; elsewhere, 10; total annual product, 12,000,000 pounds.

HENRY E. ALVORD,
Chief of the Dairy Division.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2426) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the care of dependent children in the District of Columbia, and to create a board of children's guardians," approved June 26, 1892, to report it favorably without amendment. As this is a matter designed to settle a question of jurisdiction between Dr. Gallaudet, of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, and the board of children's guardians, I ask the immediate consideration of the bill.

I will simply state that under the old law the authorities of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum had jurisdiction over feeble-minded children. When the board of children's guardians was established it was intended to transfer that jurisdiction entirely to the new board, but it seems there was a little lapse in the law and the authorities of the Deaf and Dumb institution now have to certify, but have no further jurisdiction, and they want to get rid of it. I trust that the bill will be immediately passed.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMPRISONMENT OF EUGENE V. DEBS.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. Eugene V. Debs, one of the leaders of the labor movement, representing himself and a large number of the different associations, asking me whether the Committee on the Judiciary have taken any action in reference to the resolution for inquiring into and reporting legislation relating to the restraint of the power of judges of the United States courts in matters of contempt, and requesting that there shall be some expression by which he may be advised in regard to the fact. I know of no other method of ascertaining it than to ask the question of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. Mr. Debs represents a great body of the most important and deserving class of the American people, and I wish to give respect and consideration to their wishes on this subject, agreeing, as I do, with Mr. Debs in the opinion that this legislation is important.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the question may now be asked, though it is out of order.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator repeat his question? I did not know that he was addressing his remark to me.

Mr. CALL. I made a request for information on the part of Mr. Eugene V. Debs, one of the leaders of the labor movement in the United States, as to whether the Judiciary Committee of the Senate have taken any action in relation to reporting legislation restraining or modifying the power of judges of the United States courts in matters of contempt.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I suppose there is no impropriety in stating what has taken place in the committee on the subject and the circumstances.

It is a very important question, and one which the committee have meant to deal with thoroughly and faithfully. The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] who is now absent undertook to make a careful collection of the law upon this subject and to prepare a measure to be submitted to the committee by the subcommittee. The matter has been somewhat discussed in the committee, but his report has not yet been made. However, the result of the discussion has been that one or two separate measures have been prepared. One was sent to the committee yesterday morning by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], who is a member of that committee, which is a careful and thoroughly prepared bill dealing with the whole subject.

So the matter has not been overlooked. The committee are dealing with it as rapidly as the nature of the case seems to admit. How soon the matter will be ripe for a report by the committee is a question that had better be addressed to the Senator from New York who ordinarily sits on the left of the Senator from Florida, but who is not now in his seat, and who is, I believe, the chairman of the subcommittee on the subject.

I think I am not indiscreet in stating that I understand and believe every member of the committee is of opinion that there ought to be some careful legislation on the subject which shall preserve the rights of the citizens and preserve also, of course, the authority of the law, and that that careful legislation would probably contain a right to go by appeal or on exceptions to higher courts from lower in proper cases, where the contempt does not exist in the actual presence of the court and where its immediate suppression is not necessary for the due and orderly proceeding of the business of the court, which I suppose would be probably what the Senator from Florida himself would approve.

SALARY ACCOUNTS OF SENATORS.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. From the Committee on Privileges and Elections I report a substitute for the resolution introduced on the 4th of March by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], and submit a report thereon. It relates to the salary accounts of two Senators, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute reported from the committee will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the duty of the Secretary of the Senate to credit the salary accounts, respectively, of LEE MANTLE, a Senator from the State of Montana, and CLARENCE B. CLARK, a Senator from the State of Wyoming, to the full extent of their monthly pay from March 4, 1893, the date of the commencement of the terms for which they were elected, to July 31, 1894, the date of the passage of the act of Congress changing the time when the salaries of Senators elected or appointed to fill vacancies in the Senate, and of Senators elected for a full term subsequent to the commencement of such term, shall commence to run.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think we had better see the report on the subject in print.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then let the resolution be printed, and also the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; let the resolution and report be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and go over.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask that it do not go to the Calendar. Let it lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table for the present. The report will be printed under the rule.

Mr. HALE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 127) proposing amendments to section 73, paragraph 32, of the act of January 12, 1895, providing for the public printing and binding and distribution of documents; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 128) proposing an amendment to section 89, paragraph 2, of the act of January 12, 1895, providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

WASHINGTON CITY POST-OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. COCKRELL. I introduce a joint resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 126) requiring the roof of the new city post-office building, Washington, D. C., to be fireproof was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to construct the upper story and roof of the Washington City post-office building, in the District of Columbia, of the best modern fireproof material, in order that said building may be thoroughly fireproof in all its parts, as required by the several acts authorizing the construction of said building; and all material heretofore used in the construction of the upper story and roof of said building not of the best modern fireproof kind and character shall be removed and the best modern fireproof material substituted therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What difference does this measure make in the cost of the building?

Mr. COCKRELL. It will make no difference, I suppose, because the existing law requires it to be done just as the joint resolution specifies. Instead of the pine that is being put upon the roof now, the most inflammable material that they could select, this is simply to cause the law to be carried out.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It seems to me that we ought to put as much combustible material into that building as possible, and that when finished it should be set on fire. Architecturally it appears to me that it is an eyesore and always will be to every citizen of this country. It mars the appearance of the Avenue. I am very sorry to see anything done that will prevent it from being burnt up.

Mr. COCKRELL. The lower part of the structure can not burn as it is now, and we do not want the upper part, containing valuable records, to be burned.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMPRISONMENT OF MRS. FLORENCE E. MAYBRICK.

Mr. CALL. At the request of one of the intelligent women of the United States who are much interested in the subject, I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. In doing so, I take pleasure in saying that as far as I am concerned I concur entirely in the request of the joint resolution and in its spirit and purpose. I ask that it be read at length.

The joint resolution (S. R. 129) requesting the Government of Great Britain to pardon Mrs. Florence E. Maybrick as an act of magnanimity was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the people of the United States sympathize with Mrs. Florence E. Maybrick, formerly of Mobile, Ala., in her sufferings, under a sentence of life imprisonment at hard labor in England: that they almost universally believe that she is innocent, and it would be an act of gracious respect to the public opinion of this people, speaking the English language, in large part of English descent, governed by the same laws, inheriting the same love of law and order, the same abhorrence of crime, the same love of liberty and the protection of the weak and helpless against arbitrary power, for the Government of Great Britain to pardon Mrs. Maybrick and restore her to her country and her family.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate this resolution to the Government of Great Britain.

Mr. SHERMAN. If in order, I will move to lay the joint resolution on the table. It ought not to be introduced here. I happened to be in England at the time of the trial of this person. There was great difference of opinion as to whether she ought to have been convicted, but certainly it is a subject over which the Senate of the United States has no jurisdiction. I trust that the joint resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. CALL. I will ask that it may lie on the table for the present. I should like to have a vote of the Senate on the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, though it is not in order to discuss it at this time. It is the opinion of a great body of people of the United States that this person has been very unjustly treated. This is a respectful request in response to a great public opinion. There is nothing in it offensive to the Government of Great Britain, but it simply expresses a sympathy and an opinion on the part of the people of her innocence. I have never yet seen anyone who would deny the fact that the trial was a harsh one, and that the probabilities were altogether in favor of innocence on the part of this person. I ask that the joint resolution may lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution has been read twice.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the joint resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Ohio to withdraw that motion and let it lie upon the table subject to be called up when we may have some consideration of it. I think disposing arbitrarily of a petition and request from so large a portion of the people of the United States is somewhat improper, and will be prejudicial to the application of the friends of this person for a pardon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to lay the joint resolution on the table.

Mr. CALL. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALTHALL. Why not let the joint resolution go over under the rule? Is there any objection to that course?

Mr. COCKRELL. One objection carries it over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a joint resolution. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, to lay it on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to say a word on the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Florida will proceed.

Mr. CALL. I should be very glad to hear from the Senator from Ohio or any other Senator some reasonable objection to the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary. If there is anything in it that may seem to be improper toward a foreign government, it can be amended by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to dispose of the matter, I am perfectly willing that it shall be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, if the Senator from Florida desires.

Mr. TELLER. That is right.

Mr. CALL. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator from Ohio withdraws his motion to lay the joint resolution on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. And moves to refer it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to refer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CALL submitted eight amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SQUIRE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SOUTHERN FEDERAL PRISON.

Mr. BACON. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which I ask be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

In moving the reference of the proposed amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary, I beg the indulgence of the Senate to state that it relates to the construction of a Southern Federal prison, and that I offer the amendment at the suggestion and with the approval of the Attorney-General. In order that the importance of it may be suggested to the Senate, rather than undertake myself to state the reasons therefor, I beg leave to read one paragraph from the last annual report of the Attorney-General on this subject. It is as follows:

The necessity for suitable United States prisons and reformatories has been heretofore urged in the reports to Congress from this Department, and I believe that the time for adequate provision to that end has fully arrived. In considering the subject the question of economy should not be deemed the only one of importance. The fact that the entire practice with regard to the imprisonment of United States convicts is antiquated and inefficient is but too evident, and furnishes sufficient warrant for the substitution of better methods.

An act was passed by the Fifty-first Congress authorizing the purchase of sites for the erection of three United States prisons, but was held to be inoperative because it carried no appropriation. Should it be deemed inexpedient now to make an appropriation sufficient to carry out all the original purposes of that law, it is suggested that at least one penitentiary should be established in a Southern State for the confinement of convicts from Southern districts. This measure seems to me to be imperatively demanded for reasons of humanity as well as economy. But few State institutions in that section can be used for Federal prisoners, who are consequently sent to penitentiaries in Northern districts. The change of climate involved results injuriously, and Executive clemency is frequently invoked and exercised on the ground alone that the prisoner's health has been permanently broken and incurable disease contracted by the severity of the Northern winters.

I have ascertained that there are in the South quite a large number of reservations belonging to the Government, military and otherwise, among which a suitable site for a prison could doubtless be selected. If not, offers made after the passage of the act just mentioned show that the land required would doubtless be furnished free of cost to the Government.

It is not the purpose of this amendment to ask for an appropriation sufficient for the completion of the prison. The original amount contemplated in the act of 1890, which is referred to by the Attorney-General, is much larger than that named in the proposed amendment. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to secure an amount sufficient to defray the necessary expenses in procuring the site, the making of the plans, and the beginning of the work.

I trust that the amendment may meet with the approval of the committee and of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed.

CLAIMS FOR RENT OF BARRACKS AND QUARTERS.

Mr. LINDSAY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to report to the Senate at as early a day as practicable of the present session the cases of Kentucky claimants for rents for barracks and quarters allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury and reported to Congress January, 1895, in House Executive Document 234, and not appropriated for.

TRANSMISSISSIPPI EXPOSITION AT OMAHA.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Have we finished the morning business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is completed, the Chair believes.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that the special order be laid before the Senate this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the special order.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1306) to authorize and encourage the holding of a transmississippi exposition at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1898, and making an appropriation therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has been read in full, and the question is on the first amendment reported by the Select Committee on International Expositions.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I consented that the bill might be taken up, with the understanding that it would not lead to debate. If it leads to debate I shall object to its consideration, in order that we may proceed with the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that this bill, and the RECORD so reads, was to be taken up and considered between the conclusion of the routine morning business and the hour of 2 o'clock. That is the RECORD, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The RECORD shows that its consideration is not to interfere with the appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir; "not to interfere with the appropriation bill."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall insist upon taking up the Indian appropriation bill, if this bill leads to debate, without reference to the hour of 2 o'clock, as I so understood the agreement.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will permit the bill to be disposed of, although it may lead to some slight inquiries.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me a moment, I will state that I have for the first time examined this bill. I think there are some changes which should be made in the phraseology. I have not had time to prepare those changes. I hope the Senator from Nebraska and others will consent that it may go over until the Indian appropriation bill is completed. I do not think it will take long to dispose of it then.

Mr. ALLEN. That course is satisfactory to me, if it can be retained as a special order after the conclusion of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. There is some phraseology in the bill to which I should like to call the Senator's attention, and I think he will see that it ought to be changed.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I ask unanimous consent that the bill be made a special order after the conclusion of the Indian appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up for consideration after the Indian appropriation bill is disposed of.

Mr. HOAR. Does that displace all special orders?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; it is unanimous consent that is asked for the consideration of the bill immediately following the disposal of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. If that is to postpone to an indefinite period all special orders, I shall object. If, however, as I understood the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, the Indian appropriation bill is to be disposed of to-day, I shall not make any objection, with the understanding that this bill is not to go beyond to-day. That will be satisfactory, undoubtedly, to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. I hardly believe the Indian appropriation bill can be concluded to-day. This bill will not——

Mr. HOAR. I will state to the Senator that I wish very much indeed to reach the measure abolishing the death penalty, which has now two special orders before it. There are quite a number of poor wretches who are likely to be sentenced to death. I suggest to the Senator to confine the order to to-day. I think it will be finished.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well, then; let it stand as the order for to-day after the conclusion of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. Not to extend beyond to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BROWN. There is objection. We have been for weeks trying to get up the joint resolution which is the unfinished business, and we have been constantly met with interruption.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not hear the remark of the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BROWN. The Uncompahgre joint resolution is the unfinished business.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will pardon me, I will state that this would not at all interfere with the unfinished business. My request simply was that it might be taken up this afternoon after the conclusion of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. By unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLEN. By unanimous consent.

Mr. BROWN. If it will not interfere, let it take its place after the Uncompahgre joint resolution is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Nebraska.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 5672) to grant to railroad companies in Indian Territory additional powers to secure depot grounds; and

A bill (H. R. 6996) to authorize the construction of a wagon and foot bridge across the Chattahoochee River at or near the city of Columbia, Ala.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 1317) to grant certain lands to the city of Colorado Springs, Colo.; and

A bill (S. 2141) to amend an act approved August 24, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize purchasers of the property and franchises of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to organize a corporation and to confer upon the same all the powers, privileges, and franchises vested in said company."

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5210) making appropriation to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LOUD, Mr. SMITH of Illinois, and Mr. KYLE managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 569) granting a pension to Sophia J. Hamilton, widow of Charles S. Hamilton, major-general of volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 1499) to correct the muster of Lieut. Gilman L. Johnson;

A bill (H. R. 5363) authorizing the construction of a fog signal on the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor, Michigan; and

A bill (H. R. 6425) for the relief of Clifton R. Anderson.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill. I suppose, however, a motion is not necessary. I think it is the order of business.

Mr. HOAR. A motion is necessary in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion must be made.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6249) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with at page 65.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The committee amendments on page 65 were passed over, and we will go on through with the bill before we take them up.

The reading of the bill was resumed at line 8, on page 65. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 65, after line 22, to insert:

For the purpose of erecting additional buildings for the Mount Pleasant Indian school at Mount Pleasant, Mich., namely: For the erection of a girls' dormitory and dining hall, $30,000; for the erection of a schoolhouse, $10,000; in all, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 1, after the word "dollars," to insert "for the construction and furnishing of bathrooms, $1,000"; so as to read:

For support and education of 150 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Pierre, S. Dak., at $167 each per annum, $25,050; for pay of superintendent of said school, $1,500; for general repairs and improvements, $1,000; for the construction and furnishing of bathrooms, $1,000.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "one" before "thousand," and inserting "two"; so as to read "$2,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the same clause, on page 67, in line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-seven," and insert "twenty-eight"; and in line 4, after the word "dollars," to strike out "for the construction and furnishing bathrooms for the said school, $1,000"; so as to read:

In all, $28,550.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The footing should be changed in consequence of the amendment just adopted. I therefore move to amend the amendment by striking out "twenty-eight" and inserting "twenty-nine"; so as to make the amount "$29,550."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 4, on page 71, line 18, after "June 30," to change the date "1896" to "1897"; and in line 21, after "July 1," to change the date "1895" to "1896"; so as to read:

Provided, That so much of the appropriations herein made as may be required to pay for goods and supplies, for expenses incident to their purchase, and for transportation of the same, for the year ending June 30, 1897, shall be immediately available; but no such goods or supplies shall be distributed or delivered to any of said Indians prior to July 1, 1896.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 73, to insert as a new section the following:

AGREEMENT WITH THE INDIANS OF THE FORT BELKNAP INDIAN RESERVATION IN MONTANA.

SEC. 8. Whereas William C. Pollock, George Bird Grinnell, and Walter M. Clements, commissioners on the part of the United States, did on the 9th day of October, A. D. 1895, conclude an agreement with the Indians of the Fort Belknap Reservation in the State of Montana, which said agreement is in words and figures as follows (Senate Document No. 117, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session), to wit:

Agreement concluded October 9, 1895, with the Indians of the Fort Belknap Reservation in Montana, by William C. Pollock, George Bird Grinnell, and Walter M. Clements, commissioners.

This agreement, made and entered into this 9th day of October, A. D. 1895, by and between William C. Pollock, George Bird Grinnell, and Walter M. Clements, commissioners on the part of the United States, and the undersigned Indians, residing upon and attached to the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation in the State of Montana, the same constituting a majority of the male adult Indians belonging upon said reservation, witnesseth that:

ARTICLE I.

For and in consideration of the sum to be paid and the obligations assumed on the part of the United States, as hereinafter set forth, said Indians of the Fort Belknap Reservation hereby convey, relinquish, and release to the United States all their right, title, and interest in and to that portion of their present reservation, in the State of Montana, lying and being within the following described lines, to wit: Beginning at the 54-mile boundary monument, at a point about the middle of the crest of Mission Butte, and following a straight line, bearing (magnetic) north seventeen degrees thirty minutes west, to the highest point on a limestone ridge on the south side of the north fork of Peoples Creek, and running at right angles to the course of said creek at this point; thence in a straight line, bearing (magnetic) north two degrees forty-five minutes west, to a rounded, timbered knob on the crest of the limestone reef on the north side of the north fork of Peoples Creek and parallel with its general course; thence easterly, following the crest of the last-mentioned limestone reef north of the north fork of Peoples Creek to a low, rounded hill on said limestone reef, where it dips down to the valley of Lodge Pole, or Red Mountain Creek; thence in a straight line north seventy-four degrees east (magnetic) to the wooded limestone ridge known as Travois Butte, where a line drawn from the summit of Granite Butte (the peak south of the 61½-mile boundary monument) north fifteen degrees east (magnetic) would intersect it; thence along said straight line to the southern boundary line of the present reservation; thence along said southern boundary line of the present reservation to the point of beginning.

ARTICLE II.

For and in consideration of the conveyance, cession, and relinquishment hereinbefore made, the United States hereby covenants and agrees to advance and expend during the period of four years, beginning from and after the expiration of the payments provided for in the agreement made between the parties hereto on the 11th day of February, A. D. 1887, and ratified by Congress on the 1st day of May, A. D. 1888, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the Indians, the sum of $360,000. It is agreed that the said money shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States immediately upon the expiration of the payments under the said agreement of 1887, to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, and there shall be expended the sum of $90,000 yearly, or so much thereof as may be necessary, as hereinafter provided. It is provided that any surplus accumulated under and remaining at the expiration of payments under the agreement of 1887 shall also bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

Such sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary in any one year, shall be expended in the purchase of cows, bulls, and other live stock, goods, clothing, subsistence, agricultural implements; in providing employees, in the education of Indian children, in procuring medicine and medical attendance, in the care and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, and helpless orphans; in the erection and keeping in repair of such new agency and school buildings, mills, blacksmith, carpenter, and wagon shops, as may be necessary; in assisting the Indians to build and keep in repair their houses, inclose and irrigate their farms, and in such other ways as may best promote their civilization and improvement.

ARTICLE III.

It is agreed that in the employment of all agency and school employees preference in all cases be given to Indians residing on the reservation who are well qualified for such positions, and that all cattle issued to said Indians for stock-raising purposes, and their progeny, shall bear the brand of the Indian Department, and shall not be sold, exchanged, or slaughtered except by the consent of the agent in charge, until such time as this restriction shall be removed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

ARTICLE IV.

In order to encourage habits of industry and to reward labor, it is further understood and agreed that in the giving out or distribution of cattle or other stock, goods, clothing, subsistence, and agricultural implements, as provided in Article II, preference shall be given to Indians who endeavor by honest labor to support themselves, and especially to those who in good faith undertake the cultivation of the soil and engage in pastoral pursuits as a means of obtaining a livelihood, and the distribution of these benefits shall be made from time to time in such manner as shall best promote the objects specified.

ARTICLE V.

As the scarcity of water on this reservation renders the pursuit of agriculture difficult and uncertain, and since the reservation is well adapted to stock raising, and it seems probable that the main reliance of these Indians for self-support is to be found in cattle raising, it is agreed that during the existence of this agreement no allotments of land in severalty shall be made to them, but that this whole reservation shall continue to be held by these Indians as a communal grazing tract, upon which their herds may feed undisturbed; and that after the expiration of this agreement the land shall continue to be so held until such time as a majority of the adult males of the tribes shall request in writing that allotment in severalty shall be made of their lands: Provided, That any member of the tribes may, with the approval of the agent in charge, fence in such area of land as he and the members of his family would be entitled to under the allotment act, and may file with the agent a description of such land and of the improvements that he has made on the same, and the filing of such description shall give the said member of the tribes the right to take such land when allotments of the lands in severalty shall be made.

ARTICLE VI.

So soon as this agreement shall have received the approval of Congress, the boundary lines described in Article I shall be surveyed, designated, and marked by monuments not more than one-half mile apart. The expense of such survey shall be borne by the United States, but the unskilled laborers employed in the work shall be hired from among the Indians residing on this reservation.

Such survey and the markings of the above-described boundary lines shall be done immediately—not later than ninety days after the approval of this agreement by Congress—and completed as speedily as possible, and the ceded portion of the reservation shall not be thrown open to occupancy by the whites until after the new boundaries of the reservation shall have been established and marked.

ARTICLE VII.

It is further agreed and provided that none of the money realized from the sale of this land shall be applied to the payment of any judgment which has been or may hereafter be rendered upon any claim for damages because of depredations committed by said Indians prior to the date of this agreement.

ARTICLE VIII.

All of the provisions of the agreement between the parties hereto, made February 11, 1887, not in conflict with the provisions of this agreement, are hereby continued in full force and effect.

ARTICLE IX.

It is understood and declared that whenever the word Indian is used in this agreement it includes mixed bloods as well as full bloods.

ARTICLE X.

This agreement shall not be binding upon either party until ratified by Congress.

Dated and signed at the Fort Belknap Agency, Mont., on the 9th day of October, 1895.

Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said agreement be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed.

That for the purpose of making the survey of the boundary lines described in article 1 as provided for by article 6 of said agreement, there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, the same to be immediately available.

That upon the filing in the United States local land office for the district in which the lands surrendered by Article I of the foregoing agreement are situated of the approved plat of survey authorized by section 2 of this act, the lands so surrendered shall be open to occupation, location, and purchase, under the provisions of the mineral-land laws only, subject to the several articles of the foregoing agreement: Provided, That said lands shall be sold at $10 per acre: And provided further, That the terms of this section shall not be construed to authorize the occupancy of said lands for mining purposes prior to the date of filing said approved plat of survey.

The next amendment was, on page 82, after line 3, to insert as a new section the following:

AGREEMENT WITH THE INDIANS OF THE BLACKFEET INDIAN RESERVATION IN MONTANA.

SEC. 9. Whereas William C. Pollock, George Bird Grinnell, and Walter M. Clements, commissioners on the part of the United States, did on the 26th day of September, A. D. 1895, conclude an agreement with the Indians of the Blackfeet Reservation, in the State of Montana, which said agreement is in words and figures as follows (Senate Document No. 118, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session), to wit:

Agreement concluded September 26, 1895, with the Indians of the Blackfeet Reservation, in Montana, by William C. Pollock, George Bird Grinnell, and Walter M. Clements, commissioners.

This agreement, made and entered into the 26th day of September, A. D. 1895, by and between William C. Pollock, George Bird Grinnell, and Walter M. Clements, commissioners on the part of the United States, and the undersigned Indians, both full bloods and mixed bloods, residing upon and attached to the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, the same constituting a majority of the male adult Indians belonging upon said reservation, both full bloods and mixed bloods, the latter's rights to participate in all business proceedings of said tribe and to share in all the benefits accruing to said tribes from a sale of land or otherwise being hereby recognized as equal to the full bloods, witnesseth that:

ARTICLE I.

For and in consideration of the sums to be paid and the obligations assumed upon the part of the United States, as hereinafter set forth, said Indians of the Blackfeet Reservation hereby convey, relinquish, and release to the United States all their right, title, and interest in and to that portion of their present reservation in the State of Montana lying and being west of the following-described line, to wit:

Beginning at a point on the northern boundary of the reservation due north from the summit of Chief Mountain, and running thence south to said summit; thence in a straight line to the most northeasterly point of Flat Top Crag; thence to the most westerly of the mouths of Divide Creek; thence up said creek to a point where a line drawn from the said northeasterly point of Flat Top Crag to the summit of Divide Mountain intersects Divide Creek; thence to the summit of Divide Mountain; thence in a straight line to the western extremity of the lower Two Medicine Lake; thence in a straight line to a point on the southern line of the right of way of the Great Northern Railway Company 4 miles west of the western end of the railway bridge across the north fork of the Two Medicine River; thence in a straight line to the summit of Heart Butte, and thence due south to the southern line of the present reservation: Provided, That said Indians shall have, and do hereby reserve to themselves, the right to go upon any portion of the lands hereby conveyed so long as the same shall remain public lands of the United States, and to cut and remove therefrom wood and timber for agency and school purposes, and for their personal uses for houses, fences, and all other domestic purposes: And provided further, That the said Indians hereby reserve and retain the right to hunt upon said lands and to fish in the streams thereof so long as the same shall remain public lands of the United States under and in accordance with the provisions of the game and fish laws of the State of Montana.

ARTICLE II.

For and in consideration of the conveyance, cession, and relinquishment hereinbefore made the United States hereby covenants and agrees to advance and expend during the period of ten years beginning from and after the expiration of the payments provided for in the agreement made between the parties hereto on the 11th day of February, A. D. 1887, and ratified by Congress on the 1st day of May, A. D. 1888, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the Indians, both full bloods and mixed bloods, now attached to and receiving rations and annuities at the Blackfeet Agency, and all who shall hereafter be declared by the tribes located upon said reservation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, entitled to membership in those tribes, the sum of $1,500,000.

It is agreed that said money shall be paid as follows: The first year after the expiration of payments under the agreement of 1887, $300,000, one-half of which shall be deposited in the United States Treasury and bear interest at 4 per cent per annum, and one-half, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, shall be expended as hereinafter provided; and annually thereafter for eight years the sum of $150,000: Provided, That any surplus accumulated under and remaining at the expiration of the agreement of 1887, and any surplus that may remain from any annual payment provided for herein, shall also be placed in the United States Treasury to the credit of said Indians, and shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum. Such sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary in any one year, shall be expended in the purchase of cows, bulls, and other live stock, goods, clothing, subsistence, agricultural implements, in providing employees, in the education of Indian children, in procuring medicine and medical attendance, in the care and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, and of helpless orphans, in the erection and keeping in repair of such new agency and school buildings, mills, blacksmith, carpenter, and wagon shops as may be necessary, in assisting the Indians to build and keep in repair their houses, inclose and irrigate their farms, and in such other ways as may best promote their civilization and improvement.

ARTICLE III.

It is agreed that in the employment of all agency and school employees preference in all cases be given to Indians residing on the reservation, who are well qualified for such positions; and that all cattle issued to said Indians for stock-raising purposes, and their progeny, shall bear the brand of the Indian Department, and shall not be sold, exchanged, or slaughtered, except by the consent of the agent in charge, until such time as this restriction shall be removed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

ARTICLE IV.

In order to encourage habits of industry and to reward labor, it is further understood and agreed that, in the giving out or distribution of cattle or other stock, goods, clothing, subsistence, and agricultural implements, as provided in Article II, preference shall be given to Indians who endeavor by honest labor to support themselves, and especially to those who in good faith undertake the cultivation of the soil and engage in pastoral pursuits as a means of obtaining a livelihood, and the distribution of these benefits shall be made from time to time, in such manner as shall best promote the objects specified.

ARTICLE V.

Since the situation of the Blackfeet Reservation renders it wholly unfit for agriculture, and since these Indians have shown within the past four years that they can successfully raise horned cattle, and there is every probability that they will become self-supporting by attention to this industry, it is agreed that during the existence of this agreement no allotments of land in severalty shall be made to them, but that this whole reservation shall continue to be held by these Indians as a communal grazing tract upon which their herds may feed undisturbed; and that after the expiration of this agreement the lands shall continue to be held until such time as a majority of the adult males of the tribe shall request in writing that allotment in severalty shall be made of their lands: Provided, That any member of the tribe may, with the approval of the agent in charge, fence in such area of land as he and the members of his family would be entitled to under the allotment act, and may file with the agent a description of such land and of the improvements that he has made on the same, and the filing of such description shall give the said members of the tribe the right to take such land when allotments of the land in severalty shall be made.

ARTICLE VI.

So soon as this agreement shall have received the approval of Congress the boundary lines described in Article I shall be surveyed and designated by two engineers, one of whom shall be selected by the Indians and one by the Secretary of the Interior; the said boundaries shall at once be marked by monuments, not more than one-half mile apart; the points at the mouth of Divide Creek and the westernmost extremity of the lower Two Medicine Lake, after they have been marked, shall be fixed and remain unchanged, no matter what alterations may hereafter take place in the course of said creek, or in the level of said lake. The expense of such survey shall be shared equally between the United States and the tribes occupying this reservation, but the unskilled laborers employed in the work shall be hired from among the Indians residing on this reservation.

Such survey and the marking of the above-described boundary lines shall be begun immediately—not later than ninety days after the approval of this agreement by Congress—and completed as speedily as possible, and the ceded portion of the reservation shall not be thrown open to occupancy by the whites until after the new boundaries of the reservation shall have been established and marked.

ARTICLE VII.

It is further agreed that whenever, in the opinion of the President, the public interests require the construction of railroads or other highways, telegraph or telephone lines, canals and irrigating ditches, through any portion of this reservation, right of way shall be, and is hereby, granted for such purposes, under such rules, regulations, limitations, and restrictions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe; the compensation to be fixed by said Secretary and by him expended for the benefit of the Indians.

ARTICLE VIII.

It is further agreed and provided that none of the money realized from the sale of this land shall be applied to the payment of any judgment which has been or may hereafter be rendered upon any claim for damages because of depredations committed by said Indians prior to the date of this agreement.

ARTICLE IX.

The provisions of Article VI of the agreement between the parties hereto, made February 11, 1887, are hereby continued in full force and effect, as are also all the provisions of said agreement not in conflict with the provisions of this agreement.

ARTICLE X.

It is understood and declared that wherever the word "Indian" is used in this agreement it includes mixed bloods as well as full bloods.

ARTICLE XI.

This agreement shall not be binding upon either party until ratified by Congress.

Dated and signed at Blackfeet Agency, Mont., on the 26th day of September, 1895 (A. D. 1895).

Therefore

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said agreement be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed.

AGREEMENT WITH THE INDIANS OF THE SAN CARLOS INDIAN RESERVATION IN ARIZONA.

SEC. 10. Whereas Province McCormick, United States Indian inspector, did, on the 25th day of February, 1896, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress of March 2, 1895 (28 Statutes at Large, page 894), conclude an agreement with the Indians of the San Carlos Reservation, Ariz., for the cession and relinquishment to the United States of the lands of the reservation embracing the coal fields, which said agreement is in words and figures as follows (House Document No. 320, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session), to wit:

This agreement, made on the 25th day of February, 1896, pursuant to an item in the act of Congress making appropriations for current and contingent expenses and fulfilling treaty stipulations with Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, as follows: "The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to negotiate with the Indians on the San Carlos Reservation, Ariz., through an inspector, for the cession or relinquishment to the United States of the lands embracing the coal fields, and that any agreement made shall be submitted to Congress for its action," by Province McCormick, United States Indian inspector, on the part of the United States, and the Apache, Mohave, and Yuma Indians, residing on the San Carlos Indian Reservation, in the Territory of Arizona, by their chiefs, headmen, and members of said tribes, embracing a majority of all the male adult Indians occupying said reservation, witnesseth:

Any person or association applying to purchase such coal lands shall file with such application a plat and field notes of the land sought to be entered, made by or under the direction of the United States surveyor-general, showing accurately the boundaries of the land claimed, which shall be distinctly marked by monuments on the ground and connected by course and distance with a permanent fixed monument within 2 miles, which monument shall be established as the initial point of all surveys within such distance.

All locations of the character specified in section 6 heretofore made upon said land are hereby validated, but no application for the purchase of any coal or mineral lands shall be received at the local land office prior to the official filing of the plat provided by section 2 of this act.

And to insert:

That upon the filing in the United States local land office for the district in which the lands surrendered by Article I of the foregoing agreement are situated of the approved plat or survey authorized by section 2 of this act, the lands so surrendered shall be open to occupation, location, and purchase under the provisions of the mineral-land laws only, subject to the several articles of the foregoing agreement: Provided, That the terms of this section shall not be construed to authorize occupancy of said lands for mining purposes prior to the date of filing said approved plat of survey: Provided, however, That any person who in good faith prior to the passage of this act had discovered and opened a mine of coal or other mineral shall have a preference right of purchase for ninety days from and after the official filing in the local land office of the approved plat of survey provided for by section 2 of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be very glad if the Senator from South Dakota in charge of the bill will state wherein the provision that he now proposes differs from the existing provision in the bill as printed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The bill as printed provides that the coal and other mineral lands shall be sold and the proceeds held for the benefit of the Indians and paid to them each year. It also provides that the coal lands shall be sold at $5 per acre, which is a reduction of one-half of the price charged under the existing statutes of the United States. The agreement made with those Indians provides that such lands shall be disposed of under the coal and mineral laws of the United States, and that they shall have the proceeds. Therefore we agreed when we made the contract with those Indians that they should have practically not less than $10 an acre for the coal lands, while in ratifying the agreement as passed by the committee they would receive only $5 an acre. It is for the purpose of correcting the error that I offer the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

Mr. ALLISON. I of course do not know precisely what amendment is necessary, but the amendment to the amendment as read at the desk provides with respect to other minerals than coal. The proviso on page 101 reads:

Provided, however, That any person or association qualified as above, who in good faith prior to the passage of this act had discovered and opened a coal mine, etc.

I do not know whether any other minerals have been discovered on those lands.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think not. There is nothing in the notes of the agreement to that effect.

Mr. ALLISON. So the only effect of the change proposed is to make the price of these lands $10 an acre instead of $5.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, sir; to accord with the agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. There was an amendment on page 65 which was passed over.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There are a number of amendments which were passed over.

Mr. PETTIGREW. A number of amendments have been passed over. We will take them up in their order. The first one is on page 28.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report in their order the amendments which have been passed over.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 19, page 28, the committee report to strike out:

Provided, That the sums of money mentioned in this and the preceding paragraph shall be paid to said Indians by an officer designated by the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The next amendment which was passed over is on page 51.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 13, page 51, it is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting:

And a majority of the members of any board or commission to be paid from this appropriation shall be appointed from bona fide residents of the State or Territory in which is located the particular reservation concerning which such board or commission is appointed to negotiate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I am reluctant to take up a question which has been so well worn in discussions before the Senate heretofore, but it does seem to me that the proposition of the Senator from Utah ought not to be adopted. The State from which I come has nothing beyond a general interest in the selection of officers such as those touched by his amendment. So far as my information goes there never has been one of the many Indian agents or Indian treaty commissioners throughout the West appointed from Texas. I have not the slightest expectation that any such will be appointed in future.

I will say further that I have no sort of inclination to widen unduly the bounds of discretion vested in the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or any other executive officer.

I am fully in accord with the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] on the general policy of localizing the appointments to Federal offices so far as practicable, but it seems to me that that rule ought not to be applied where it may prove an obstruction. Home rule is a good rule, but exceptions to it are necessary, and it seems to me this case affords a marked instance of the desirability of exception.

All the States have United States judges, marshals, attorneys, clerks, and commissioners. Hence a general policy of appointing these officers from local applicants works equitably as well as efficiently.

But in the very nature of things, the places at which Federal business is disposed of can not be geographically distributed in fair proportion among the States. There will be more or less concentration in the location of sites upon which to conduct the operations of the Federal Government.

It is a perversion of a good principle to say that because the discharge of the duties of a Federal officer happens to call him within the boundaries of a certain State or Territory the officer shall necessarily be appointed from the people of that State or Territory.

Mr. President, we must not lose sight of reasonable distinctions. When we say that marshals, attorneys, and judges in Maine should be appointed from among the residents of Maine we give to that State a monopoly of those offices, but we counterbalance it by insisting that marshals, attorneys, and judges in Texas shall be appointed from among the citizens of Texas. When you extend the doctrine to offices of a strictly national character, about which no knowledge of State laws or special intercourse with local affairs is needed, you reach, in my opinion, a dangerous ground. The Senators from Kansas might, with equal reason, claim that the superintendent of the national penitentiary at Leavenworth should be appointed from among the citizens of their State, or the Senators from Texas urge that the national-bank examiners in our State should be appointed from the citizens of Texas.

It seems to me that the Senator from Utah ought to admit that his good rule deserves an exception in a case like this. When the question of procuring Indian lands by treaty arises we all know how much local influence and local enterprise become involved in a particular policy and how much such considerations control the final disposition of the matter. The same tendency would exist if the reservation were located in Texas or in any other State. I can not see why a function like that of making a treaty with Indians should be subjected to any special influence of local development.

There is another thing, sir. Whatever one might think of a general policy of local appointments to Federal offices, is it proper that we should act upon different lines in dealing with like reservations and like offices? We should not make fish of Utah and fowl of Montana. We should not force upon a Senator from one State, as for example Washington, one line of policy, and upon a Senator from another State, as for example Texas, another line of policy; but we should endeavor to pursue a consistent policy throughout. At least we might afford to make it consistent through one session of Congress.

Besides all this, Mr. President, I wish to submit to the Senate the question whether in any event it is within the authority of Congress to limit in advance the power of the President in making appointments. Can Congress pass a law to restrict eligibility to Federal offices to the inhabitants of a particular State? Can we, in creating an office, make an arbitrary limitation upon the power of appointment vested in another jurisdiction? It seems to me not. If Congress can provide by law that certain officers shall be appointed from Utah alone, it can also provide that all the Federal officers shall be appointed from the State of Utah. Under the same warrant it would be constitutional to provide that none of the Federal officers shall be appointed from Utah. In that way we could confer upon the citizens of that State an absolute monopoly of all the offices of this Government, or, on the other hand, we could disfranchise them altogether.

While, of course, it is improbable that such extreme cases will occur, yet the question of power is as directly involved here as it would be in those cases. I would rid this question of all partisanship and submit to Senators the proposition that a law which restricts Federal appointments by specified State lines is violative of that deep underlying policy of nationality and equality among the States upon which our Federal Union is founded. I believe such an enactment is clearly contrary to the great principles which evoked our present system from the old Confederation and should be held unconstitutional as in conflict with the organic structure of our Government.

Mr. President, there is no branch of Federal employment which is further removed from the general policy of local appointments than the Indian service. If there is any duty the discharge of which depends less upon local knowledge and local motives than every other, it is the duty of making treaties with the Indians. We all know how piece by piece the Indian lands have passed from the control of the aboriginal owners and how great bands which once roved and claimed a continent have been scattered to fragments and to poverty. I know, sir, that sentimental considerations have been and will be powerless to arrest this fate. Anglo-Saxon civilization tramps on to its destiny over mountains and deserts and even over solemn compacts. Everything yields to the instinct of expansion and the overruling law of self-preservation; but while we can not close our eyes to this great march, if there is any one line which should be guarded by prudence, by disinterestedness, by absolute freedom from local influence, by a broad survey of American national obligations, it is the work of obtaining from the Indians the surrender of their tribal and hereditary homes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, there are three points of objection raised by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] to the proposed amendment. One is that if carried it will put an obstacle in the way of the public service; another, that it is an invasion of the Executive prerogative for Congress to provide the method of selection of commissioners to treat with the Indians; and the third is an appeal in behalf of the downtrodden aboriginal race of the United States.

Instead of being an obstacle, the carrying of the amendment would be the first step toward an execution of the purpose of Congress in this direction. But $15,000 is proposed to be provided for treating with three tribes of Indians, the Uncompahgres, the Uintahs, and those on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation. Unless we shall have a local board or commission to treat with those Indians the $15,000 will not provide the preliminary expenses, if we are to judge by the record of the past. I have in my possession here an abstract of the expenditures made by the commission appointed to treat with the Uncompahgre and Uintah Utes, a commission recently turned loose on furlough. They have spent $16,000. They have not begun treating with the Uintah Utes, and so far as practical results are concerned the Department has done nothing with regard to the treaty which was to have been carried out with the Uncompahgre Indians in the opening of their reservation according to stipulations.

Mr. President, it is a long way from the Eastern part of this country to the West. Men here know very little about the condition prevailing there, as is evidenced by the report of the gentlemen who went out to treat with the Uncompahgre Utes. Their statement of expenditures shows that they spent nearly $4,000 before they were able to perform the first day of labor under the commission which they received from the President of the United States. I will guarantee, sir, that if a local board had been appointed no such extravagant misuse of the public money would have been permitted or attempted. The whole of the $15,000 now proposed will be insufficient, and grossly insufficient, if we shall have a continuation of the rule which prevails in the Interior Department at the present time in the selection of men who know nothing about the conditions which they are to confront.

Mr. President, concerning the second point, that this will be an invasion of Executive right: In the section of this very bill directly preceding the matter now under consideration is a clause which requires that the President in appointing a commission shall not appoint more than two members from a certain political party. Is it any less of a distress upon Presidential prerogative to define the political lines within which he shall make his selection than to define the geographical lines? It seems to me that people residing within States where certain large interests exist, upon the development of which much of the community's progress may depend, have quite as much right as the adherents of political parties to petty spoils and patronage. I did not hear anyone raise an objection from the other side of the Chamber upon this particular point of the proposition. The only one who objected to it was the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. He objected to that clause of the preceding section, but the Senator from Texas did not notice apparently that it was an invasion of Presidential right or prerogative.

Mr. President, so far as the rights of the Indians in the Rocky Mountain region are concerned, I believe they will best be maintained by having commissions appointed from men who have dwelt near the Indians, who have had some fraternity with them. In Utah we have had a motto for many years, "It is better to feed the Indians than to fight them." We have taught them the arts of peace. There has been no attempt on the part of the residents of that State to take from any Indian that which was his right by inheritance. On the contrary, we have spread the knowledge of irrigation among them. The best farmers in the Indian communities of the United States are those who dwell in the State of Utah, and they have obtained that knowledge by the charitable consideration of men not appointed by the Government, but from members of the communities who have volunteered to go among the Indians and labor, that some remnant of the mighty race which once inhabited this continent may preserve its identity to future generations.

There is nothing political or personal in the proposition of this amendment. On the contrary, I care not whether all three of the men to be appointed on the commission to serve in Utah shall belong to one political party or the other. I care nothing as to the individuality of the men so long as they be competent; but I do object to having a question of such magnitude as this juggled with; I do object, sir, to having the Congress of the United States make appropriations year after year, to be frittered away in the accomplishment of no possible public good.

The very reason which the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] asserted why these places should be at the disposal of the citizens of the United States is the reason why I think they should not be. People are hunting for place. We see away off 2,500 miles from the community in which we live some possible position procurable through political influence, and we say, "This will be for us." A man is appointed to the position. He wants to hold it just as long as he can. He cares nothing whatever for the distress imposed on the local interest by his lack of action. He cares nothing for the local sentiment so long as he can draw the salary of that position, and he will hold it just as long as he can. Whenever any local protest goes up to the appointing power he will reply that it is simply the attempt of some monopoly to seize improperly and unwisely and nefariously the rights of Indians; whereas if the officers are appointed from local people they are controlled by local sentiment, and they will attempt to carry out the law.

I think the amendment ought to carry in the interest of the public service and in the interest of the economy which we all ought to serve in this Chamber.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I wish to make one suggestion. The Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] calls attention to a provision in the appropriation bill which precedes the amendment he offers. This provision is to the effect that in the appointment of one of the Indian commissions no more than two of the members shall be from the same political party. Individually, I have always doubted the constitutionality of a limitation of that sort. But I wish to call attention to a distinction between that clause and the one now under consideration.

The theory upon which our Constitution was founded was that of nationality. The Constitution contains a clause that Senators and Representatives shall reside in the States from which they are chosen. But when you go beyond that and attempt to make eligible to other offices citizens of particular States only, you are, in my judgment, trenching upon the essential principle that pervades our Constitution—the principle of nationality in the powers clearly granted to the Federal Government.

It does seem to me, sir, as I said a moment ago, that if we can provide by law that these officers shall come from Utah, we can go further and provide that all the statutory officers shall come from particular States. Have you not then reached the very point which the framers of the Constitution intended to guard against when they established it upon a national basis?

The Senator from Utah speaks of the friendliness to the Indians on the part of those who live around them. I know nothing of the citizenship of Utah particularly, but the history of this Government is full of instances where those who stood neighbors to Indian reservations have looked upon them with envious eyes. You have only to turn back in our history to the case of Georgia, where there was almost civil war, almost armed conflict between Governor Troup, acting for the Georgia people, and the forces of the United States, about the reservation of the Cherokees and other Indian tribes in that State. That has been the history of such proximity from the beginning of our Government down to this time.

I can not believe that gentlemen who live in daily contact with Indians will give the same considerate, patient attention to those matters as do men who are sent from other States. Of course I have no disposition to exclude the people of Utah, but my idea is that we ought not to attempt to put limitations upon Executive discretion in this respect; that it is unwise; that it will return to plague us. Whatever an individual Senator might do, if called to vote on the confirmation of an officer, as a matter of policy addressing itself to him, when it comes to forcing our notion upon the Executive by limiting his power of appointment I submit that we are transcending the proper limitations of Congressional authority, and it ought not to be done.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, if this brief debate shall have resulted in bringing the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] to that splendid comprehension of nationality as against the rights of the States and the sovereignty of the States which he has seemed to indicate, I shall feel that I did not raise the point in vain. I love to hear expressions from either side of the Chamber in behalf of having no lines between the people of the United States. I think, however, that we have shown on this particular occasion a devoted attention to the national spirit which might better be given to it when some broad national question is under consideration. I should like to hear such declarations from the other side of the Chamber on an occasion of that kind.

Mr. President, if the treatment of the Indians by the United States has been such as to drive the Indians as far from civilization, as far from their rights, as the Senator from Texas describes, it is time that there should be some local influence at work to preserve that which is left to them. I regard the treatment of the Indians of this country by the Government of the United States as that of dishonor and cruelty; and one of the blackest chapters of all our history will be that which records the manner in which we have invaded the rights of the aboriginal races, the manner in which we have seized that which their God gave to them. In this particular matter I desire to see the rights of the Indians preserved, and I believe that the people who dwell in the States where the tribes are located will do better justice than the Administration now in power, will do better justice more generously by and more considerately for the Indians than the Interior Department, especially under the management of the gentleman who now controls its destinies.

The one thing which corrupted the Indians of the West is going on now. They are held upon their reservations, with vast tracts of land which excite the cupidity of men from all sections of the United States, and steadily, without coming into immediate intellectual contact with the Anglo-Saxon race to be taught the arts by which they can be preserved, they are being corrupted physically and mentally. If we can have a separation of their lands, if we can have allotments in severalty, if the Indians can learn methods of irrigation and other arts necessary to be practiced for the preservation of their community life in the West, they will be saved as a people. But if we shall go on in the manner now practiced by the Interior Department there will not be any Indians left in any one of the three reservations now under consideration to insure the perpetuity of the race.

Mr. PALMER. May I ask the Senator from Utah in what respect the present management of the Interior Department is defective? What particular objection can he point out? Is it because citizens of other States are sent to those reservations as agents? What is there in the present management that differs from the past?

Mr. GRAY. It is Democratic and not Republican.

Mr. CANNON. It would be much easier to tell wherein the present administration of the Interior Department is not defective than to go through a long recital of mistakes, obstinate mistakes, willful mistakes, perpetrated by the gentleman who now stands at the head of that Department. I shall confine myself to one particular instance, sir—the treatment of the land and Indian questions of the West.

Congress passed an act by which the Indian reservation known as the Uncompahgre could have been thrown open to settlement and ownership by the people of the United States without taking from the Indians one scintilla of their rights. By treaty obligation it was provided that when the Government should choose to do so it might allot the lands in severalty, and all not so allotted or not selected should become public domain, to be settled upon by the citizens of this country. The Secretary of the Interior appointed a commission to go and treat with the Uncompahgre Utes, backed by an appropriation of $16,000 for that purpose. It is a fair charge that when the Secretary of the Interior sent that commission into Utah he gave to them oral instructions not to carry out the law.

It is a fair charge to make for the simple reason that that commission, had it been instructed by the Interior Department to carry out the law, certainly would have done something in that direction.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Utah allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. It may be something more than a question. That charge the Senator says is a fair charge. Is it a true charge? Has the Senator any proof of its truth?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know the difference between a fair charge and a true charge. If a charge be not true, certainly it is not fair. As to whether I have proof or not, the records are full of proof of special instruction given to the commission for a special purpose. That commission never was expected to carry out the law, and the correspondence had between the members of the commission and the Interior Department afford ample proof of it. The commission could have allotted the lands in severalty within the Uncompahgre Reservation in less than three months' time. It was delayed month after month, pending which time the Secretary of the Interior sent his communication to Congress stating that he did not favor having the lands allotted in that way. What further evidence does the Senator from Illinois want of the truth of the charge, when the work of that commission was delayed at the expense of the Government month after month, passing over a period of fifteen months, when the whole work could have been done at the outside within three months, pending which time the Secretary of the Interior sends a communication to Congress that this is a method which he does not propose to follow and does not think ought to be followed in the disposition of these lands? I say that the charge is a fair one, that the commission had special instructions.

Mr. President, it was notorious in the vicinity of the reservation that it would not be opened by the work of this particular commission. Some few words from one member after another of the commission leaked out until men dwelling in that locality were prone to say, "The reservation will not be opened." That prediction was absolutely fulfilled. The Secretary, before the work of the commission had been anywhere near concluded, sent his communication to Congress by which he proposed in effect to say that some other method must be adopted, or else the law would not be carried out.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I think I can see how the interests of the white people who desire to enter and occupy these lands were in some measure affected, but the Senator from Utah has not yet told me how the interests of the Indians were unfavorably affected.

I am not entirely familiar with the history of the administration of Indian affairs by the Interior Department. I know the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I know that he is a citizen of Illinois of the highest possible character, integrity, and competency. He was the judge of one of our courts for a number of years. It will be a surprise to the people of Illinois who know him to hear that he has been used as an instrument of wrong, willful wrong, as the Senator from Utah characterizes the conduct of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. President, it is quite the habit, not of Senators exclusively, but of those who criticise the acts of executive officers, to deal in generalities. Such generalities are accepted as good change in the ordinary political market, but to those who have responsibilities they ought not to be regarded as furnishing evidence. I do not know as to the particular communication to which the Senator from Utah refers. I have not seen it. I am not a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, nor am I interested particularly in the administration of Indian affairs, but the charge made by the Senator from Utah of a willful disregard of duty on the part of the Secretary of the Interior deserves something more, in my judgment, if it is to be made the basis of action, than the mere general form in which the charge is made. Perhaps the practice of the law has made me somewhat skeptical of what is termed secondary evidence. The Senator hints that it was quite understood the lands were not to be allotted; that something leaked out which satisfied the people interested. I suppose he refers to the adjacent white people, for whatever may be said of the people of the West, whatever may be said of people anywhere, they have been eagerly desirous of lands occupied by the Indians from the beginning; from the time the Pilgrim Fathers landed upon the rock and my own immediate ancestors landed in Virginia. This desire for Indian lands is one which has always characterized the white people, and I distrust these claims on the part of the immediate neighbors of Indian reservations; I distrust their impartiality.

I confess that I would prefer that a citizen should be selected who is not interested, one who simply desires the welfare of the Indians and the proper administration of his office, that he should be selected wherever he may be found, and that he should be sent to these reservations as an impartial person having no other desire than to serve the Indians and to do right. I prefer that sort of nursing fatherhood to the tender mercies of those who are around the Indians and desire to make profit out of their condition. I say nothing against the citizens of Utah. I presume they are as good people as there are in the world; but I have no doubt that they are now hungering and thirsting for the valuable lands that belong to these Indians. I see by the newspapers that whenever a reservation is opened there are thousands of people camping around ready and eager to be in that happy class called "sooners" in the occupation of Indian lands. I say I have no doubt about the excellence of the inhabitants of the State in which the Senator lives, but I must confess that I have more faith in the impartiality of some disinterested, capable, honest man, such as can be found in this country, who neither desires the lands, who has no feeling about it, but simply regards the remnants of that race as objects of sympathy and care, and who seeks to protect them in their unhappy situation. Their situation is unhappy. That they are going the pathway of the deer and the buffalo and all the aborigines, both animal and human, is a very fair proposition.

I confess to the Senator that conceding all he claims, that it is a matter of interest to those who reside near these reservations, I would prefer that the authority of the Government should not be limited; that it may go where it can find proper men, and appoint them and send them there. It is a national duty; it is not a local duty. Its responsibility rests upon us all. We all owe a debt, perhaps a debt of humiliation and shame, for our conduct toward the Indians, and a larger debt, I think, to Almighty God for the sins we have committed upon that race. How that debt ever will be satisfied I confess I do not know. My friend on my right [Mr. MILLS] suggests that we should go into bankruptcy. Yes, bankruptcy crimes can not well be atoned for.

But I desire to protest against these severe criticisms, these charges of a willful wrong; that is, that the Secretary of the Interior meant to do wrong and did not intend to do right; that he tried to do wrong and did not try to do right; that he was eager to do wrong and was unwilling to do right. It is the imputation of an official crime which the Senator from Utah has made against the Secretary of the Interior. I am willing to concede that there may be mistakes in judgment. The Secretary of the Interior may not be wise. I understand, indeed, he is not very wise, because I remember the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] said a few days ago that he is down in Georgia making speeches that are actually converting men to the other way of thinking. He may not be wise, but still I am not willing to sit by and listen to these charges of a willful disregard of his duty in the absence of something which ought to be sufficient according to the rules of criminal justice. There ought to be evidence at least strongly probable. I do not insist that there should be proof beyond reasonable doubt. I have no particular reason for defending the Secretary of the Interior, except my desire that the administration of the public affairs shall be proper and that those who are called upon to administer them shall be treated at least with ordinary fairness.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] did not construe any remark of mine as a reflection upon the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Commissioner of the General Land Office. In this Sahara desert of official incompetency at the Interior Department there have been two very bright green spots for Western men, and they have been the offices of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. So far as I know, there is no complaint to find with either one of these gentlemen; and had the advice which I think the official correspondence shows that they have given on the subject been followed, we would not be here making such charges as to lead the Senator from Illinois to suppose that we imagine the Secretary of the Interior to be eager to commit crime. I do not care whether he is eager or whether he does it reluctantly. He does it with a great avidity; I am certain of that. He does it constantly on the two great questions which affect the West, the treatment of the Indian reservations and the treatment of the public-land question there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to raise the question whether the amendment is in order or not. I wish to submit it to the Chair without further debate before we come to the main question. Is it not general legislation? I make that point. The appropriation bill does not provide for any commissioners, I understand; it does not provide for any board; but here comes an amendment providing that when a board or a commission is appointed there shall be a majority of the board or commission appointed from the State or Territory in which the reservation is located. I submit that that is general legislation. It affects all the people of this country. It is an exclusion; it is a disfranchisement of the people of 44 States of the Union, and it does seem to me, while the term "general legislation" is one very vague and indefinite, that this is legislation of a description so far-reaching and comprehensive that it comes properly within the inhibition of our rules in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. GRAY. Can not the amendment be read? I do not think many have heard it.

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be read before the Chair rules on the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee, to which the amendment of the Senator from Utah is proposed, will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 51, beginning at line 1, the committee report to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Uncompahgre tribe of Indians, and with the Indians residing upon the Uintah Reservation, in the State of Utah, and with the Indians residing upon the Fort Hall Reservation, in the State of Idaho, and, in his discretion, with any other Indians, for the surrender of any portions of their respective reservations, or for such modification of existing treaties and agreements as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, $15,000; and all agreements made for the purchase of the unallotted lands in any Indian reservation shall provide a fund for the payment of taxes upon inalienable allotments, but no agreement made shall take effect until ratified by Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] to the amendment of the committee will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the committee amendment, line 13, page 51, insert:

And a majority of the members of any board or commission to be paid from this appropriation shall be appointed from bona fide residents of the State or Territory in which is located the particular reservation concerning which such board or commission is appointed to negotiate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside that the consideration of the appropriation bill may be continued. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] to the amendment of the committee, upon which the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] has made a point of order. The Chair will hear debate upon the point of order.

Mr. GRAY. I was going to ask whether the Chair had decided the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear debate upon the point of order if any Senator desires to be heard. The Chair was about to rule upon the point of order when a request was made that the amendment be read.

Mr. CHILTON. Now, I want to make an additional point of order. It is that the amendment itself proposed by the committee is general legislation. I make that point of order upon the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule upon the first point of order that it is——

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. The amendment of the committee, I believe, proposes to create a commission or some agency to be appointed to negotiate with certain Indians. If that be true, as I think it is, the appointing power could select that agency from any part of the United States. If the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment shall be agreed to the appointing power has not the same breadth of discretion in his selection. In other words, under the law as it exists he has the broad field of the entire Union within which to select. If the amendment to the amendment shall be agreed to, the general law as it exists is changed by limiting the jurisdiction of the territory within which he can make the selection. It seems to me it is legislation, and that sort of legislation which falls within the rule that prohibits general legislation upon a general appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does any other Senator desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. GRAY. I should rather be heard upon the second point of order. I shall wait until that point comes before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment to the amendment is in order. The original amendment, if it is in order, proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to enter into certain negotiations with Indian tribes to accomplish certain results. The Chair holds that as incidental to that purpose it is in order to impose any limitation or restriction which Congress may choose to impose upon the Secretary of the Interior. If the original amendment is in order it is the opinion of the Chair that the limitation and condition which is proposed by the Senator from Utah is also germane and in order.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the amendment of the committee be read again. I do not understand the amendment as the Chair stated it.

The Secretary again read the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations embraced between lines 1 and 13, inclusive, on page 51.

Mr. HARRIS. Now let the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah to the amendment be read.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled that the amendment to the amendment is in order. The Senator from Texas raises the further point that the original amendment is not in order.

Mr. GRAY. Being general legislation.

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. Coming within the third section of the sixteenth rule, if the Senator from Texas will pardon me, which reads as follows:

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received.

Upon the ground that it is general legislation, I presume.

Mr. SHOUP. Mr. President, I wish the attention of the Senate for a few minutes in explanation of the necessity of this appropriation. I do not regard it as general legislation. In 1880, as I remember it—the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] will correct me if that is not the date—a treaty was made with the Uncompahgre Indians then residing in the State of Colorado. The treaty was confirmed by Congress. Congress supposed at the time that the treaty wholly enabled the Secretary of the Interior to give these Indians their allotments without further legislation. They were to have taken lands on the Grand River in the State of Colorado if a sufficient quantity of land could be found in that vicinity or on that river. It was ascertained that there was a sufficient quantity of land. They were then put on a temporary reservation in the Territory of Utah by Executive proclamation.

Secretaries of the Interior one after the other have thought that the law was insufficient to authorize them to parcel out the land in allotments to the Indians without further legislation. Two years ago Congress enacted a law authorizing the appointment of a commission, making an appropriation of $16,000, I believe, for the purpose of placing these Indians on their lands and segregating the balance of the reservation for public entry. The same Congress provided that the same commission should negotiate with the Uintah Indians in Utah. The commission was appointed. The commission exists to-day. It was appointed to carry out these provisions of law. This is not new legislation. It is to carry out the provisions of a law now on the statute books.

As to the Fort Hall Reservation in Idaho, the Government has made a contract for the construction of a canal at a cost of $90,000. That canal is well under way. Water will be on that reservation under the conditions of the contract on the 1st day of June of this year. While water will be on the reservation, there is no provision made to place the Indians on their allotments. Hence the water can not be utilized unless this amendment is incorporated in the bill. It merely enables the Secretary of the Interior to go on and carry out the provisions of the law now on our statute books.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator who has just addressed the Senate, and I should like to have the attention of the Chair also to the inquiry, because it is pertinent to the ruling that is asked for. Beginning in the tenth line of the amendment of the committee, it reads:

> And all agreements made for the purchase of the unallotted lands in any Indian reservation shall provide a fund for the payment of taxes upon inalienable allotments, but no agreement made shall take effect until ratified by Congress.

Now, does not that not merely limit the authority for the negotiations previously mentioned in the paragraph, but make a general law applicable to all authority given formerly or to be given hereafter for the purchase of Indian land and limit the agreement so that it shall not take effect until a ratification by Congress? It seems to me that that provision very clearly goes beyond directing how the previous appropriation is to be applied and establishes a general rule for all cases, and therefore it is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to be informed whether the $15,000 appropriated by this clause has been estimated for or is in order as an appropriation?

Mr. SHOUP. It was estimated for by the Interior Department. The estimates were sent in with the other estimates to the House committee, but for reasons that I can not explain in full the provision was not incorporated in the bill. The amount named is the original estimate made by the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to see the estimate.

Mr. FAULKNER. I think this is an important amendment, and I should like very much to see it placed in the bill for the reason suggested by the Senator from Idaho; but when we read the amendment and take into consideration his remarks, it will be seen at once that it is general legislation. It does not cover simply the question that he refers to, but under the amendment the Secretary of the Interior is not only authorized not to confine the commission that is to be appointed to the carrying out of the contracts and the agreements and the treaties heretofore made with this particular band of Indians, but he is, in his discretion, authorized to make the treaty with any other Indians on reservations who have not had allotments made to them.

Mr. SHOUP. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. SHOUP. I wish to say that the provision to which the Senator has just now alluded, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make these negotiations, has been incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill for a number of years.

Mr. FAULKNER. If that be true, and there is not already a provision of law authorizing him to extend this investigation and these negotiations to other Indians, of course, then, this would be new and general legislation. You can not avoid that conclusion.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, one word on the subject of the amendment being general legislation. It can not be general legislation to provide a fund for the purpose of making a treaty with any particular tribe of Indians, and, in doing that, to authorize a treaty to be made. Now, as the general provision here authorizes a treaty to be made, it is a proper limitation upon it to say what shall be put into the treaty, and to provide the proper protection to the Indians who accept the allotment. This is a general provision merely, that in the treaty with several tribes of Indians the taxes of those who hold their land in severalty shall be provided for. It seems to me an entirely proper limitation.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Utah how he construes lines 10 and 11, which read, "and all agreements made for the purchase of the unallotted lands in any Indian reservation shall provide a fund," etc.? Does not that come under the general rule?

Mr. BROWN. I should not so construe it. I should construe it in reference to the particular reservation we have in charge.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator that the difficulty might be remedied by putting in after the words "and all agreements" the words "under the authority herein given," or something of that kind.

Mr. BROWN. I think it might be; but it is not subject to the point of order. I am simply speaking of that limitation of the agreement, and also the limitation suggested by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER].

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, my suggestion was that, as it stands, it seems to me rather a question of order. To make a general rule for all cases under authority heretofore given or hereafter to be given is general legislation, but if it had read, as the Senator seems to have in mind, "all agreements made under authority given by this act," then it would be a special limitation on the authority of the Secretary of the Interior and not subject to the point of order.

Mr. BROWN. I have already replied, and I repeat to the Senator from Massachusetts, that as it now reads, although the words "any other Indians" are used, the language must be construed with reference to the subject-matter of this treaty. It can not be held to apply to other statutes and other treaties, and this is a treaty with the three particular tribes named. The agreement would refer to this treaty without any such clause, although I think it appropriate to make it more definite by naming them again.

As to the phrase to which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] has called attention, "with any other Indians," the objection has not been made to that, but I think it ought to be. That clause should be stricken out, because we are only dealing with the particular tribes named in the clause—the Uncompahgre, the Uintah, and the Indians on the Fort Hall Reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will direct the Secretary to read from the House of Representatives Document No. 248, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 17, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior of the 15th instant, submitting an estimate of appropriation ($5,000) to enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Uncompahgre tribe of Indians and with the Indians residing upon the Uintah Reservation, in the State of Utah, for modification of treaties.

Respectfully, yours, S. WIKE, Acting Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Draft of item proposed to be inserted in the Indian appropriation bill.

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Uncompahgre tribe of Indians, and with the Indians residing upon the Uintah Reservation, in the State of Utah, for such modification of existing treaties and agreements with said Indians, and such change in their reservations as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, the same to be immediately available; but no agreement made shall take effect until ratified by Congress.

Mr. FAULKNER. It seems to me that the amendment embraces a good deal more than is contained in the estimate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. SHOUP. Mr. President, when I stated that $15,000 was the amount estimated by the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I had not examined the reports, but I stated it on the authority of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that, so far as the first part of the amendment is concerned, it would be in order if the appropriation were in order. The estimate which has been called to the attention of the Chair was for $5,000 for negotiations with the Indians of the Uncompahgre tribe and the Indians residing upon the Uintah Reservation. The appropriation has been changed so as to include the Indians residing upon the Fort Hall Reservation, in the State of Idaho, and any other Indians; and the amount has been increased from $5,000 to $15,000. Unless there has been some estimate made beyond that submitted to the Chair, the Chair is of opinion that so much of the amendment as increases the appropriation from $5,000 to $15,000, and so much as includes the Indians residing on the Fort Hall Reservation and any other Indians, is out of order.

The Chair is also of opinion that the last clause of the amendment is general legislation, unless the language be so modified as to confine the provision to a fund for the payment of taxes to the Indians upon the reservations specified in the first part of the clause.

Mr. FAULKNER. Do I understand the Chair to decide that he can segregate such amendments as he deems proper to come within the rule? The amendment is offered by the committee as a whole amendment, and certainly it must be taken by the Chair as a whole and decided either to be in order or to be not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is pleased to recognize the point as well made by the Senator from West Virginia, and under the circumstances is obliged to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, before so ruling I should like very much to call the attention of the Chair to the estimates of the appropriation from the Treasury Department, which, under the head of "Indian affairs," on page 162, contain the following clause:

Negotiating with Indian tribes: To enable the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to negotiate with any Indians for the surrender of any portion of their respective reservations, or for such modification of existing treaties as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, any agreement thus negotiated being subject to subsequent ratification by Congress, $15,000.

So it appears that the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP] that this was the estimate is correct. There does not appear anywhere else in this bill, I think—the Senator in charge of the bill will correct me if I am in error—any other clause of similar character; and the enumeration of the three reservations, the Uncompahgre, the Uintah, and Fort Hall, do not change in any way the general proposition of this clause, which is in accordance with the estimate furnished by the Treasury Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator send the estimate to the desk?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to this suggestion: Suppose what the Senator from Utah says be correct—and I have no doubt it is—still a general estimate to negotiate with all Indian tribes can not support a particular amendment confining that negotiation to three or four tribes. Suppose the Secretary of the Navy had sent in an estimate for the support of the Navy of $500,000 or $5,000,000 a year. That would not support a particular appropriation of $5,000,000 a year to one special purpose.

I understand that there is nobody who objects to the amendment of the committee, but the objection is to putting on, what is regarded by several Senators as bad policy, of limiting the appointing power to citizens of some particular State. If that provision had not been contained in the clause the point of order would not have been made on the other provisions. If the Senators should be willing to forego that little thing, which they can not regard as very important, and be content with the rest of the clause, I think the point of order would be withdrawn, and the amendment would be adopted.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the difficulty arises from the fact that the estimate read by the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] is a general estimate for Indian treaties. Then there was a special estimate sent in by the Secretary of the Treasury for specific negotiations.

Mr. HOAR. Of $5,000 more.

Mr. ALLISON. Of $5,000 more, making $20,000 in all. This amendment was prepared, I believe, by the Committee on Indian Affairs, consolidating these two estimates and reducing them, making the appropriation $15,000 in all. So it seems to me, taking into view the two estimates, one special estimate and the other found in the Book of Estimates, that there is fair reason to suppose that this amendment is within the purview of the estimates of the Department.

Mr. CANNON. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the language of the amendment, which says, "and, in his discretion, with any other Indians," which would make it general. I was not quoting from the Book of Estimates in defense of any proposition of my own, but rather to correct a mistake concerning the attitude of the Senator from Idaho.

If it be necessary to withdraw this amendment in order that this clause may not fail, which I understand to be quite important to some of our neighbors, I should be inclined to do it; but in that case we fail of what I think is very much more important than the mere expenditure of the money this year on Indian reservations, and that is the proper and economical execution of the law. With that in view I can not consent, notwithstanding the request, to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the point of order insisted upon?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The subject is not without difficulty. The Chair ruled before with knowledge of only one of these estimates. The members of the Committee on Appropriations were most of them absent from the Chamber at the time the point was raised. The question is somewhat doubtful. Undoubtedly it would be in order to move the amendment precisely as it is estimated for in the Book of Estimates. The difficulty is that an amendment has been made up by combining two or three estimates in one, to some extent enlarging the scope of the estimates, and then annexing a provision of general legislation at the close. Undoubtedly an amendment might be drawn which the present occupant of the chair would hold to be in order; but not finding an estimate sufficiently corresponding, in the opinion of the Chair, to this clause, the Chair adheres to the ruling, that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. WILSON. Do I understand that the bill is now open to amendment, or are there further committee amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is considering various reserved amendments in their order.

Mr. WILSON. On that very point I desire to offer an amendment, if it be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will be in order after the reserved amendments have been considered. The next reserved amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next reserved amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is, on page 56, after line 3, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the following persons, and not to their assignees, immediately upon the passage of this act, out of the balance remaining of the 35 per cent reserved for payment of legal services rendered and expenses incurred, under contracts entered into by the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians, through their authorized commissioners, in the prosecution of their claim, appropriated for by act of Congress approved August 23, 1894 (28 Stat. L., page 451), entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes," namely.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have that amendment passed over for the present. I think there are some Senators now absent who wish to be heard on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over, and the next reserved amendment will be stated.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The next amendment is on page 61, in reference to the Carlisle School.

Mr. TELLER. I did not understand, and I wish to understand, just what the Chair held in regard to the amendment on page 51. Did the Chair rule it out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ruled the whole amendment out of order.

Mr. TELLER. I give notice that I shall move an amendment to take the place of that at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggested that an amendment might be drawn, based upon the various estimates, that would be in order in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was an amendment on page 57, which has not been disposed of, which was passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been passed over at the request of the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator, then, does not wish to take that up now?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not just now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next reserved amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next reserved amendment is on page 62, line 4, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one" and insert "four"; so as to make the clause read:

For support of Indian industrial school at Carlisle, Pa., at not exceeding $167 for each pupil; and for transportation of pupils to and from said school, and for general repairs and improvements, $100,000; for additional to the salary of any military officer of Carlisle Indian School while acting as superintendent of said school, $1,000; in all, $101,000.

Mr. ALLISON. At that point I wish, with the consent of the Senator in charge of the bill, to insert after the word "hundred," in line 1, page 62, the words "and ten," and after the word "thousand" to insert "six hundred."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "hundred," in line 1, on page 62, it is proposed to insert "and ten," and after the word "thousand," in the same line, to insert "six hundred"; so as to read "$110,600."

Mr. ALLISON. I will state that that amendment is in exact accordance with the estimate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move, in the same clause, line 4, on page 62, to strike out the words "one hundred and four thousand" and insert "one hundred and eleven thousand six hundred"; so as to make the total "$111,600."

The amendment was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5210) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. PETTIGREW, and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. MILLS. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. ALLISON. I had hoped that we should have a session to-morrow so as to progress with the appropriation bills, as their passage is imperative and their consideration will necessarily require considerable attention and debate. We have already had notice that Monday is to be occupied in the discussion of the Du Pont case, so that it will probably be impossible to take up an appropriation bill on that day, or, if at all, at a very late hour. Another notice has been given for Tuesday, which will occupy an hour or two of the time of the Senate on that day. It seems to me, therefore, if we are to make progress with the appropriation bills, we should either proceed with them or with other business on Saturdays. I do not know whether it is the wish of the Senate to make progress with these bills or not. I do not, however, desire to stand in the way of the evident judgment of the Senate as to adjourning over to-morrow. I know there are some committees which have work to do which is necessary to facilitate the business of the Senate; but I want to give notice that for one I shall insist upon the whole of next week being occupied with the appropriation bills, to the exclusion of other matters, except those which have been already noted.

Mr. MILLS. I simply wish to say that every Senator knows that we have other business to attend to here besides our legitimate legislative business, that we have Department business, and I for one wish to-morrow to attend to that business, and I think some others do. I am, however, perfectly willing to let the Senate determine the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate has been proceeding by unanimous consent. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the joint resolution (S. R. 116) authorizing the Public Printer to print the Annual Report of the Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in quarto form and to bind it in one volume contains an error in referring to section 75 of chapter 23 of the printing act of January 12, 1895. I ask that a message be sent to the President requesting the recall of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Maine, that the President of the United States be asked to return to the Senate the joint resolution named? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. HALE subsequently said: I find that the request I made a little while ago in reference to the recall of a joint resolution providing for the printing of the report of the Coast and Geodetic Survey needs to be in the form of a concurrent resolution. I now offer such a resolution, to which, I think, there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 116) "authorizing the Public Printer to print the Annual Report of the Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in quarto form and to bind it in one volume," for the purpose of correcting errors in the text.

Mr. HOAR. I do not rise to object to the resolution of the Senator from Maine. My impression is very strong, however, that it does not require a concurrent resolution, but that the body which sent the resolution to the President may ask him to return it without the assent of the other body. There might be many cases where one body wanted to correct a mistake of its own where the other branch would not want to have it corrected. It does not do any harm to have it a concurrent resolution in this instance; but I merely wish, for the sake of future precedent, to enter my caveat.

Mr. HALE. I had that impression when I asked before that the Senate should send a message to the President asking for the return of the joint resolution, but I am informed at the desk that the practice has been the other way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

SEACOAST DEFENSES.

Mr. SQUIRE. I give notice that on Tuesday, the 14th instant, I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses for the purpose of submitting some remarks to the Senate thereon. I do so in view of the fact that we shall have before us in the near future the bill for the support of the Navy. I desire to make some remarks also with reference to the provisions of that bill, but more especially to call up the bill which was reported by the committee of which I am chairman, so as to make my remarks particularly applicable to that measure.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6249) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The next reserved amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next reserved amendment is, at the top of page 65, to strike out:

For support and education of 120 Indian pupils at the school at Hampton, Va., $20,040.

For support and education of 200 Indian pupils at Lincoln Institution, Philadelphia, Pa., at $167 per annum each, $33,400.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think we had better take up the entire school question at one time. It will all have to be discussed together.

If a certain amendment were placed in the bill with regard to sectarian schools, to come in a few pages before this amendment, I should then vote to disagree to the committee amendment as to the Hampton and Lincoln schools. As the bill now stands, there are no schools provided for but those which are strictly Government schools. Those two were stricken out by the committee because they were the only ones left which were not strictly Government schools.

The bill as it stands abandons absolutely the practice of contracting for the education of Indians. Therefore, this whole question will come up for discussion upon these two amendments. I think it proper, in view of the fact that an amendment will be offered on page 59 with relation to sectarian schools, that that amendment be considered now in connection with these two amendments. With the consent of the Senate, we shall now so proceed.

Mr. GRAY. Is the amendment to which the Senator refers in print?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It has been printed, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] will offer it.

Mr. CARTER. I move to strike out all after the word "Alaska," in line 20, on page 58, to and including the word "schools," in line 3, on page 59, and in lieu thereof to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 20, on page 58, after the word "Alaska," it is proposed to strike out:

And it is hereby declared that it is the intention of this act that no money herein appropriated shall be paid for education in sectarian schools, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby charged with the duty of so using and administering said appropriation as to carry out said object, and he is hereby authorized and required to make all needful rules and regulations necessary to prevent the use of any part of said fund for education in sectarian schools.

And insert:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make contracts with present contract schools for the education of Indian pupils during the fiscal year 1897, but shall only make such contracts at places where Government schools of adequate capacity can not be provided for such Indian children and to an amount not exceeding 60 per cent of the amount so used for the fiscal year 1895; and it is hereby declared to be the settled policy of the Government to make no appropriation whatever for the education of Indian children in any other than National Government schools as soon as it is possible for provision to be made for their education in such schools, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make such provision at the earliest practicable day, not later than July 1, 1899.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the question involved in this amendment is one of more than passing importance. The Indian tribes of the United States assumed a different relation to the Government, or the Government assumed a different relation to the tribes, after the close of the civil war. In 1870, under what became generally known as the "peace policy" of General Grant, a system of general education was attempted in connection with the work of Indian civilization. Thereafter the work of reducing Indian reservations from year to year to smaller compass progressed steadily, agencies were established upon reservations of certain definite and prescribed limits, army posts were established in the Indian country with a view to keeping the Indians within the limits of the reservations. It being manifest that the work of herding the Indians with the Army and confining them in idleness upon reservations would be interminable and fruitless unless accompanied by some process which would lead to their civilization, the General Government in 1870 issued an invitation to the Christian people of the country to cooperate with the Government in this work which seemed so important and so nearly allied to the plain demands of humanity. The invitation did not go out to the representatives of Mohammedan civilization, nor did the invitation extend to those who believe in the peculiar form of worship prevalent throughout India. It proceeded from the Executive of the nation in various ways to the people who believed in the methods of Christian civilization, without reference to church or creed. So nicely, so cordially, so handsomely, did the Christian spirit of the nation respond, that in 1873 the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in his annual report to the Secretary of the Interior used this language:

The question of the civilization of Indians reduced to its last analysis is twofold: First, whether the Government is willing to make sufficient appropriation to teach barbarous men how to live in a civilized way; and second, whether the expenditure of such an appropriation can be fairly made through the administration of persons fitted to become their teachers. Without suitable provision for the necessary expenditures, the best efforts of the best men will be comparatively futile; and with the most abundant provision that the resources of the nation can make, nothing will be accomplished worthy of the effort unless there can be found persons ready and fitted to go to these Indians, in the spirit of kindness and Christian love, with a faith in God, and a faith in man strong enough to sustain them amidst the degradation and perversities of barbarism, and cheer them on in the full conviction that no being made in God's image is incapable of improvement. No effort for lifting the poor and degraded can succeed which is not guided by the enthusiasm which comes from this faith. The agent and his employees will not give full work without it, and the Indian will not throw off his suspicion and wake out of his indolence until he feels this touch of human sympathy.

For this reason the Government is specially to be congratulated on the response which the Christian people of the country have made to the proposition of the President that they should take a certain supervision of Government labor for the Indians by nominating agents and furnishing employees suitable to represent the Government in its beneficent efforts with these tribes, as well as in sending missionaries and teachers for religious labor among them.

Every report of the Indian Commissioner and of the various Commissioners from that time up to 1889 is in perfect harmony and accord with the theory and principle set forth in what I have just read from the Commissioner's report of 1873.

In 1889 the Commissioner of Indian Affairs concluded that it would be wise to give to the blanket Indians of the plains a higher form of education, and he mentioned, among other things, as almost indispensable a knowledge of electricity and general philosophical propositions that should be given to this breech-clout fellow in order to bring him into the pale of civilization in its highest and best aspect. Thereafter, in 1894, Congress seems to have determined upon a departure from the Indian policy established under the Administration of General Grant in 1870. Good reasons may be asserted in support of this departure. The work of Christian civilization had been steadily progressing and the time had probably approached when the Government school could be substituted for the Christian mission. Barbarism had been supplanted by a certain degree of civilization. Through the agency of this Christian endeavor, in which the people of all denominations participated, we had in some sections of the country witnessed the gratifying result of Indians whose parents had been savages accepting and discharging the responsibilities of American citizenship. That period having arrived, in the judgment of the Government it seemed eminently proper that a system of national education should be supplied which would endure through time and be at the disposal of these new citizens as they came into the enjoyment of the birthright of American citizenship.

But the Government was confronted with the necessity of acting in good faith with the people who had undertaken the work of assisting in this civilizing process. From the pockets of charity all over this broad land, from Jew and from Gentile, there had been buildings erected, educational institutions established and partially maintained throughout the years that had passed. In conformity with this invitation Christian men had preceded the armies of the Republic into the midst of the regions where the savage prevailed and made it possible to conquer and invade without the aid or the necessity for bloodshed.

Therefore, in view of the vast energy of the Christian people of the country, invested in obedience to the request of the Government, it appeared to fair-minded and just men that this new departure should be made with due regard for the kindly impulses of those who had pioneered the ways of civilization. Instantly to cut off all Government support to pioneer missions would not only involve injustice to the kindly spirited people who had erected them, but a gross and glaring injustice, involving evident principles of inhumanity to the unfortunate children who, after meager education, would thus be thrown out upon the prairies or in the woods to mingle again in savage life.

The Secretary of the Interior in the report for 1894 manifestly partook of this humane and just judgment which commended itself to impartial men, regardless of their political affiliations or their religious inclinations. I find in the report of the Secretary for 1894 the following statement:

The contract schools are now the subject of general discussion. I agree fully with those who oppose the use of public money for the support of sectarian schools. But this question should be considered practically. The schools have grown up. Money has been invested in their construction at a time when they were recognized as wise instrumentalities for the accomplishment of good. I do not think it proper to allow the intense feeling of opposition to sectarian education which is showing itself all over the land to induce the Department to disregard existing conditions. We need the schools now, or else we need a large appropriation to build schools to take their place.

It would scarcely be just to abolish them entirely—to abandon instantly a policy so long recognized. My own suggestion is that they should be decreased at the rate of not less than 20 per cent a year. Thus, in a few years more, they would cease to exist, and during this time the Bureau would gradually be prepared to do without them, while they might gather strength to continue without Government aid. This is the policy which is now controlling the Department, and unless it is changed by legislation it will be continued. The decrease in the appropriation for the present fiscal year is 20 per cent.

It is now proposed by the provisions of the bill absolutely to disregard moral or legal obligations to the generous, humane, and kind-hearted people over this country who continued this system throughout a period extending for nearly a quarter of a century. Further still, it is proposed absolutely to deprive of any possibility of education in any form under Government auspices or Government aid in the neighborhood of 4,000 Indian children who have been for a series of years carefully educated and looked after in contract schools.

At the Cœur d'Alene Reservation in the State of Idaho there is no Government school. There is not even a Government shed into which the children could be driven after the Government had abandoned them in the manner proposed by the bill. The same is true of the Flathead Agency in the State of Montana, the Tongue River Agency in the same State, the Turtle Mountain Reservation in the State of North Dakota, and the Puyallup Reservation in the State of Washington. Those agencies have an aggregate of 2,139 pupils, for whom the Government can not in the very nature of things make any provision. So the passage of the bill in its present form would involve, as I suggested yesterday, one of two things—either the abandonment by the United States of its duties to those wards of the Government, of its duty to human civilization, and their return to the ways of barbarism, from which we have been endeavoring through various ways and agencies to drag them, or it would leave upon charity a burden which properly belongs to the Government. I submit that as to those agencies where the Government has no facilities whatever for schools, the bill as it stands is inequitable and unjust to the Indian tribes to whom we owe certain definite obligations.

But it is suggested that an appropriation of $100,000 is made in the bill for the purchase of additional buildings which may now be in existence. In reply to that it is quite sufficient to refer to the last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, whereby it is made to appear that if the Government schools, the contract schools, and the charity schools receiving no Government aid have their capacity taxed to the utmost, not to exceed 60 per cent of the Indian pupils can be provided for. If all the facilities now existing only accommodate an enrollment of 60 per cent of the pupils, if it is to require a million and a half dollars to supply the necessary educational facilities to accommodate all, I ask in the name of reason how between now and the 1st day of next July you are going to provide the necessary facilities with the paltry sum of $100,000?

The amendment proposes to continue the policy outlined by the Secretary of the Interior in his report for 1894, to continue to diminish from year to year the aid to contract schools until the year 1899, and in the meantime the Secretary of the Interior is directed to provide facilities for the education of the Indian children independent of contract schools. This humane policy regarding not only the duties of the Government to the Indians, but likewise its apparent obligation to the good Christian people throughout this country who have assisted in Indian civilization, is sought to be abandoned, and in the abandonment of the policy we propose to abandon the Indians, to abandon those children, and let them out of the schools to resume the blanket, to return to the Indian tepee, to fish and hunt for a living, without any educational advantages. I do not think that this proposed policy is in accordance with the dictates of honesty or humanity.

It is suggested that because some of the contract schools were inaugurated and have been partially maintained under denominational control therefore some injury will follow to the Indian children committed to their care. This suggestion comes from men who know least about the Indian. I do not know of any form of Christianity which can be injected into a North American Indian to the detriment of the Indian. No creed has been sufficiently vicious to injuriously affect the savages whom we have corralled upon the reservations.

While upon the floor on this subject I call attention to the fact that it is proposed to strike down the Lincoln Institution and the Hampton School, I presume because of certain clauses in the constitution of the one or its organic act, and in the reports of the superintendent of the other. Here is the seriously objectionable feature urged against the Lincoln Institution. It was incorporated under an act of the legislature of Pennsylvania, approved May 9, 1866. Section 3 of that act provides:

> The affairs and concerns of the said Lincoln Institution shall be conducted by a board of managers consisting of 30 ladies and a board of council consisting of 30 gentlemen; of which board the bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the diocese together with the rectors of the churches which shall be represented in the board of managers shall be ex officio members.

Section 4 provides that—

> Applicants may be admitted without regard to their religious belief, but the inmates shall, in all cases, have respect for the faith of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, and submit to the religious exercises of the household, which shall always be in accordance with the belief of that church; and all children received under 12 years of age shall be trained in that faith.

How can it injuriously affect an Indian, the son or daughter of a savage, to be instructed in some form of religion, and particularly the religion taught by the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States? If taken there under the age of 12 I should say that the doctrines of that church ought to be taught to a young Indian as regularly as the A B C's, and for this reason: That church teaches a doctrine which is the unit of modern civilization—respect for parents, respect for the marriage relation, and in thus providing for the establishment of respect for the home you destroy some of the most vicious elements that have led to the continued barbarous condition of the Indians.

Again, it is proposed to strike down the Hampton Home in Virginia.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Montana pardon me right here? I do not know whether his attention has been called to the entire change in the organization and policy of the Lincoln School.

Mr. CARTER. That cuts no figure with me. I will support it just as it is.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It has not been changed so far as the charter is concerned.

Mr. CARTER. Not so far as the charter is concerned. I understand that to be the fact.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Is it a charter of the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir, of the State of Pennsylvania.

It is proposed to strike down the Hampton School in Virginia, and the reason assigned for the incompetency and unfitness of the Hampton Institute to teach the Indians rests in the fact that the reports of the superintendent of that school to the superintendent of schools of the State of Virginia breathe a certain kindly, loving, Christian spirit. I will read only one extract from the report of 1893:

> Missionary work is an important feature in our training. Our graduates are a little army of Sunday-school workers.

I do not care what denomination controls the Sunday school, it would be a grand and glorious fact to announce that every young Indian between the two oceans was inclined to teach a Sunday school. The work of civilization and the necessity for Government aid to Indians begins to cease when the child becomes a Sunday-school teacher. That is but one of many expressions of similar kind found in the report of the Hampton School. I honor the superintendent of that school for attempting to inculcate some principle of moral responsibility into the young savages committed to his care. I question not the religion he teaches; I question not the creed he represents; but he teaches a doctrine which leads the youthful savage to follow the kindly ways of the humble Nazarene who trod the weather-beaten hills of Judea two thousand years ago. That is sufficient for me.

I am in favor of even-handed justice in dealing with these Christian people, and that involves a gradual rather than an abrupt withdrawal of Government aid. I am in favor of yielding to the dictates of humanity by providing for the unfortunate Indian charges of the Government the best schools that we have available at the time. I am in full sympathy and accord with the extending of a national school system to the reservations and to the Indians who live upon them. I do trust that we may live to see this remnant of an unfortunate race absorbed in the body politic of the nation and taught the duties and responsibilities of citizenship under the guiding hand of the General Government rather than under the agency of sect or creed. But we have not reached the point where that may be fully achieved at a single bound.

The amendment I think embodies justice, fairness, and honesty, and I trust it will be adopted.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, ever since I have been in Congress there has been a contest over what are known as sectarian Indian schools, and every effort to do away with them has been met by the same stubborn resistance. On the last Indian appropriation bill I remember that we had in the Senate a sharp debate which ended in striking from the bill the House provision for the gradual reduction of these appropriations and the gradual abolition of those schools. This year the other House has met the case with decisive action and has put a stop finally to appropriations for sectarian schools.

The argument is always the same against this change, that we are going to cast some thousands of Indian children out without education onto the prairies. Nothing of that sort is intended, I think, Mr. President.

The money is there to do the teaching; to supply the instruction. The only question is whether the teaching shall be by Government officials, as is the case now in many of the existing schools, or whether it shall be continued through denominational teachers. The children will be educated in any event. They ought to be educated where the Government money is spent by Government teachers.

There is no doubt, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has said, that any form of Christian faith is of the greatest advantage to the Indians. The sole question which concerns us, as it seems to me, is whether we have the right and whether it is in accordance with American principles to make appropriations of this kind. The Constitution says that—

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion.

Thomas Jefferson, in the statute of Virginia known as the statute of religious freedom, said that "to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions in which he disbelieves is sinful and tyrannical."

I think that sentence in Jefferson's statute of religious freedom covers all that is at stake in this matter and it is a vital principle.

It seems to me that the Government should not make appropriations for any sectarian or denominational schools. If the various Christian denominations of the country desire to carry on Indian education and do it from funds contributed by charitable and benevolent persons, it is a great and good work for which everyone feels the highest respect, and with which no one would be disposed to find the slightest fault. But when we come to appropriating the money of the people for purposes of education it seems to me perfectly clear that that money ought to be expended by Government officers and by Government officers only, and that the schools that the Government maintains should be secular schools, like public schools throughout the country.

The Senator from Montana gave the impression in what he said that the Hampton School, of Virginia, and the Lincoln Institution, of Philadelphia, had been swept out of this bill by the same force that put in this nonsectarian provision which he proposes to strike out. The reverse of that is the case. The House put in this provision putting an end to sectarian schools, but the House also left in the appropriations both for Hampton and the Lincoln Institution. The attack on the Hampton School and the Lincoln Institution has come since the bill reached the Senate, and I am sure did not originate among those who are anxious to put an end to sectarian teaching at Government expense. Personally, I think the school at Hampton is absolutely nonsectarian. I think it is entirely entitled to the appropriation which we have always made. It is a very noble charity; it has done a great work. To it was devoted unselfishly the life of General Armstrong, as we all know.

I have here a statement in regard to the school, furnished me by the superintendent, from which it appears that the Hampton School was incorporated by the general assembly of the State of Virginia in the year 1870. The purposes of the school, as stated in its charter, were "the instruction of youth in common school, academic, and collegiate branches, the best methods of teaching the same, and the best mode of practical industry in its application to agriculture and the mechanic arts." It is governed by a board of 17 officers, representing six different religious denominations, no one of which has a majority. It receives help from the land-scrip fund, through the State of Virginia, to the amount of $10,000 per year, as being an agricultural institution. It also receives help from the Morrill Act fund, the Peabody and the Slater funds; and the Peabody Fund can not give to any sectarian institution. It receives help from no board of any church, nor is it connected with any religious organization. It has among its staff and students both Catholics and Protestants. The present chaplain was connected with both the Congregational and Presbyterian churches before coming to the school. The assistant chaplain is a member of the Episcopal Church. The school receives help from Hebrews, Protestants, and Catholics, one of its donors being a Catholic priest. It has had people of all denominations among its friends, and its graduates have gone out to work in different churches. It was here at Hampton that the Government system of industrial education of Indians was first started. It was then taken to Carlisle, and thence has been introduced in the Western schools.

I think it is not necessary for me to enter further into a description of Hampton or the work that has been done there. I believe that it is thoroughly familiar to all Senators; it has been discussed heretofore; and, indeed, the work of that institution, I think, is known to all Americans who are interested in work of that kind for the benefit of the Indians and of the negroes, to which it has been particularly devoted.

The Lincoln Institution, in Philadelphia, has the clause in its charter which has been read by the Senator from Montana. When the charter was amended to allow them to educate Indians they made an express agreement with the Secretary of the Interior—

That we were to comply with the rules of the Department and were not to be sectarian, and also that the pupils were to be allowed to attend whatever church their parents desired, which we have always done.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Do you say they have changed their charter?

Mr. LODGE. No; I did not say that. I say they amended their charter to admit Indians, which is precisely the fact, and when they did it and took Indians they made an agreement with the Department which I have just read.

The Lincoln Institution is performing the same work as that of Hampton; they are doing it at as low a price as is done per head, I think, at any of the Government or sectarian schools, and it seems to me that there is no reason why the Senate should cut out of the bill the usual appropriations for these two excellent institutions. As to the broad general question which is included in the House clause which the Senator from Montana seeks to strike from the bill, I think I have already said enough. It seems to me that the House provision is in accordance with the well-recognized principle of our Government that public money should not be spent for sectarian purposes. The very fact that such debates as this arise year after year over this appropriation seems to me of itself to demonstrate the wisdom of putting an end to it. The feeling is constantly growing more heated and such a policy can only do grave harm in the long run. The House, which inserted that clause putting an end to sectarian teaching, left in both Hampton and the Lincoln Institution, and it seems to me that the Senate may well leave the bill as the House has sent it to them.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. GRAY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator from Delaware. I think he undertook to get the floor yesterday on this question. I will follow him, with the permission of the Chair.

Mr. GRAY. I am much obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire for his courtesy.

Mr. President, I do not intend to trespass upon the patience of the Senate, and only rise to say a single word in pursuance of the notice that I gave yesterday that I should move a disagreement to the amendment striking out from the bill the appropriations for the Hampton and Lincoln schools. Since then I have listened to the exceedingly interesting and eloquent remarks of the Senator from Montana and to the Senator from Massachusetts. I shall vote with great pleasure for the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, and as far as I can gather the feeling of the Senate there will be very little opposition to it. Therefore, it is not necessary that I should detain the Senate by any remarks in addition to what has been already said. But I want to put upon the record, if I may be allowed, before I sit down, the circular letter issued by the Lincoln Institution at Philadelphia, because I know some of those who are interested in that institution. I ask that it may be read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

LINCOLN INSTITUTION, INDIAN DEPARTMENT,
324 SOUTH ELEVENTH STREET,
Philadelphia, April 4, 1896.

MY DEAR SIR: It is due to us and to you to explain the character of our school in regard to religion.

After the war was over, in 1866, the legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, through Mr. Burrows, the State superintendent of soldiers' orphan and public schools, wrote to a children's institute with which I was connected, asking if we could take some soldiers' orphans whose parents were mostly Episcopalians, as they had no place then where they or other Protestant children could be brought up in the faith of their fathers.

We at once went to work and instituted the Lincoln Institution, and to carry out their wishes had our charter so worded that all children under the age of 12 years should be instructed in conformity with the Protestant Episcopal faith.

The managers at no time, neither man nor woman, nor the officers of the Home, were obliged to be of any particular faith. We have had and now have members of almost all denominations in our boards and in charge of the school.

The Educational Home was organized as a branch of the Lincoln Institution for the younger children.

In 1882 our work for the soldiers' orphans was finished and our building closed for two years; then, having a charter and board of management, owning two large buildings, we decided to use them for the benefit of educating Indians. We applied to the Government and it consented to let us have 200 Indian children. We amended our charter in 1885 so as to extend our benefits to Indian pupils placed under our charge by the Government of the United States.

It was understood when we received these pupils that we were to comply with the rules of the Department, and were not to be sectarian, and also that the pupils were to be allowed to attend whatever church their parents desired, which we have always done.

It would be impossible to conduct a Christian institution without some form of worship, and Carlisle, Fort Totten, Lawrenceville, Haskell Institute, etc., all have one form of family worship.

I add to this the testimony of our officers, employees, and pupils to prove that we are not sectarian. I would also state that our pupils are showing the benefit of their Eastern training, as we have just sent two girls and one boy as teachers in Government schools, and they are proving most satisfactory.

Many of our children are attending public school here so as to train them for teaching their own people by the most improved methods.

We trust that this explanation will be satisfactory to you and that you will allow us to continue the work that has so far been of inestimable benefit to the Indians. The management consists of volunteer men and women who give their money, time, and interest to this work without remuneration of any kind, but simply from patriotic and benevolent motives.

We are under the control of no denomination, nor do we receive any money from any church society. The buildings and grounds of both our departments and the small endowment fund we have was most all given us by Quakers and others of various faiths.

Eighty-six of our girls are of Protestant parentage and 14 Roman Catholic. Of the boys 62 are Protestants and 46 Roman Catholics.

Yours, respectfully,

MARY McHENRY COX,
First Directress.
MARGARET DAVIS,
Secretary Board of Managers.

Mr. GRAY. That circular was sent to me from this institution by a friend in Philadelphia, and a very distinguished member of the bar there. I shall take the liberty of reading his letter, because I want to say that his indorsement of the statements made in that circular are to me absolutely conclusive. With that statement in regard to the writer of the letter, I wish to read it to the Senate. It is very short. Addressing me, he says:

I venture to call your attention to the Lincoln Institution (Indian department), which is located here.

That is, in Philadelphia.

An appropriation in its aid is opposed, I understand, on the ground that it is sectarian in character. I am sure that the objection is without foundation. I inclose a circular, and its statements may, I feel entirely confident, be accepted as candid and truthful. The school is supported by the best people of our city, and without regard to creed. And I venture to hope that when the question of an appropriation comes before the Senate you will be able to give it your support.

Believe me to be, yours, very truly, HENRY FLANDERS.

I understood the chairman of the subcommittee who has charge of the pending bill to say that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana should be adopted by the Senate he would not object to the rejection of the amendment striking out the appropriation for the Hampton and the Lincoln schools, and I am content that that should be so, for I would be heartily in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Montana without even that agreement or understanding.

I believe it would be a very discreditable thing to this Congress and to the American people if we could gain our own consent to interfere with and thwart the efforts of Christian men and women to carry civilization among these Indians simply because they happen to belong to a church or to a creed that is not our own. I fully agree that it is impossible in this country to appropriate public money taken from public taxation for the support of any school or institution that is sectarian in its character. But at the same time we ought to be able so to control ourselves as to act reasonably and with that saving common sense which enables us to do justice and to accomplish results without being borne down by ignorance and fanaticism. It is a very melancholy thing that in this last decade of the nineteenth century there should still survive that unchristian feeling among Christian sects which compels an interference with Christian work. It is very hard indeed to believe that the gospel of Christ can not be carried to the dark parts of this continent or any other and the simple faith of the Great Teacher of our religion preached in its simplicity because of creeds and because of clashing and jealous denominational feeling. But so it is, and I recognize the fact, and I recognize the necessity of steering clear of this clashing, warring, unchristian Christianity.

Mr. President, the people who are connected with the Lincoln Institution at Philadelphia are many of them known to me. They are people imbued with Christian zeal and benevolence. They give their time and they give of their means in order to support this institution and to educate Indian children, and I rejoice to believe that the Senate is going to restore that appropriation for the education of the wards of the nation for which we have a constitutional right and a moral duty to use money raised by taxation of the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is gratifying to me to note the calmness and kindliness of expression that thus far has marked this discussion. I trust that I may be fortunate enough to utter no word that will engender religious feeling or that will operate to the detriment of either myself or the body of which I have the honor to be a member. I am on record, Mr. President, in reference to this matter, and I have seen nothing in the past two years to change the expressions that fell from my lips in this Chamber when a somewhat similar proposition was then under consideration.

I listened with interest to the earnest remarks of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. I listened carefully to the reading of his amendment and have since read it myself. If I understand the amendment correctly, it purposes to accomplish two things. First, it proposes that what I regard as a vicious system, that of appropriating money for sectarian schools, shall be continued in this country; and, in the second place, it proposes that we shall declare it to be the settled policy of the Government that, when we are prepared, and when the time arrives for dispensing with the contract school system, all further appropriations shall be withheld from schools like Carlisle and Hampton. The amendment, therefore, is designed to continue for a time, and no one knows how long, appropriations to sectarian schools, schools confined largely, almost exclusively, to one religious denomination, and it contemplates that when those appropriations are finally discontinued that no further appropriations shall be made to any schools other than those exclusively under Government control.

Mr. President, I do not give my assent to either of these propositions, and I do not propose to vote for the amendment. The battle to divorce church and state is not a new one. It was fought in Holland nearly four hundred years ago, and it was settled there. It was settled afterwards in England. It strikes me as being a strange and unaccountable thing that at the close of the nineteenth century, in this free Republic of ours, we should be discussing a proposition such as this in the American Senate. I can not for the life of me understand how it is that we have drifted into a condition of things, so far as the appropriation of public funds for sectarian purposes is concerned, which precipitates upon the Senate almost every year a discussion of this great and vital question.

The Senator from Montana says that if we pass the bill as it came from the House of Representatives we will turn nearly 4,000 Indian children out into the world without shelter and without educational advantages. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] on yesterday put the number at 3,000. But, Mr. President, I take it that if we pass the bill precisely as it came from the House we will not necessarily turn a single Indian child out into the world, or deny to a single one of them the same advantages, or better advantages for education, than they possess to-day.

If we dispense with contract schools, as the bill proposes, and provide that the Government shall educate its own wards, the school buildings that are on those reservations will remain, and I do not see why the Government can not rent those buildings and go along with the system of education precisely as it is being conducted to-day, with the evils of sectarian teaching eliminated. Does the Senator from Montana presume to say, in behalf of those for whom he so eloquently pleads, that they will refuse to rent those buildings to the Government until such time as the Government can either erect buildings or purchase existing buildings from the parties who own them now?

I take it that the Senator from Montana will not contend that that will be the result. For that reason it seems to me that the argument that we are going to throw out upon the cold charities of the world three or four thousand Indian children and deprive them of shelter and of educational advantages falls to the ground. This great Government will see to it that they are all provided for and that every obligation that we owe to those people is faithfully observed and carried out.

Mr. President, I do not care to discuss at length the two schools, Hampton and Carlisle, that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate have seen fit to strike from the bill. They were stricken out, as I believe, solely because the House refused to continue appropriations for schools that are openly and notoriously sectarian. The Hampton School has a history of its own, and it is a history that is one of brightness and of glory. It has come down to us as an inheritance of which we are justly proud, and I do not believe that any Senator, whatever his religious opinions or his prejudices may be, will finally vote against continuing the usual appropriation to this most worthy institution of learning. On the contrary, I take it that Hampton is going to stand in the bill, whatever action may be taken in regard to sectarian schools.

The benevolent people of this country have contributed half a million dollars to erect buildings at Hampton for the purposes of education, and they are contributing $50,000 every year to help on the grand work of that noble school. We will not, I feel sure, by any vote of this body or of the other House of Congress, put ourselves on record as striking a blow at the progress and prosperity of this great educational institution.

Mr. President, Hampton is not a sectarian school, and I challenge any man to show that in the proper sense any tenet of a church or of a sectarian denomination is taught at that institution. It has a special claim upon the people of this country, and I am glad to stand here, as I have stood before, to say a good word for Hampton, and to contend that it shall be dealt with fairly, liberally, and justly by the American Congress.

In regard to the Lincoln Institution, I will say substantially what I have said about Hampton. It is a nonsectarian school. It may happen to have in its charter a declaration that it has outgrown. Some religious denominations in this country if tested in that way, Mr. President, would not stand before the intelligence and the enlightenment of the American people as well as they stand to-day. It may have an obsolete provision in its charter regarding the matter of religious teaching, but the fact is that Protestant and Catholic children there assemble, and a large proportion of the board of managers, officers, and employees of the school are Roman Catholics at the present time. It is not a sectarian school in any proper sense of the term, almost every religious denomination being represented in it.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] suggested that he would vote for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], and thought that there would be little opposition to it. I trust that there may be a great deal of opposition to it, and I hope that the votes of a majority of this Senate will be cast against that amendment, and that the bill shall be permitted to stand precisely as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, it is well to remember that another body, fresh from the people, reflecting, I think, at least as accurately the views and feelings of the American people as does this Senate, by an overwhelming vote rejected the proposition embodied in the amendment of the Senator from Montana, and I trust that the Senate may be equally as thoughtful, as wise, and as patriotic.

Mr. President, I believe in the public-school system of the United States. I believe in it thoroughly and profoundly, and I deprecate more than I can express any efforts, from whatever source they may emanate, to weaken or to undermine it. I am also unalterably opposed to appropriations of public money for sectarian purposes, and I want to say, Mr. President, in all kindness, by way of suggestion if not of prophecy, that if the storm now raging in this country against that system is not strong enough to end it this year, it will gather strength until the desired end is accomplished. The people of the United States are not going to sit idle, whatever their religious opinions or views or prejudices may be, and see the National Congress year after year violate the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution by appropriating money for institutions that are notoriously sectarian in their teachings. I am against the entire scheme, and I will take pleasure and pride here to-day and at any other time when I may have an opportunity in casting my vote against any such proposition. Let us here and now end the system, and rescue our Government from a practice that is indefensible, mischievous, and un-American.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I do not know that what are called sectarian schools are especially wicked. I have seen none anywhere that were not, on the whole, to be spoken of with entire respect. At the same time, there is a growing indisposition to have the Government support or make contracts with Catholic schools, Episcopaiian schools, Methodist schools, or schools of any one of the numerous subdivisions of the Christian world. The churches themselves have substantially come to that conclusion.

It occurs to me that I am quite ignorant as to what a strictly nonsectarian school is, and I would inquire what sort of a school the Government is to conduct? Would it be out of order, would it be unparliamentary, so to speak, to incidentally refer to God in one of those schools?

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. It would? I was afraid so. Now I am getting light about nonsectarian schools.

I do not see why the general doctrines of Christianity could not be taught—the duty of man to his neighbor, obedience to God, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Golden Rule, and a great many other things that we all agree upon without any controversy whatever.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, and the Declaration of Independence, without reference to party. [Laughter.] I do not see why we could not agree in some such things as those. But then I am troubled, as I proceed, to find further that we may have a few Mohammedans, who might be shocked by these simple declarations, or even mere ethical declarations; and then by and by we should come to an atheist, and we would be trampling upon his rights if we permitted the Lord's Prayer to be said or the Ten Commandments to be read in the schools.

I have little sympathy, endeavoring to consider it from the standpoint of broad statesmanship, with a great deal of what has been said upon the subject of sectarianism. The Christian Church is, unfortunately perhaps, divided; but it is only like an army. Some men like to serve in the infantry, some in the artillery, some in the cavalry, some in the engineers, and some like a powerful organization, like that magnificent machine, the Roman Catholic Church, which moves with majestic power and steadiness and eternity of purpose. Read Macaulay's description of it in his review of Ranke's History of the Popes, and you will have a respect for that church, even if you dislike its semipolitical tendency at times, and however you may be disposed to criticise some of its particular practices and requirements.

I can speak in a similar respect of all the churches—not sects—churches of the Lord, intended to teach man that there is something supernatural in the future; that there is, perhaps, a heaven and a hell; at any rate, that there is happiness and unhappiness in the next world—that there may be a place where some men could not expect to go, for they are not fit to enter into good society in this world or the next—they would not be at home. [Laughter.]

I am for the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. The proposition as it stands in the bill says that we shall stop short now, to-day; stop giving any money whatever or making any contracts with a church which does not teach just exactly what we believe in. The amendment of the Senator from Montana says if you do this there will be thousands of Indian children who will have no schoolhouse whatever until the benevolence of the people, the Christian missionary spirit of the United States, shall come forward and supply the deficiency. I think there is great force in that.

I do not see why we should not let this thing down slowly and reasonably, and circumstances will adjust themselves to necessities. Very few of the churches will give up any of the schools they have now; they will not lease or sell their schoolhouses; they will rather redouble their vigor; and many of us who are mighty poor churchmen of any kind would be very glad to help in the work. Do not say, "Lock the doors! Close the schools! Quit! Come away from that unholy place! Let the children scramble the best they can and wait a year or two or three years before they get other schoolhouses." I will not agree to it. Suppose you were to conduct a line of ocean steamers upon a like policy, and to give notice that you will not take a certain class of people on your ships; that they can not travel over your line, and you come to that decision in mid-ocean, are you going to throw them overboard instantly? No, I think not; you would certainly take them to the wharf and tell them you do not want them to go any more on your line. That is all that is contained in the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

I am glad to see such a friendly spirit exhibited. I am glad to see the kindly tone in which the Lincoln School and the Hampton School are spoken of. I know less of the Lincoln School, but I have known the Hampton School a great many years, and I esteem it a good part of an education to have known General Armstrong, the great president of that institution, a man who had deep religious belief; but you would know him a long time before being able to tell with what sect he was associated. With that belief, "Rich in saving common sense," as Tennyson said of Wellington, he was acceptable everywhere; a man of force, of character, he impressed himself upon the black men and the red men of that institution; he cautioned them against thinking that a little book knowledge would make honorable and successful people out of them, and he taught them how to be active, true, sincere men and women and good citizens; and that school is still permeated with his spirit. The managers of that school are from all churches; its general spirit is splendid—patriotic, religious, moral, and intellectual.

The original form of the Lincoln Institution, as was said by a Senator here a while ago, arose from the circumstance that it was founded by Episcopalians and was requested to take charge of certain children whose people wanted them educated in the doctrines and ritual of the Episcopal Church.

Mr. GRAY. They were soldiers' orphans.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; soldiers' orphans; but their people wanted them to go to that particular school. Now, they have broadened it and have provided for a governing board, without mentioning a bishop, or a church, or anything of the sort, and they have made a contract with the Government under which the pupils may go to whatever church they please and shall not be at all restricted in that respect. The whole of the circular sent here by the officers of the institution—and I am glad they sent it—has been read, but I wish to call attention, as establishing the character of the school, more particularly to the officers and managers of it.

They mention in the circular the facts that 86 of the girls are of Protestant parentage and 14 Roman Catholic. Of the boys, 62 are Protestants and 46 Roman Catholics. I read a few names of officers only—not all. The superintendent of the boys' department is George Jackson, a Roman Catholic; the assistant superintendent, Joseph T. Mercer, is an Episcopalian; the matron, M. Deeble, is a Methodist; the assistant matron, Mrs. Murphy, is a Presbyterian; the head teacher, Noble Haigh, is an Anglican; the assistant teacher, Daisy Allen, is a Congregationalist. The first six officers and teachers in the boys' department are, therefore, each of them of a different church.

In the girls' department the superintendent, Mr. Hugg, is a Baptist; the next, the matron, a Methodist; the next, the assistant matron, a Methodist; the next an Episcopalian, the next a Methodist, the next an Episcopalian, the next a Congregationalist, the next an Episcopalian; the next, the cook, is a Roman Catholic; the house maid, a Roman Catholic; the waitress, a Presbyterian; the laundress, a Roman Catholic; the shoemaker belongs to the Greek Church, and the janitor is a Roman Catholic. [Laughter.] If that is not an absolutely harmless arrangement I do not know how to make one.

I want to maintain these schools, and I want to let them down into nonsectarianism and lack of religious instruction as easily as I can.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, with respect to the pending amendment, I desire to make a very few observations. I have known for a long time that the answer to a question is sometimes determined by the manner of stating it. In the particular instance before the Senate I understand it to be conceded that it is the duty of the United States to educate or to provide the means of education for Indian children on the reservations. I understand that duty is conceded. I understand, further, that it is a fact, about which there is no dispute, that the United States Government is not quite ready by its own facilities and its own means to educate all of these children, but that there are certain sectarian schools—

I use that term because I apprehend that I can employ no stronger one—existing in the reservations which can supply an education beyond the immediate facilities which the Government possesses; and the question is whether they shall be employed or not to supply that which the Government can not do by its own means.

It seems to me that if that is a fair statement of the proposition there has been a good deal of discussion here which might well have been spared, because, this duty existing, the Government being unable by its own means to afford the facilities for education to all these children, there are certain persons who are entirely competent who have been employed heretofore, and whose method has given us, so far as I know, entire satisfaction; the question is, Shall we continue to employ them, shall the Government avail itself of these private agencies in order to discharge its whole duty, or shall we, upon some fancied impression, say we now abandon those children, and say to them "after a while we shall be able to educate you, but for the present the schools must stop, for the present you must cease attending the schools"?

I can not understand why there is anything improper in availing ourselves of the facilities afforded by schools already established. I understand the Roman Catholic schools have heretofore educated Indian children in a very satisfactory way; I understand that the Methodist schools and the Presbyterian schools and all others have substantially discharged their duties toward the Government, and that no particular complaint has heretofore been made that they have forced their peculiar dogmas upon the Indian children. If that be true, what is there to be considered except to continue to pay the schools, or the managers of the schools, for aiding us in the discharge of the duties which we admit exist?

Mr. President, in Illinois, and I believe all over the country where the public schools exist, I do not remember that I have ever known a school board to inquire whether an applicant for the position of a teacher was a Methodist, a Baptist, or a Roman Catholic. I have always supposed that the teacher was employed with reference to his or her qualifications, and I must confess that I can not see now what objection there can be to the employment of a Roman Catholic teacher or the subsidizing of a Roman Catholic school, or a Presbyterian or a Methodist school, to instruct the Indians in the rudimentary branches of education; and that is all, I believe, we propose to extend to them.

I know the term "sectarian" has an odious sound; I know that with some the Roman Catholic faith is regarded as objectionable; the Methodists are opposed by some; the Presbyterians by others; the Baptists by others; and so of that gentle denomination called Friends. I believe down in some of the New England States at one time the Friends were persecuted and driven out; their very innocence made them the object of local opposition. But it seems to me we are sticking in the bark, and that the noise being made over this question just now is a sort of contribution to a sentiment which every now and then arises in the country, and makes an enormous noise about exceedingly unimportant things.

I shall vote for the amendment upon the simple ground, preferring secular education as I do, that at present the United States Government is not prepared to furnish the means of education to all these children. To the extent that we need to subsidize these sectarian schools, let it be done; but beyond that, after that, I am willing to agree with any Senator who may prefer a strictly secular education. I am not able to see that any question is involved here beyond the mere question of convenience. If we owe this duty we ought to discharge it. If we can not do it with our present methods, there are those who have the facilities whom we can employ, whom we can subsidize. If we can use them, why shall we not do it?

The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] made some observations in regard to the probable improvement of the Indians by almost any form of faith. It seems to me in respect to barbarians, if the Indians are to be so regarded still, although I understand that many of them are American citizens, any form of faith would be an improvement. I am sure that there will be no danger to them arising from that cause, and Senators need not give themselves so much anxiety about the methods of teaching in those schools, because I am sure that no such impression will be made upon the Indians as will be injurious to them. They need improvement; and any method of instruction would be an improvement upon their present condition. They would be wiser and better taught in any of these sectarian schools than they would be if left entirely without education.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, the objection raised by the Senator from Montana to the provision of the bill as passed upon by the House contained on page 58 is that a large number of Indian children will be deprived of school facilities under the provisions of the bill as it now appears before us. I propose to insert on page 59, in line 3, after the word "schools," what I now read:

And in any case, if such there be, where the provisions of this act shall operate to deprive Indian children of present school facilities, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to provide such temporary school accommodations, including teachers, as may be necessary for the time being, and report to Congress at the opening of the next regular session.

I think that will obviate the difficulty spoken of by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. I wish to say for myself in this connection that I have no objection of any kind or character to the creed, to the ritual, to the form of worship, or the polity of any denomination or religion.

I think the religion of the Master as He taught it is broad enough to cover all mankind and all the various denominations that are trying to be Christian. So my objection to sectarian schools is not based upon any objection to a particular denomination. I think men and women can worship as well in one form as in another, provided the heart is right, when it is "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." I ask the Secretary to read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "schools," in line 3, page 59, it is proposed to amend by inserting:

And in any case, if such there be, where the provisions of this act shall operate to deprive Indian children of present school facilities, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to provide such temporary school accommodations, including teachers, as may be necessary for the time being, and report to Congress at the opening of the next regular session.

Mr. HOAR. Where does the amendment come in?

Mr. PEFFER. It is to be inserted immediately after the word "schools."

Mr. FAULKNER. Is it a substitute?

Mr. PEFFER. It is to be inserted immediately after the word "schools," in line 3, page 59, leaving the rest of the matter to stand.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is at a different point in the bill.

Mr. PEFFER. My amendment is to come in on page 59, line 3.

Mr. PETTIGREW. After the other amendment is disposed of?

Mr. PEFFER. I understand that the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] is to strike out certain words, and I propose to amend the original text by adding what I have sent to the desk.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator's amendment is not to take the place of the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]?

Mr. PEFFER. It is not to take the place of the Senator's amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER].

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment of the Senator from Kansas be read. We do not know what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "schools," in line 3, page 59, it is proposed to insert:

And in any case, if such there be, where the provisions of this act shall operate to deprive Indian children of present school facilities the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to provide such temporary school accommodations, including teachers, as may be necessary for the time being, and report to Congress at the opening of the next regular session.

Mr. CARTER. Do I understand the Senator from Kansas to offer the amendment as a substitute for the amendment I propose?

Mr. PEFFER. No. My object is to save the present wording of the bill and to add what the Secretary has read, so as to obviate the objection raised by the Senator from Montana, with the hope that by the adoption of my amendment the Senator's objection would be satisfied and that he would urge no further objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] is to strike out and insert. The motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] to insert, being to perfect the text of the part proposed to be stricken out, is in order. So the question before the Senate is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] is open to the serious objection which applies to the provision in the bill.

I call attention to page 3 of the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the year 1895, where the statement is made that not to exceed—to be more accurate I will read it:

These figures do not include schools among the Five Civilized Tribes nor those which the State of New York provides for her Indians. Therefore it is peculiarly gratifying to note the fact that from the remaining tribes 23,036 Indian pupils are now gathered together under the civilizing influence of schools and brought into daily contact with enlightened ideas and customs.

The 23,036 represent the full capacity of the Government schools and the contract schools, and the full capacity of certain schools supported exclusively by charity without Government aid. This he suggests is over 60 per cent of the entire Indian school population exclusive of New York and the five Indian tribes. The report for the preceding year suggested that the total school capacity did not exceed 50 per cent. It is obvious when construing the two reports together that school facilities have been increased by the Government to accommodate about 10 per cent of the school population in addition to those theretofore supplied.

I have here a table showing the condition on 20 Indian reservations, from which it is manifest that on those reservations the total school population is 15,488, while the Government has accommodations for only 5,733.

Mr. TELLER. What are the reservations?

Mr. CARTER. The Cœur d'Alene Reservation, in Idaho; the White Earth Agency, in Minnesota; the Crow Agency, in Montana; the Fort Belknap Agency, in Montana; the Tongue River Agency, in Montana; the Blackfeet Agency, in Montana; the Pueblo Agency, in New Mexico; the Turtle Mountain Reservation, in North Dakota; the Osage Agency, in Oklahoma; the Pine Ridge Agency, in South Dakota; the Crow Creek Agency, in South Dakota; the Rosebud Agency, in South Dakota; the Tulalip Agency, in Washington; the La Pointe Agency, in Wisconsin; the Green Bay Agency, in Wisconsin; the Shoshone Agency, in Wyoming; the Mission Agency, in California; the Flathead Agency, in Montana, and the Umatilla Agency, in Oregon.

The table is as follows:

To resume, the total school population is 15,488; the aggregate capacity of the Government schools is 5,733; the aggregate capacity of the contract schools is 5,185; the total capacity of the schools on those reservations is 11,018, leaving 4,995 children unprovided with school facilities in either Government or contract schools at the agencies named.

The proposition presented in the amendment of the Senator from Kansas would leave the bill as it stands and provide that the Secretary of the Interior shall proceed betweeen now and the 1st day of next July, when the pending bill becomes the law of the land, prohibiting absolutely a contract with any of these denominational schools, and requires the Government to furnish buildings independent of them. I submit that it is practically impossible. The buildings can not be constructed and the facilities provided within the limit of time suggested.

Mr. PEFFER. Does the Senator from Montana mean to say that there are no buildings on the ground now where the schools are at present conducted? If there are, could not those buildings be rented?

Mr. CARTER. Those buildings might be rented, but that might involve the process of confiscation. It may be that many of those good people will desire to prosecute their work notwithstanding Government schools are erected on the reservations, and I do not understand it to be in harmony with the policy of the Government to compel people to dispose of their property, property which they were encouraged to construct by acts of Congress and by the country.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks there is anything in the bill prohibiting them from conducting such schools if they desire?

Mr. CARTER. There is not.

Mr. TELLER. Then, if it is impossible to rent their buildings and they prefer to go on furnishing their own facilities, of course no children will be turned out.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There are two schools in South Dakota under the control of the Catholic Church, one at Pine Ridge and the other at the Crow Creek Agency. They are both very many miles from any other school whatever or any other building. They were built there at the invitation of the Government, and permission was given to build them on ground at those agencies. I undertake to say that if the bill passes as it is framed they will not rent those schools, and that instead of there being 300 children in them next year there will probably be 50 in each school, and they will wait until they can collect money enough to go on.

If we make a gradual reduction of 20 per cent a year they will keep the children, and the schools will go on as heretofore. But the church will not rent the building and turn their teachers out for a year or so, until the Government can build other schools, leaving their property unoccupied, without any equipment so far as teachers are concerned. But if we make a reduction of 20 per cent—and it is the only way you can take care of the children—they will raise money enough to conduct the schools at the present capacity.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me there is another practical difficulty which has not been considered in the debate. Suppose the sectarian schools are discontinued on the 1st of next July and they go on under the denominations, as many of them I suppose will, with decreased funds, but still keeping up the school in a private way. Here in those schools at various stages of their education are the children who have been entered there by the Government and the charge of whose education has been defrayed by the Government. Perhaps one child is within six months of graduation, another within a year, and so on. It is very hard to take those children away from the school where they are going through. They may have a prospect of becoming teachers or finding places in the school if they graduate. It is very hard to compel them to go to an entirely new school, where they are unknown to the teachers and where the teachers are unknown to them.

Suppose, although I do not imagine it is likely to happen, we should make it illegal to make a further contract with Hampton. We have all seen those children there, how much they are attached to the school and how well they are doing. It would be a gross injustice to compel the discontinuance of the education of a child there who had got within one or two years even of his or her graduation. The amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], if I understand it, provides pretty well, I think, for such a case. It is not in print.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not in print.

Mr. HOAR. I hope it will be printed if it goes over until tomorrow morning. If I recollect it aright, it provides for such a case, and I am sure the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] would desire to modify his amendment in that respect so far as it might be advisable.

Although I rose only for this purpose, I should like to say a few words on the general subject, and they will be very few indeed, because it is not necessary to argue the question with a view to convincing Senators, and my own opinions on this subject are known to anybody who is or ever will be curious about them.

The sectarian school plan was started by General Grant, who had a personal interest in it to a very large degree. I think he prided himself on it as one of the best things he did in his time. At any rate, if it was not originated by him it was heartily indorsed by him, and I myself have heard him speak of it in private. The whole public service had become to some extent demoralized during the war, and the Indian service had been particularly a reproach to the country; and the idea was that if instead of having influential politicians or other influential people in Congress or out select Indian agents and teachers of Indian schools, as a reward for political service, the religious bodies of the country would propose persons for appointment as Indian agents and teachers and to carry on and conduct the schools, then so far as the schools were concerned it would make a great improvement.

At the same time unquestionably it was founded on a vicious principle. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] says: "What harm does it do to teach an Indian child, just coming out of barbarism, the tenets of some particular religious sect? It is a great deal better than to leave him without any education at all." But the trouble is, you can not do that without exciting a strife between the religious sects for the opportunity of giving that instruction, and without compelling the Government to make a choice between the religious sects, which must stand equal before our law, in making the selection in every particular case.

I suppose there are religious denominations in this country which would take upon themselves the task of furnishing the entire religious and secular education of the Indian children in the country—certainly there is one—and do it very well. I suppose the Catholic Church would do it. I presume the American Missionary Association would do it. They would raise the funds so far as would be necessary beyond Government appropriations. But the result would be an invasion of the principle which lies at the foundation of our Government. You can not expect religious denominations to give religious instruction to children without giving the instruction in accordance with the tenets of their own sects.

There are religious sects in this country and in the world, powerful in influence and large in numbers, which believe that the failure to accept particular statements of faith, views of theology—even if the failure exists from never having heard of them—condemns a person in that condition of unbelief to eternal misery and alienation from the favor of God in this world and the next. How can anybody who entertains such a belief fail to instruct any human being who comes within his influence in the faith which in his judgment is essential to salvation? Therefore the only way is to adhere to the principle of our Constitution, that there shall be no connection between any religious instruction and the state. I never liked that scheme when it was adopted, and I am heartily in favor of discontinuing it as soon as it can be discontinued with justice to the children who are now under process of instruction and to those religious bodies which have undertaken these duties at the invitation of the Government itself. But I think we should carefully provide for the completion of the education of all children whose education has begun under the present scheme.

I suppose it is not necessary for me to say that I have no sympathy whatever with any attempt at exclusion from all the functions or privileges or rights of American citizenship of anybody on account of his religious belief. The Catholic, Congregationalist, Unitarian, Methodist, Episcopalian, as well as all others, stand equal before the law, equal in their rights of American citizenship. If a person is to be attacked because of any supposed bigotry or intolerance, or because his faith, his opinions, are in conflict with American freedom, it should be done not by making religious faith a test of admission to or exclusion from public office, not by making religious faith the reason for giving or withholding the support of political parties or the votes of citizens, but by making the application of the principle to the individual himself. If a person who is bigoted, who is narrow, who owes an allegiance to a foreign potentate which is inconsistent with his allegiance to the Constitution and laws of his own country is proposed for public office or as teacher in a public school, apply your principle to him, but never incorporate into the political creed of any party or into the political conduct of any association of men the doctrine that because of religious faith alone an individual is to be excluded from the functions of American citizenship.

I hope, therefore, that the policy of divorcing the schools of the Government—whether they are the common schools in the States or the Government schools for the benefit of the wards of the nation—of denominational influence or control will go on and will be consummated. But it can not be done in an hour or in a day. If I understand the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] it provides for a continuance of the present scheme to such an extent as will prevent injustice to the persons with whom the Government is contracting or injury to the individual. If I understand the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] it will on the 1st of July next take children from schools where they are now being educated, and where in many instances they have nearly completed their education, and remove them arbitrarily and in a mass to other schools which may be insufficient, and, at any rate, where their education has not so far begun. I am sure the Senator from Kansas does not desire that, and I presume that before he brings his amendment to a vote he will in some way modify it so as to prevent that evil.

I ask that all amendments of which notice has been given may be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I wish to occupy the attention of the Senate as to these provisions long enough to say in reply to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER], who I regret is not in his seat, that it is a mistake to suppose that the Committee on Appropriations, in presenting this bill, did so with the idea or understanding that the children now enjoying educational advantages either at Government schools or at contract schools would be deprived of such facilities by means of the provisions contained in the bill. It will be observed, in the first place, that the Senate Committee on Appropriations increased by $200,000 the amount of the appropriation provided by the other House. It will be observed in the next place that we have increased the appropriation for the construction, purchase, lease, and repair of school buildings and the purchase of school sites $100,000. So there is provided in the appropriation bill for additional public schools $230,000 in round numbers, which may be applied either to the purchase or rent of any of the schools that are denominated as sectarian schools. The committee did intend fairly to provide for such schools as under the provisions of the bill might be discontinued.

It is not true, as stated, that the effect of these provisions will be to discontinue the education of from three to four thousand children. It may be that a certain number of children will be deprived of means of education unless the school buildings can be rented, as in the case suggested by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] and in the case of the Flathead Agency instanced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. It is also a mistake to suppose that these contract schools embrace within them any considerable amount of the money annually appropriated for the education of Indian children.

I have before me a statement which I have collated from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the present year, in which it is shown that there are now educated at the public day schools of the different States 487 pupils, which, by the amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana, will be absolutely deprived of the power of going into schools, because his amendment confines the education of Indian children to National Government schools. It is the consensus of opinion of the Superintendent of Indian Schools, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and those most familiar with the education of Indian children that the best way to educate them is to have them mingle with the white children in the different schools, where that is practicable, and it is practicable to the extent of 500 children during the current year.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. There is no objection whatever to the amendment to the amendment providing that the education shall be given in Government schools or in public schools under the control of the respective States and Territories.

Mr. ALLISON. I only speak of the amendment as proposed by the Senator; and it will be printed in that way unless it is modified.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs was before the Committee on Appropriations and stated that this method of education is growing in popularity not only with the Indian children, but with the schools in the neighborhood of Indian children where the General Government provides for 15 or 20 children, paying a specific amount for the tuition at the schools, and thus enlarge the local schools in the interior of our country.

I will state the number educated at nonreservation Government schools, schools controlled wholly by the Government at this time. Perhaps the average attendance is somewhat less, but at non-Government schools where the school buildings are erected and the schools in operation there is a capacity for 4,673 children. There are Government reservation schools, known as Government boarding schools on the reservation, of a capacity sufficient now to take care of 7,845 Indian children, there being 75 reservation Government schools in all and 19 nonreservation Government schools.

There are upon Indian reservations 110 day schools controlled and paid for by the Government, with a capacity of 4,145, making in all of nonreservation and reservation Government schools and day schools a capacity of 17,150 children—schools which are now wholly controlled by Government expenditure and Government supervision.

Now, let us examine from this same report the Government contract schools and see how they are distributed and what is the character of those schools. All the Government contract schools are enumerated on pages 11 and 12 of the current report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I have not computed the exact number, but I believe there are 39 in all. There are in all these contract schools in the neighborhood of 3,800 pupils. Of these pupils, 348 are in contract day schools mentioned here. I do not know whether they are sectarian; probably some of them are, probably not; but there are 348 pupils in day schools, with an average annual expenditure of from $10 to $30. They do not come within the range of the expensive contract schools—of the contract schools known as boarding schools—where we pay from $108 to $150 per annum for each pupil or for each term of ten months. The Senator from Montana will see that although this appropriation begins on the 1st of July, the school year does not begin until the 1st of September, or in most cases as late as the middle of September, and then it continues only up to July. The school vacation for Indian schools continues from two to three months, as the vacation for other schools is from two to three months.

Mr. PEFFER. Four weeks are regarded as a month.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; four weeks are regarded as a month, I believe.

I have shown that 348 of the 3,800 pupils are in day schools. The largest number in the day schools, according to my recollection, is 25. So these 348 pupils are scattered through day schools ranging from 10 to 25 pupils each.

I find there are of boarding schools 14 where the attendance numbers 50 or under. If anyone will take pains to examine the details, to be found as I have stated, he will see that these small boarding schools are scattered all over the United States, some of them on reservations. I do not know but all of these are on reservations, but they are in California, Arizona, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and so on. Three of them have 60 pupils; one of them has 65; one of them has 70; one of them has 90; four have 95; one of them has 105; one, 110; one, 130; one, 140, and one, 145; making only 1,925 pupils, exclusive of the 348 who are at the day schools.

In addition to that there are, as shown by this report, certain other schools specially appropriated for by Congress which are not included in the pending bill, but have been included in Indian appropriation acts hitherto, at least for one or two years. Among these are included, of course, the school at Hampton, Va., and the Lincoln Institution at Philadelphia, which together have 320 pupils. The Flathead school in Montana, which the Senator from Montana mentioned especially, has 300 pupils. So in addition to the 1,925 classified as I have shown, the larger portion of them being at schools where there are 70 pupils or less, there are a few schools specially provided for in other appropriation acts and not included in this bill.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs said to us that he did not believe there would be any great difficulty in providing for most of the children at these schools if he had an additional sum of money. He admitted that it would be somewhat inconvenient to do so, but with $100,000 additional he could practically provide for them all.

Mr. President, it is a mistake to suppose that this school system of ours, especially as respects contract schools, had its origin a quarter of a century ago. It had its origin with the Hampton school, as I remember. There was before that time no contract school. It was never dreamed of by President Grant during his whole term of service. The idea was that the religious people of our country should have the control and direction of these Indians; that they should become the agents and employees; and that the patriotic and charitable people connected with the different churches would themselves establish mission schools whereby religion should be taught as well as secular education. But it was never supposed or dreamed that I know of during the period of his term of office that there should be what are known as contract schools. Some time ago there was a great massacre in the Indian Territory or in that neighborhood. It was the Wichitas and Cheyennes, was it not? The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] will remember.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It was.

Mr. ALLISON. Three hundred of those Indians were transported under military authority to Pensacola or some place in Florida. They were there three years in prison, practically under the military authority and under the care of Captain Pratt. When they were to be removed some twelve or fifteen of those people desired to be educated. They were not children; I believe all of them were mature men and women. Some place was sought in the Northern States were these adult Indians, whose hands were red with the blood of white men, could have an opportunity to learn, if you please, the rudiments of our English language, and to be educated as respects our civilization. How many applications were made I do not know, but Hampton Institute had been organized by the State of Virginia as a normal and agricultural school for the education of the colored race in order to fit them to go out among their brethren in the South and educate them in the common schools, and Hampton Institute, with General Armstrong at its head, said: "Bring your 15 Indian people here and we will educate them as best we may." Captain Pratt landed them at the Hampton Institute, and the Government paid for the cost of their keeping and their education there. Captain Pratt remained there a year, training and educating those Indians. Then it was for the first time that the idea was projected into our policy of carrying away from the reservations and from the homes of the Indians the young children who were roaming over the plains of the West.

It was my fortune, Mr. President, to visit the Sioux tribes in 1875. I saw there as intelligent and enlightened men as respects their judgment and their brain power as any set of men I have seen. But I saw at their agencies more than 1,100 children playing upon the high plains without a single schoolhouse within 50 miles of them, although in 1868, under the treaty which was made by General Sherman and ratified by Congress, we agreed that from the day of its ratification we would provide them with schools for all the children between the ages of 7 and 16 years. Yet schools were not provided for them. In a report which I made to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs as a member of an Indian commission, I stated as my belief then that the best way to execute the obligation which we had made to those Indians would be to segregate the young people from the wild tribes and educate them as white children are educated. That was not done. But afterwards a few of those and a few belonging to other tribes were found at Hampton.

After Captain Pratt had remained at Hampton, I believe, one or two years he separated from that institution and established the institution at Carlisle, which has been so well and so ably managed by him from that time to this. It will be seen by the roster, if I may call it so, of the Indian schools that Captain Pratt's school has a capacity of 800 pupils. But within two weeks he has told me that he has 1,200 in his school. His policy is to allow the young Indian children to go out among the farmers at intervals and earn wages, and come in at other intervals and receive the benefits of the school at Carlisle. So the policy of making contracts began at Hampton and was pushed at Carlisle for some time.

The Senator from Massachusetts alludes to the growth of this policy. That growth is largely to be attributed to the Senator's late colleague, Mr. Dawes, who was chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and who, in season and out of season, begged the Committee on Appropriations for a constant increase of the appropriation for the education of Indian children.

Mr. HOAR. I spoke of the contract with religious bodies for the education of Indian children.

Mr. ALLISON. The contract with religious bodies came after Hampton and after Carlisle. I have here a table showing that up to eighteen hundred and——

Mr. HOAR. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Iowa in his very interesting statement, but I think perhaps I may claim a little of the credit of that change for myself without boasting or vanity.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt the Senator is right about that.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to say, if the Senator from Iowa will pardon me, that I made a speech on the subject of the Indian question before my colleague, Mr. Dawes, went upon the Indian Committee, in which I gave, after a great deal of study, the entire cost of the Indian wars from the beginning of the Government, and showed that it would have been cheaper for the Government to have supported all Indian children of school age and put them into costly schools, they being then, of course, hostages for the good behavior of their parents, than it would be to defray the cost of the Indian wars. In that speech I quoted from the report of my honorable friend the Senator from Iowa himself, who was then as now a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and moved an appropriation of $2,000,000 that year for Indian education.

The Senator from Iowa replied then that, while he recognized the obligation which he had stated in his report, it was utterly impracticable to expend so large an amount on Indian education in a single year, because the teachers were not there, the schools were not there, the machinery was not there. He said if I would make it, I think, $300,000—I have forgotten what the sum was, but it was a very great advance on what was ever granted before—he would support it. He did support it, and that amendment, supported by the Senator from Iowa, with which I had become the means of stirring him up a little, was the first large increase of the appropriation for Indian education. I do not know whether my friend remembers that or not, but it is the fact.

Mr. ALLISON. I do remember it very well.

Mr. HOAR. So the first large increase which originated the present policy of Indian education, taking all the children we could get from a particular band and putting them into a school, was due to an amendment to an appropriation bill which the Senator from Iowa himself espoused, and which without his great influence in the Senate never would have gone through.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts. I remember very well his remarks upon that occasion and his array of facts as to the cost of Indian wars, and especially the Indian war which followed our failure to carry out our obligations to the Sioux tribe. I remember also his amendment and my promise to aid him. That only reenforces what I was about to show from a table which is found in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. In 1877 we appropriated only $20,000 for the education of Indian children. In 1881, four years later, we appropriated only $75,000. Then we began to increase the appropriation. I think that was about the time the Senator from Massachusetts pressed upon us the importance of Indian education. We then began to increase the appropriation until, in 1886, we appropriated $1,100,000. The largest appropriation made was in 1893, when we appropriated $2,315,612. So, from 1881 to 1893 we increased our appropriations for the education of the Indian tribes from $75,000 to $2,315,000. If you will compute the appropriations made in the pending bill, you will find that they are equal to the largest appropriation that has ever been made for Indian education, I think, although I have not computed it with accuracy.

Mr. President, the education of the children of our Indian tribes has been a growth, and it has been a rapid growth. It has grown so that from a small number of children there are 23,000 children educated under the provisions of our laws, 18,000 of whom are educated at Government schools and schools under the immediate control of the Government. So the progress we have made in educating Indian children has been the progress of the appropriations made by the Government.

There is one result that I think has followed it, although I have not examined it with care, except to see what has been the result for the last two or three years. As the Government increased its benefactions to the Indian tribes for educational purposes the donations, if you please, or collections for education by means of private munificence, have correspondingly diminished. So, although this expense is nearly $2,300,000 by the Government there is less than $200,000 provided for the education of all the children at the mission schools, if you call them mission schools. When Senators come to examine this whole system of education they will find that the Government has made the chief provision.

If injustice has been done, if we have not made adequate provision here for the support of the contract schools, the proposed change is not one which was first inserted in this bill, but which was proposed two years ago, and agreed to by both Houses at that time. This provision is simply in pursuance of what we did then. We then solemnly declared that the Government of the United States should itself provide for the education of Indian children under its own authority and under its own direction at the earliest day practicable. We have, therefore, segregated these schools with a view to show that it is within the power of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in my belief, to provide for most, if not all, of the Indian children who are now at the contract schools. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] reminds me that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs stated before the committee that that could be done.

As to Hampton, I voted to strike out the provision in relation to that school, because the information I had at the moment, and which was before the Committee on Appropriations, led me to believe that Hampton was a sectarian school within the reasonable purview of the statute, but I have since had ample information to convince me that it is not sectarian in any sense. I think Lincoln Institute at Philadelphia is a little nearer to being so, but I think that, too, may be fairly excluded.

So the Committee on Appropriations, in endeavoring to adjust the differences of views and opinions as to this great subject of Indian education, had not in mind the idea that we were turning any Indian child out of a school or that we were depriving any Indian child of an opportunity of receiving an education under the provisions of this bill. If it can be fairly shown that that would be the effect of our action I, for one, am willing to make just provision in order that that may not happen.

Mr. ALLEN. In view of the fact that we can not get through with the discussion of the Indian appropriation bill to-night, I ask the Senator from South Dakota to yield to me to have the bill for the holding of a transmississippi exposition at Omaha taken up.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am very desirous of disposing of the appropriation bill. I presume there are no other speeches to be made upon the pending question, and I think we might have a vote upon it.

Mr. ALLEN. From the fact that I saw the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] getting together a pile of books, and other Senators getting up data, I concluded that probably there would be more speeches.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to submit an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Iowa seems to object to the word "National" in reference to the Indian schools.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator is mistaken; I do not object to the words "National Government schools."

Mr. CARTER. To what does the Senator object, then?

Mr. ALLISON. I stated to the Senator that using that phrase might prevent the children who are now attending the State schools from attending the national schools. If the Senator prefers that language, I do not object.

Mr. CARTER. In order to meet the objection of the Senator from Iowa, which, by possible construction, might exclude the public schools of the country, for which I have a reverence which will compare equally with that of any Senator on the floor, I suggest that the word "National," in line 10, be stricken out immediately before the word "Government," and after "Government" the words "or public" be inserted; so that the amendment will read "Government or public schools."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The amendment of the Senator from Montana has not been printed. It is made up from a printed amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] originally, doctored to suit the Senator from Montana, and now it is proposed to amend it again. For one I confess that I do not understand it. Had we not better adjourn and think over it? Let the amendment be printed as it is now proposed.

Mr. CARTER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Montana will be printed as modified, in the absence of objection.

Mr. TELLER. I ask leave to offer an amendment to the pending bill, to come in at the top of page 51, and I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the proposed amendment be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. TELLER is to insert at the top of page 51 the following:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Uncompahgre tribe of Indians, and with the Indians residing upon the Uintah Reservation in the State of Utah, and with any other Indians, for the surrender of any portion of their respective reservations, or for such modification of existing treaties as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, any agreement thus negotiated being subject to subsequent ratification by Congress, $15,000.

TRANSMISSISSIPPI EXPOSITION AT OMAHA.

Mr. ALLEN. I now ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill 1306, displacing the pending measure merely temporarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1306) to authorize and encourage the holding of a transmississippi exposition at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1898, and making an appropriation therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. The bill has been read.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to suggest one or two amendments to the Senator from Nebraska. I wish to strike out section 5, and to substitute for it an amendment which I will send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendments have not yet been acted upon.

Mr. ALLEN. Let the committee amendments be first acted on.

Mr. ALLISON. I will withhold my amendment for the present.

The first amendment reported by the Select Committee on International Expositions was, in section 1, line 3, after the word "transmississippi," to insert "and international"; and in line 6, after the word "transmississippi," to insert "and international"; so as to make the section read:

That a transmississippi and international exposition shall be held at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1898, under the auspices of the Transmississippi and International Exposition Association: Provided, That the United States shall not be liable for any of the expense attending or incident to such exposition nor by reason of the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 3, after the word "transmississippi," to insert "and international"; and in line 8, after the words "fifty thousand dollars," to strike out:

And for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, there is hereby appropriated for said building or buildings, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause a suitable building or buildings to be erected on the site selected for the transmississippi and international exposition for the Government exhibits, and he is hereby authorized and directed to contract therefor, in the same manner and under the same regulations as for other public buildings of the United States: but the contract for said building or buildings shall not exceed the sum of $50,000. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to dispose of such building or buildings, or the material composing the same, at the close of the exposition, giving preference to the city of Omaha, or to the said Transmississippi and International Exposition Association, to purchase the same at an appraised value to be ascertained in such manner as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, beginning in line 1, to strike out: "That for the purpose of paying the expense of transportation, care, and custody of exhibits by the Government and the maintenance of the building or buildings hereinbefore provided for, and the safe return of articles belonging to the said Government exhibit, and other contingent expenses to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury upon itemized accounts and vouchers, there is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided"; and in line 16, after the word "aggregate," to fill the blank by inserting "250."

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I offer my amendment to the amendment of the committee. My amendment covers the striking out of the whole of section 5 and inserting what I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 5, and in lieu thereof to insert:

The United States shall not be liable on account of said exposition for any expense incident to or growing out of same, except for the construction of the building or buildings hereinbefore provided for, and for the purpose of paying the expense of transportation, care, and custody of exhibits by the Government and the maintenance of the said building or buildings and the safe return of articles belonging to the said Government exhibit and other contingent expenses to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury upon itemized accounts and vouchers; and the total cost of said building or buildings shall not exceed the sum of $50,000, nor shall the expenses of said Government exhibit for each and every purpose connected therewith, including the transportation of same to Omaha, and from Omaha to Washington, exceed the sum of $150,000; amounting in all to not exceeding the sum of $300,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Select Committee on International Expositions was, in section 6, line 4, after the words "sum of," to insert "ten."

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to suggest to the Senator that that amendment be not agreed to; and that instead of "$10 per day" there be inserted "a reasonable sum to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. ALLEN. That is agreeable, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 6, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the words, "the sum of ten dollars per day," and insert, "a reasonable sum, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the section be read as it will stand if amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be read as it will stand if amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the commission appointed under this act shall not be entitled to any compensation for their services out of the Treasury of the United States, except their actual expenses for transportation and a reasonable sum, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, for subsistence for each day they are necessarily absent from home on the business of said commission. The officers of said commission shall receive such compensation as may be fixed by said commission, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, which shall be paid out of the sums appropriated by Congress in aid of such exposition.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Select Committee on International Expositions was, in section 7, after the word "transmississippi," at the end of line 2, to insert "and international"; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That medals, with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions commemorative of said transmississippi and international exposition and of the awards to be made to the exhibitors thereat, shall be prepared at some mint of the United States, for the board of directors thereof, subject to the provisions of the fifty-second section of the coinage act of 1893, upon the payment of a sum not less than the cost thereof; and all the provisions, whether penal or otherwise, of said coinage act against the counterfeiting or imitating of coins of the United States shall apply to the medals struck and issued under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, line 4, after the word "Transmississippi," to insert "and International"; so as to read:

SEC. 8. That the United States shall not in any manner, nor under any circumstances, be liable for any of the acts, doings, proceedings, or representations of said Transmississippi and International Exposition Association, its officers, agents, servants, or employees, or any of them, or for service, salaries, labor, or wages of said officers, agents, servants, or employees, or any of them, or for any subscriptions to the capital stock, or for any certificates of stock, bonds, mortgages, or obligation of any kind issued by said corporation, or for any debts, liabilities, or expenses of any kind whatever attending such corporation or accruing by reason of the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported to the preamble will now be stated.

The Select Committee on International Expositions reported to amend, in line 2 of the first clause of the preamble, after the word "transmississippi," by inserting "and international"; so as to make the clause read:

Whereas it is desirable to encourage the holding of a transmississippi and international exposition at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1898, for the exhibition of the resources of the United States of America and the progress and civilization of the Western Hemisphere, and for a display of the arts, industries, manufactures, and products of the soil, mine, and sea; and

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the last clause of the preamble, in line 1, after the word "Transmississippi," to insert "and International"; in line 3, after the words "day of," to strike out "August" and insert "June"; and in line 4, after the words "day of," to strike out "October" and insert "November"; so as to make the clause read:

Whereas the Transmississippi and International Exposition Association has undertaken to hold such exposition, beginning on the 1st day of June, 1898, and closing on the 1st day of November, 1898: Therefore.

The amendment was agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize and encourage the holding of a transmississippi and international exposition at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1898."

BLUE MOUNTAIN IRRIGATION AND IMPROVEMENT COMPANY.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to call up a local bill, which is very short, and which I think will occasion no debate. It is Senate bill 1468.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1468) extending the time allowed the Blue Mountain Irrigation and Improvement Company for the construction of its reservoirs and canal in and through the Umatilla Reservation, in the State of Oregon. It proposes to extend for five years the time prescribed by the act of Congress approved January 12, 1893, for the construction and completion of the irrigation ditch or canal and reservoirs of the Blue Mountain Irrigation and Improvement Company across the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT IN ALABAMA.

Mr. CHANDLER. It has been my desire for some time to call up the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] for an investigation into the Alabama election. I understand the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is not well, and therefore I have not pressed the resolution, but there is an order of the Senate allowing the minority of the committee to submit their views against the passage of the resolution. I am desirous that that minority report shall be made, and I ask the Senator from Delaware if he can tell me how soon it will be made?

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, it should have been made and would have been made before this but for want of time on my part to prepare it, as it was rather intrusted to me to do. I have been delayed the last two or three days by the illness of the Senator from Alabama, with whom I was to consult with regard to the report, but I shall endeavor to have the report in early next week.

Mr. CHANDLER. I always want to extend all possible consideration to the Senator from Delaware, who is well, and the Senator from Alabama, who is sick; but I really wish that that minority report might be made, as the majority report was made some three or four weeks ago.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 13, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 10, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LATE HON. WILLIAM COGSWELL.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, April 18, 1896, beginning at 1 o'clock, be set apart for paying tribute to the memory of William Cogswell, late a member of the House of Representatives from the Sixth district of the State of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

HARRIET C. GREGG.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2006) to increase the pension of Harriet C. Gregg, widow of Col. John Irvin Gregg, from $30 to $50.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the pension of Harriet C. Gregg, widow of John Irvin Gregg, late colonel of the Eighth Regiment of United States Cavalry, be, and the same is hereby, increased from $30 per month to $50 per month, and the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place her name on the pension roll at the rate of $50 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McCLELLAN. We had better have the report read, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TALBERT. I just want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if it has been considered at a Friday night session?

Mr. MAHON. The report is long, and I can make a brief statement that would answer as well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAHON. Colonel Gregg, this officer, served in the Mexican war as a private until he was promoted to the office of lieutenant. He went into the Regular Army and served in the Indian wars on the frontier. At the breaking out of the war of the rebellion he was placed in command of a brigade of cavalry, known as the famous Gregg Cavalry. He commanded the brigade throughout the war, and was engaged in all the battles in which the Army of the Potomac was engaged. He died in 1892. This lady had been his wife from 1847 to 1892. He left his widow without any property or any means of support.

Now, this old lady, I am authorized to say, is in destitute circumstances, and we are asking an increase of this pension not to $100, but from $30 to $50 a month. We have pensioned the widows of many generals as high as $100 and $200 a month who never rendered as much service to this country as this man did.

Now, this is very little to ask for, to give this widow $50 a month; and she does not ask for more. My only reason for asking unanimous consent, and not waiting until the case could be called up, is because it is so far down on the Calendar that it will never be reached at this session and, therefore, on account of the destitute circumstances of this woman, the widow of this gallant soldier, I ask that the measure may be considered now.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to say to the gentleman that so long as it is in my power, no officer's widow shall have her pension thus increased. In saying this, I do not desire to single out this case as one specially for objection, but I avail myself of that opportunity, and I object.

Mr. MAHON. I will take the same opportunity with the gentleman.

Mr. LOUD. You will have to wait a long time.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 8109) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I give notice that to-morrow, after the approval of the Journal, I will ask for the consideration of the bill.

CHOCTAW COAL AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 2141, to amend an act approved August 24, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize purchasers of the property and franchises of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to organize a corporation and to confer upon the same all the powers, privileges, and franchises vested in that company."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the power to construct and operate branches, including those mentioned in section 2 of this act, conferred in and by section 4 of the act approved August 24, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize purchasers of the property and franchises of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to organize a corporation and to confer upon the same all the powers, privileges, and franchises vested in that company," shall be exercisable in the Indian Territory only after maps showing the location of such branches shall have been filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. That the powers conferred by said section 4 shall extend to branches intended to aid the development of any coal or timber territory contiguous or tributary to the lines of railroad of the said Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company, whether owned or controlled by said company or by others, said branches not to exceed in length 5 miles, and to the construction and operation of a branch from any point on its existing line of railroad to the northern line of the State of Texas, and for this purpose the said company shall have the like rights, powers, and franchises, as to the acquisition of a right of way and depot grounds, and as to the construction and operation of the said branch, and shall be subject to the like conditions and restrictions as it possesses or is subject to under or by virtue of the provisions of the said act of August 24, 1894, as to the line of railroad acquired or constructed thereunder.

SEC. 3. That the line of railroad which has been heretofore constructed shall be regarded and treated as a full compliance by said company with the requirements of the act applicable to it, by which it was required, as a condition of further construction thereafter, to complete its main line prior to February 18, 1896, and said company may exercise from time to time the rights, powers, and franchises heretofore or by this act conferred as to further extensions of or branches from its existing line.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman whether this bill has been considered by any committee?

Mr. FLYNN. Yes, sir. A like bill was introduced and favorably reported by the House committee, and the committee have recommended the substitution of the Senate bill for the House bill, they being alike.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Does not this bill propose to authorize one corporation to transfer or assign its corporate rights to another?

Mr. FLYNN. No. I will state for the information of the gentleman and of the House that the report explains this matter quite clearly, and if I be permitted to read a few lines of it I think they will understand just what is the intention of this bill. It was drawn to meet the objection of the President, who, at the last session of Congress, required an agreement to be made that this legislation should be asked for by the railroad company. The report says:

The act of August 24, 1894, gave the company power to construct these branches, but the act did not in terms require the filing and approval by the Secretary of the Interior of maps showing the lines and locations. Before the President would sign the bill passed August 24, 1894, he required Mr. Gowen, the president of the company, to agree that he would not construct nor attempt to construct any of the branches contemplated by the act until the bill had been so amended by another Congress as to require maps to be filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior. This section is intended to meet that objection, and to keep that promise made to the President.

This is the bill approved by the Department, to meet the suggestion of the President.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Has the Secretary of the Interior approved this bill?

Mr. FLYNN. Yes, sir. The bill originated there and was prepared in order to comply with the President's requirement.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McRAE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. FLYNN, the House bill (H. R. 5975) was laid on the table.

JOHN S. BURWELL, ADMINISTRATOR.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, being the bill (H. R. 7816) for the relief of John S. Burwell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John S. Burwell, administrator of the estate of A. L. Burwell, deceased, such sum of money, not exceeding $1,499.56, as shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to have been expended by him, or by Thomas and John Peale as agents for him, in the purchase of tobacco stamps used to stamp tobacco held by said agents for him and inventoried according to law: Provided, That the said Commissioner is satisfied that said tobacco was manufactured prior to July 20, 1868, and that the internal-revenue tax imposed by law prior to said date had actually been paid thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to reserve a point of order on the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, in explanation of this bill, I will state that in 1868, as the gentleman from Maine well knows, the law was changed with reference to the payment of the tax on tobacco. Prior to that time, when tobacco was shipped from the factory to an agent, it was required to be shipped tax-paid, unless a bond was given for the payment of the tax. On the 1st of July, 1868, the law was changed so as to require the stamps to be put on the box of tobacco itself. At that time this tobacco had been shipped to Ohio to an agent of the Burwell manufactory, which was situated in Franklin County, Va. They required him at that time to go and get the manufacturer's stamps and put them on the tobacco. He had shipped the tobacco without giving bond. The evidence is clear that he paid the tax twice—first when it was shipped from the factory, and then when he was required to buy the stamps and put them on the tobacco. This bill has been submitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and it has been reported favorably by different committees of Congress. The pending bill is a substitute which the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under a former Administration recommended should be passed in place of the original bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman have that communication from the Commissioner read?

Mr. SWANSON. I will ask the Clerk to read it from the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, January 26, 1889.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 17th instant, and of its inclosure of a copy of a bill (H. R. 9774) for the relief of the estate of A. L. Burwell, together with certain affidavits and other papers in support thereof. These inclosures are herewith returned to you.

You ask for such information as the records of this office may disclose, and for such recommendation as I may see proper to make in the premises.

The bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John S. Burwell, administrator of the estate of A. L. Burwell, deceased, the sum of $1,499.56.

From an examination of the papers you inclosed it appears that this sum of $1,499.56 is the aggregate amount paid for tobacco stamps sold by the collector of the Sixth district of Ohio to Thomas and John Peale, of Lynchburg, Ohio (who were agents for A. L. Burwell & Co.), between April 14, 1869, and March 18, 1872; and it is alleged that these stamps were used to stamp tobacco manufactured by said A. L. Burwell prior to July 20, 1868, and that the tax imposed by law in force prior to July 20, 1868, had previously been paid thereon.

In reply I have to remind you that the act of July 20, 1868, made a radical change in the mode of collecting the tax on tobacco. Then the present system of paying the tax by the purchase and use of stamps denoting the tax on the tobacco at the time of its sale or removal from the factory premises was substituted for the previous system of making returns of sales by the manufacturers or their agents, and of assessments and collections based on those returns.

Prior to the act of July 20, 1868, the law and regulations prescribed that goods sent by a manufacturer to his agent were regarded as being still in the factory. In such case the tax was not due until the goods were sold or removed from the agent's hands.

The fair presumption, therefore, is that the tax imposed by law prior to July 20, 1868, was not paid on that tobacco; and that a second tax was not paid by the use of stamps denoting the tax, that were purchased by said agents subsequent to that date.

Therefore, in order that the Government may have opportunity to fully examine the matter, I respectfully suggest the following as a substitute for House bill 9774:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John S. Burwell, administrator of the estate of A. L. Burwell, deceased, such sum of money, not exceeding $1,499.56, as shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to have been expended by him, or by Thomas and John Peale as agents for him, in the purchase of tobacco stamps used to stamp tobacco held by said agents for him and inventoried according to law: Provided, That the said Commissioner is satisfied that said tobacco was manufactured prior to July 20, 1868, and that the internal-revenue tax imposed by law prior to said date had actually been paid thereon."

Yours, respectfully,

E. HENDERSON,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. GEORGE E. BOWDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrosed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SWANSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GRANT OF LANDS TO COLORADO SPRINGS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 1317, to grant certain lands to the city of Colorado Springs, Colo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described tracts of land, situate in the county of El Paso and State of Colorado, namely, that part of Pikes Peak Military Reservation described as follows: Beginning at corner numbered 2 as designated in the field notes of the United States military reservation survey, and running thence along the boundary line of said reservation, south sixty-six degrees west, 7,700 feet to corner numbered 3 of said survey; thence north thirty-eight degrees fifty-five minutes west, 8,240 feet to corner numbered 4 of said survey; thence north nineteen degrees twenty-five minutes west, 8,680 feet to a point on line 4-5 of said survey; thence east 2,160 feet; thence south forty-four degrees forty-seven minutes east, 14,136.4 feet; thence north sixty-three degrees thirty-nine minutes east, 2,400 feet to the northwest corner of the Colorado Springs reservoir grant; thence south twenty-six degrees twenty-one minutes east, 2,595 feet along west line of said grant to a point on line 1-2 of said reservation survey; thence south sixty-three degrees thirty-nine minutes west, 363 feet to corner numbered 2, the place of beginning; also the southeast quarter of section 14, and the east one-half of section 23, and the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 26, and all that portion of section 13 lying west of said reservation, and all that portion of section 24 lying west of said reservation, and the north one-half of the northwest quarter of section 25, and all that portion of the northeast quarter of said section 25 lying west of said reservation, and all that portion of the northeast quarter of section 14 lying west of said reservation, all in township 14 south, range 69 west, of the sixth principal meridian, containing 3,097.48 acres, more or less, be, and the same are hereby, granted and conveyed to the city of Colorado Springs, in the county of El Paso and State of Colorado, upon the payment of $1.25 per acre by said city to the United States, to have and to hold said lands to its use and behoof forever, for purposes of water storage and supply of its waterworks; and for said purposes said city shall forever have the right, in its discretion, to control and use any and all parts of the premises herein conveyed in the construction of reservoirs, laying such pipes and mains, and in making such improvements as may be necessary to utilize the waters contained in any natural or constructed reservoirs upon said premises.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will ask the gentleman how many acres are to be conveyed under this bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. About 3,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. They are not mineral lands?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir; they are not mineral lands. They are lands which it is desired to acquire for the purpose of increasing the water supply of the city of Colorado Springs. That city has now about 20,000 population and is increasing rapidly, and its water supply is inadequate. It has become necessary to get some reservoir sites, and these lands have been selected. Enough land is taken for the reservoirs and also sufficient additional to prevent the contamination of the water. The lands are really worthless for any other purpose. They are not timber lands; they are not fit for agricultural purposes; they are nothing but rocky barrens, and the price at which they are sold to the city is far in excess of their value to anybody else.

A MEMBER. What is the price?

Mr. SHAFROTH. A dollar and a quarter an acre.

Mr. CANNON. Whereabouts are they situated?

Mr. SHAFROTH. About 8 or 10 miles from the city, on the western slope of Pikes Peak. They are above Manitou—up in that direction.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this an abandoned military reservation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; there are no houses or anything of that kind on it; it is nothing but a barren waste.

Mr. LACEY. Photographs of the sites have been examined by the committee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; photographs were exhibited to the Committee on Public Lands; and they have unanimously recommended the passage of the bill. The bill received the sanction of the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, and was passed by that body.

Mr. CANNON. The bill if enacted will grant this land for reservoir sites for water supply, and for nothing else?

Mr. SHAFROTH. For nothing else.

Mr. CANNON. If the land ceases to be used for that purpose it will revert to the Government?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think so. I understand that such would be the legal effect.

Mr. BOWERS. The land is worth nothing at any rate except for this purpose.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. The question is on ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. I have just received a petition relative to this bill, which I desire to have read, and then I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. LACEY. This is a favorable petition, I understand, and why consume time in reading it?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. I wish, after the petition is read, to offer a small amendment. I do not oppose the bill.

Mr. LACEY. What is the nature of the amendment?

Mr. DINGLEY. Unanimous consent was given to the consideration of the bill as it stood.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Some farmers on the stream below do not want this grant to interfere with their prior rights to water from Bear Creek. I therefore wish to ask the adoption of a small amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This can not interfere with them, at any rate.

Mr. DINGLEY. If amendments are to be offered the whole character of the measure might be changed. Consent was given to the proposition as embraced in the bill. It seems to me, under the circumstances, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] should not yield for an amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I can not yield for the amendment.

Several MEMBERS. Let us have the previous question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHAFROTH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SAMUEL M'KEE.

Mr. EVANS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 467) for the relief of Samuel McKee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Samuel McKee the sum of $1,718, for expenses incurred by him in a contest for his seat in the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. COLSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 467) to pay to Hon. Samuel McKee the sum of $1,718 for expenses incurred by him in a contest for his seat in the Fortieth Congress, from the Ninth Congressional district of the State of Kentucky, have had the same under consideration and submit the following report:

Your committee find that said McKee's right to a seat in the Fortieth Congress was contested by Hon. J. D. Young; that issues were joined, evidence was taken, and a hearing was had before the Elections Committee of the House, and that the seat was awarded to said McKee.

The committee further find from the proofs in the case that the said McKee in his said contest incurred, necessarily, expenses amounting to the sum of $1,718, as appears from the itemized account of the said McKee duly verified.

It further appears that no part of said sum has ever been paid.

The committee also find that Hon. John D. Young has been paid the sum of $2,509 for his expenses incurred in said contest.

This claim was before the Committee on Elections of the House in the Forty-eighth Congress, and was favorably acted upon by said committee, but no action was had by the House.

Your committee would therefore report back the bill and recommend that it do pass.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for an explanation of the bill, with the view of ascertaining why there has been so long delay in the settlement of this claim.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. McKee, whom I know well, and who lives in my district, was elected to the Fortieth Congress—a long time ago, it is true. His seat was contested by Mr. Young. The House decided in favor of Mr. McKee. Mr. Young's expenses were paid. For some reason, I do not know what, Mr. McKee's expenses were not paid. From that time to this, occasionally, one House or the other upon a favorable report has passed a bill similar to this; but thus far no bill of this kind has passed both Houses at the same Congress. This gentleman is very poor; nobody needs the money more than he does; and I entreat the House to let this bill pass, because these expenses were actually incurred and have not been paid, though the expenses of the contestant who failed to show his right to the seat have been paid.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is Mr. McKee living?

Mr. EVANS. He is. He lives in my city. I know him well.

Mr. COX. From what committee does this bill come?

Mr. EVANS. From the Committee on Claims. I hope no objection will be made to its consideration and passage.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman examined to see why the Fortieth Congress (which sat pretty nearly a generation ago) did not pay this successful contestant?

Mr. EVANS. I have not examined that matter and can not make any statement in regard to it. I only rely upon what the Committee on Claims has found. These claims have been audited and approved by the Elections Committee.

Mr. CANNON. What Elections Committee?

Mr. EVANS. I do not know; the committee of that House, I presume.

Mr. CANNON. Can not some member of that committee inform us on that point?

Mr. EVANS. It was not the Committee on Elections of this House; it must have been the Committee on Elections in that Congress.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know anything on earth about this case. I do not know of any reason why this money should not be paid to this man, nor do I know any reason why it should be.

Mr. EVANS. The report of the committee is favorable.

Mr. CANNON. But it seems the committee is not prepared to give us any information whatever.

Mr. EVANS. The gentleman who reported this bill, Mr. COLSON, is at home on leave of absence, I understand.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. COX. Before that question is put, allow me a word. This case has been favorably reported from the Committee on Claims. There are quite a number of these claims, reaching back, like the present one, for some years. At the last Congress all of these were embodied in a single bill by the committee, and submitted to the House. The present Committee on Claims have examined them very carefully, and find the accounts itemized as the law provides, and therefore a favorable report was made in this case to which the gentleman from Kentucky now refers. It did not come from the Committee on Elections at all, I will say to the gentleman, but must come from the Committee on Claims. It is one of the claims of this character, of a number probably embracing a half dozen or more, which have been reported favorably by the committee.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Is the gentleman a member of the Committee on Claims?

Mr. COX. I am, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment in that connection?

In 1878 there was legislation enacted for the first time which limited the amount that contestants or contestees in election cases could receive to $2,000. Theretofore and up to that time the most liberal policy had obtained in payment of the expenses in contested elections. I think up to that legislation that as a rule we paid five, six, or eight thousand dollars, and in the opinion of Congress it became necessary to restrict the amount in such cases.

Now, this bill goes back to a period of twelve or fourteen years prior to the enactment of the legislation to which I refer, and I have not yet heard from the Committee on Claims the statement that they have gone back and examined the debates to see whether the claim was taken up, why it was rejected, and why it was not paid if presented, or what possible reason could be assigned for allowing his election expenses to a contesting member who was refused his seat when the member who was allowed to retain the seat was denied his. The presumption is that the Fortieth Congress would do justice to a member of its own body who was present and had a vote. But the men who constituted that Congress are all dead or absent, and we are in receipt of no accurate information touching the origin of the claim or any of the facts in connection with it to show why it had not been paid before.

Now, I should not have made this remark were it not that the gentleman from Tennessee has already notified us that this is another Trojan horse that is to open up another line. All I claim and all I ask, so far as I am concerned, is that this matter shall go to the Committee of the Whole House, and I am perfectly content that on Friday of next week, when the House goes into the consideration of private bills, it should be privileged for consideration. In the meantime I hope the matter will be duly examined by the Committee on Claims, if that order is made.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, a moment only in reply to the gentleman from Illinois. I am aware when the act was passed that limited the compensation in these election contests to $2,000; but the Committee on Claims, in the examination of these matters, went further than that. They would not pass or permit any claim to be reported favorably unless it contained an itemized statement of the expense incurred. This claim, for some reason or other, I do not now recall what, has been delayed. As my memory serves me, I think the bill was introduced many times, though——

Mr. EVANS. And favorably reported both in the House and Senate for many years.

Mr. COX. And I am neither advocating nor opposing the bill, but simply stating the facts as they appear of record with regard to the action of the committee. I am perfectly willing that the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois may be adopted. This, however, is not such a Trojan horse as the gentleman seems to apprehend. There are only about four or five of these cases in all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PITNEY. I object, for the purpose of enforcing the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois.

J. J. LINTS.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 145) for the relief of J. J. Lints.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to pay to J. J. Lints, of Syracuse, N. Y., the sum of $1,289.33, in full for his services as custodian of the public property at Erie, Pa., from the 8th day of April, 1857, to the 10th day of September, 1859, inclusive.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, the claimant in this bill performed public services for the United States in 1857 as custodian of property in Erie, Pa. This property consisted of timber, and during a very severe storm some damage was done and a portion of the timber was washed away, he not having a sufficient force of help at his command to keep it in order and protect it; and his pay, on account of the loss, was stopped to the extent of $1,289.33. In 1860 a report was made to the Secretary of War by an officer of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, in which it is shown that this man was employed as the custodian of the property, and the services were performed, and that the amount to which I have referred was improperly retained from his pay by the Government.

This claim has been before Congress, I think, in eight or ten different sessions, in every one of which there has been a favorable report from the Committee on Claims, and in three Congresses the bill passed one House and failed to pass the other.

This man is now 85 years old, and is an inmate of the poorhouse in the county in which he resides. If any relief is ever to be afforded to him it must be done now. I do not believe it possible for him, from my knowledge of the man, to live to obtain justice unless we pass the bill promptly. I hope, in consideration of the facts, therefore, as the report is very clear, that no gentleman will object to its present consideration.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Is this money going to the individual or the county officers?

Mr. POOLE. I would say in answer to my colleague's question that this is going to the individual; and, further, that this man is well educated; that he has a standing in the community; that he is in his old age a pauper, depending upon public charity, and this money would relieve him of his present necessities—money that is properly due to him. And, further, I should say that there is no one living that he can look to for aid or support. His wife is in a distant State, cared for by some relatives, and there is no one to help him where he resides.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Why was the pay withheld?

Mr. POOLE. For this reason, that he was the custodian of this public property at Erie in 1857. The property was timber, and during a very severe storm, when he had no help to take care of it, it was lost. The value of the timber lost was estimated at $1,289.33, which was kept back from his compensation. He was only paid $2 a day; and that represents the whole case.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to inquire in reference to this case, as I remember it very indistinctly, having been on the Committee on Claims heretofore, but it seems to me, as I now recall it, that this man, as it was alleged, did not perform the duty which he was required to perform, and that in consequence of his neglect the Government lost this property.

Mr. POOLE. That was the charge, Mr. Speaker, but the charge was disproved by the report of the topographical engineer, who decided that it was not his fault, and if the gentleman will read the report carefully he will find that to be the case.

Mr. LOUD. But my recollection is that the reports are very conflicting as to that. My recollections are, as I say, vague about it, but I recollect opposing this case myself in the Committee on Claims. I do not remember the full merits of the case.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, this claim has been before ten different committees, and every one has made a favorable report. They have done so largely on the reports made by the topographical engineer.

Mr. LOUD. Reports mean very little sometimes.

Mr. POOLE. I am aware of that, but I think there is no such charge to-day, and I think the Committee on Claims are fully aware of the merits of the bill.

Mr. LOUD. I do not know that I shall object, but I am satisfied that there was dereliction of duty. He did not perform the duty for which he was employed.

Mr. POOLE. He had no assistants.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PITNEY. I should like to ask what tribunal settled the question at the time, whether this man's pay should be charged out of his pay with this timber loss, as alleged, by his neglect?

Mr. POOLE. It was kept back by the officers of the Treasury Department who had charge of that particular work. Just who they were, I can not now state.

Mr. PITNEY. When was the first application made to Congress?

Mr. POOLE. In 1860, in the Thirty-sixth Congress.

Mr. PITNEY. According to an official paper contained in the report of this committee, it seems that the amount of that claim was only $881.

Mr. POOLE. If you will read all the report carefully you will find that there were different reports made. The entire aggregate was $1,289.

Now, I will say, Mr. Speaker, that in the last Congress, for some reason unknown to myself, the Committee on Claims did reduce the amount to $1,000; but the committee of the present Congress, after looking over the facts in the case, recognized the fact that this man had been unjustly kept out of his pay for thirty-five years, and realizing the fact that he is now an old, broken-down man, recognizing the justice of the claim, and believing that if he was entitled to anything he was entitled to the original amount, they have reported in favor of allowing the original amount, which is $1,289.33.

Mr. PITNEY. Is that the amount carried in this bill?

Mr. POOLE. Yes.

Mr. PITNEY. I think it ought to be reduced to the amount due at the time.

Mr. POOLE. That is the amount due at the time. There is no interest or anything of that kind. That is the exact amount found due by the Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. POOLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, before that is done——

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer a little innocent bill, which carries no expense to the Government.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I wish to ask for the reprint of a bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I withdraw the demand for the regular order long enough to allow the gentleman to obtain a reprint of his bill.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I ask for a reprint of the bill H. R. 7860, the supply having been exhausted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me, to allow me to ask for the consideration of a bill which carries no money?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to comply with the request of the gentleman, but the same trouble will arise immediately again, as there are forty gentlemen here who desire to obtain recognition.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. I do it in the hope of getting some pension business before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the regular order.

FILLED CHEESE.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8008) defining cheese, and also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of "filled cheese," and pending that motion, I desire to inquire of the friends and opponents of the bill if we can agree on a limit of general debate on the bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Pending that, I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio as to how long, if he knows——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is submitting a proposition as to time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to submit a proposition to the House to limit general debate to two hours. The bill will have to be read afterwards, under the five-minute rule.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that I do not think that will accommodate gentlemen who desire to speak upon the subject. In that connection, I will also state to him that there is no disposition whatever, and I do not think there will be any, to prolong debate unnecessarily. There is a minority report on this bill, and it is not a partisan question at all; but there are other gentlemen than those on the committee who desire to speak upon the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What proposition does the gentleman from Tennessee make?

Mr. McMILLIN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that for the present we should allow the debate to run, and later, a little later, and during the day, we can fix a limit to debate, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman from Virginia, and others have appealed to us for time; and I think that there will be no difficulty in coming to a conclusion within a reasonable time as to the length of time to be consumed in debate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would very much like to have this debate go along. The bill ought to be disposed of to-day, and we can only sit until 5 o'clock.

Mr. McMILLIN. But the gentleman will remember that we have gone along by unanimous consent until we have consumed about one-fifth of the day that can be devoted to other business. I can assure the gentleman that there is no disposition whatever to prolong unnecessarily the debate on the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 4 o'clock this afternoon. It seems to me that ought to be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited until 4 o'clock this afternoon. Is there objection?

Mr. PICKLER. Pending that, I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio as to——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPKINS and others. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I move that general debate on this bill be limited to three hours.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before any action is taken, will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to ask whether it is proposed to divide the time equally between the friends and opponents of the bill, taking into consideration the time that has already been consumed on the part of those in favor of the measure?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8008; and, pending that, moves that all general debate be limited to three hours.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask that the gentleman make it 5 o'clock, so that we close general debate to-day. That will bring us to consideration under the five-minute rule the next session. [Cries of "Oh, no!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. There would be no opportunity to obtain a vote on the bill to-day.

Mr. McMILLIN. None at all. I do not see how you can get to consider it within one hour if general debate is closed at 4 o'clock.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will suggest to my colleague on the committee that there are several members of the Committee on Ways and Means who have not had a hearing on this bill who desire to speak; and it seems to me that to limit debate to three hours might cut them off.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, Mr. Speaker, I want to do what is desired. I will make the proposition that general debate close at 5 o'clock and that the previous question be considered as ordered to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. McMILLIN. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that. That fixes the time when the previous question shall be considered as ordered before the consideration of the bill is entered upon in Committee of the Whole, and we may not even get through the reading of it in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; not at all. There will be two hours to-morrow.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman surely does not think we can get through with the consideration of the bill in two hours under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, then, Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate on this bill be closed at 4.30 this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole the gentleman from Ohio moves that general debate be closed at 4.30 this afternoon.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GROSVENOR. And on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rose to make a motion to amend.

The SPEAKER. On that motion the gentleman from Ohio demands the previous question. The gentleman from Ohio has the right to demand the previous question.

Mr. HOPKINS. And the House has the right to vote it down.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the House chooses to do so, it has that right.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, my friend will not encounter any difficulty in limiting debate on this bill and the conclusion of its consideration in a very reasonable time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I have made every reasonable proposition, and the gentleman from Tennessee has used every means to prevent its success; and I insist on this question. The House can vote it down if it chooses.

Mr. HOPKINS. The only point is this: I do not propose to talk on this bill, but I know several of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means have prepared themselves to speak upon this subject; and it has always been the custom, so far as I know, of this House that the members of the committee should have their hour if they saw fit. Now, the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, that would be seventeen hours.

Mr. HOPKINS. Suppose it is. Suppose it takes seventeen hours. This is one of the most important bills that comes before this House at this session.

Mr. CHICKERING. That is why it ought to be passed.

Mr. HOPKINS (continuing). And it ought to be fully debated, and if it takes one or two days more I do not see that it is any injustice.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This debate is all out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the previous question——

Mr. DINGLEY. One moment. I suggest to the gentleman, my colleague on the committee, that he ask unanimous consent to close general debate at 5 o'clock, without going further. I think there is only half an hour involved.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am willing to do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that general debate upon this bill close at 5 o'clock to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. PICKLER. Pending that, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PICKLER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The gentleman from Ohio demands the previous question on his motion that general debate close at half past 4 o'clock to-day.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOPKINS and others asked for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 107, noes 31.

So the previous question was ordered.

The motion of Mr. GROSVENOR that general debate close at half past 4 o'clock was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for further consideration of the bill was then adopted.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HULL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for further consideration of the pending bill. By a vote of the House, general debate will close at half past 4 o'clock to-day.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed with the argument, I wish to inquire whether any gentleman opposed to the bill desires to have charge of the time for debate in opposition to the bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. I understand that the gentleman who occupied the floor yesterday evening occupied it thirty-one minutes. I shall want a little time, not a great deal, in my own personal right.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I presume the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me to say that there are a good many more gentlemen who desire to speak for the bill than there are who oppose it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I thought the gentleman, by limiting the debate so closely, was cutting off some of his friends.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My proposition is that the remaining time be equally divided, and that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] have charge of the time in opposition.

Mr. McMILLIN. The other side being charged with the time already occupied by it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think not.

Mr. McMILLIN. I understood the gentleman to say that he would agree to that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the short time I proposed had been accepted I was willing to agree to that, but I am not now. I will say to the gentleman that of the members of the Ways and Means Committee not more than three who are present will oppose this bill, and of the members of the same committee not fewer than eight or nine will favor it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the gentleman say that not more than three will oppose the bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not more than three members of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. McMILLIN. You were never more in error in your life.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well. Possibly I may be in error all along the line, but if so I have the satisfaction of knowing that I am very often in company with the gentleman from Tennessee. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. There will not be fewer than six members of the committee who will oppose the bill.

Mr. BRUMM (to Mr. GROSVENOR). At any rate, why not stand by your agreement that the time consumed on your side should be charged against you in the division of the remaining time?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why did not gentlemen accept my proposition?

Mr. BRUMM. It was agreed to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all. My proposition was objected to.

Mr. BRUMM. But the objection was made by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, it was. I want to see an end of this thing and to get some pension legislation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was compelled to force the conclusion of the debate. My proposition was rejected all along the line.

Mr. BRUMM. But it was rejected by the friends of the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. By gentlemen on both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless there is an agreement made, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to control half the remaining time and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] to control the other half.

Mr. McMILLIN. I hardly think, after half an hour was consumed yesterday on one side and with so short a time allowed today for the discussion of this important measure, that the even division of the remaining time is quite equitable. However, whatever the Chair does I shall, of course, cheerfully abide by.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no power to arrange these difficulties, and as no agreement has been come to by the gentlemen on the opposing sides, there is nothing left for the Chair to do but to divide the time equally.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is a provision for the control and management by the Federal Government of the manufacture, exportation, and sale, in every form, of the commodity known as "filled cheese." Filled cheese, Mr. Chairman, is the designation of a food product that is somewhat new to a large majority of the American people. I therefore shall begin by describing it very briefly, and will then proceed to explain the lines upon which this legislation proceeds and the reasons why, in my judgment, this class of legislation is justifiable and applicable to the particular subject-matter of this bill.

Filled cheese is a food product manufactured from milk and neutral oil. The process is that of taking the milk of the cow and by a modern process extracting from the milk all butter fat, leaving the milk simply skimmed milk—nothing else. Seventy per cent of this milk and 30 per cent of neutral oil constitute the product known as filled cheese. The neutral oil is manufactured from the leaf lard of the hog. The process of rendering and preparing for use is by the application of heat. There was some dispute in the testimony before the committee as to the degree of heat that has been applied to the commodity. In the beginning of our investigation it was stated that about 120° of heat were applied and that this was not sufficient to render the article digestible. The weight of the evidence, however, places the degree of heat at a point very considerably higher.

Now, in the first place, a few words about the history of this legislation so far as this bill is concerned. The first bill on this subject was introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOK] and was No. 3010. It was introduced on the 28th day of December last. Later, on the 31st of January, House bill No. 5213 was introduced by Mr. WILBER of New York. The two bills went to the Ways and Means Committee, and were subsequently referred to the subcommittee, which proceeded early in February to notify the dairy interests of the whole country that hearings upon this question would be had by the subcommittee. After a full hearing of all comers—whoever desired to be heard—hearings were practically closed in such time that the bill might have been reported back to the House a long time ago (I do not undertake to fix the exact period of time). I may say in this connection—and I do it for a reason that will be apparent later on—that there was but one opponent to this legislation who ever made his appearance before the committee. All the friends of the legislation from Ohio to the Rocky Mountains came, through their agents, and had a patient and full hearing before the committee. A single gentleman from the State of Illinois came there and in a most respectful manner and conservative language opposed the passage of the bill, defending the product, of which he was a manufacturer, "filled cheese," from the assertion that it was deleterious to public health and simply inveighing in mild terms against the proposed legislation. Outside of that gentleman, so far as I now remember, not a single opponent of the bill was heard by the committee.

A very great amount of misunderstanding, however, grew up in the country as to the promptness and energy and purpose of the committee; and so at last there began to come to us telegrams and circulars and letters with all sorts of demands, claiming that the committee was not acting with promptness, and finally claiming that the committee had made a bill that was injurious to the dairy interests—a measure which would not promote the cause for which we had enlisted.

At this point in my remarks I will print a circular letter issued by the Ohio Dairy Association, condemning the committee and making specific charges against us; and I will in the same connection put in a reply to that circular which was written by a distinguished gentleman connected with the Agricultural Department, showing in what manner the mistaken idea had gotten abroad:

OHIO STATE DAIRY ASSOCIATION, March 26, 1896.

DEAR SIR: In 1894 the United States exported cheese to the value of only $7,180,000, a decrease in fourteen years of 40 per cent.

In 1894 Canada exported cheese to the value of $15,500,000, an increase in fourteen years of 400 per cent.

Owing to our weak and inefficient laws favoring manufacturers and exporters of adulterated goods the markets of the world have lost confidence in our cheese.

The Canadian Government have laws prohibiting the exporting of any but full cream cheese; thus the confidence and demand for the Canadian products.

Hon. D. F. WILBER, of New York, has introduced a bill in Congress known as "the Wilber filled-cheese bill, No. 5213," restricting the manufacture and practically prohibiting the exportation of filled cheese.

This bill is indorsed by leading dairymen, farmers, and all interested in the reputation of our food products.

The subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee have reported another bill to Congress, which is directly against the interests of producers and consumers, and would legalize and promote an industry which has already nearly ruined the reputation of American cheese.

We earnestly urge every farmer and others interested in pure food products, and their reputation in the markets of the world, to send at once a telegram, letter, or postal card to their Representative in Congress, insisting that they support the Wilber filled cheese bill, No. 5213, together with the amendments as suggested by Mr. WILBER.

The oleo and filled-cheese interests are represented in the national capital, backed by millions of money, demanding legislation favoring adulterated products. Do not despair. The voice of the millions of yeomanry, through pointed, personal letters to our lawmakers, must and will be heeded.

Keep an eye open for legislation, State and national, touching the farming interests. Be prompt to let your Representative know your position. Honest demands, backed by the voice of the people, dare not be disregarded.

This circular is issued by order of the Ohio State Dairy Association, which has carefully examined all features of the Wilber filled cheese bill, and consider it a measure of vast importance to the dairy and pure-food interests of the country.

L. N. BAILEY, Secretary.
T. F. HUNT, President.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., April 2, 1896.

MY DEAR SIR: To-day I have received the circular of your association, dated March 26, and signed by yourself and Secretary Bailey, about filled cheese legislation by Congress.

I am sorry about it. Evidently somebody has been sending out very misleading information.

There has been an unseemly strife here for the rôle of leader in the anti-filled cheese crusade. If all who profess to desire action upon this really important matter had pulled steadily together on the main issue, leaving details to be fixed by the proper committee, the matter would have been in much better shape at the present time.

And now, with the prospect of a bill being favorably reported to the House, instead of efforts to unite all opponents of cheese frauds in its support we find divided counsels and these sensational appeals to "down the committee" and its bill There could be no greater mistake.

The bills introduced upon the subject were duly referred to the leading committee of the House and placed in charge of a subcommittee, of which the chairman is General GROSVENOR, the most experienced and influential member of your own State delegation. I have followed the hearings of this committee and believe that it has endeavored in all respects to do the fair thing.

Neither of the bills referred to it would answer the purpose. The simplest way was to combine their merits and remedy their defects by a new draft. While such a substitute has been prepared by Mr. TAWNEY, it has not yet been reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, and no one has a right to denounce it in advance of its appearance in perfected form.

The original draft of Mr. TAWNEY does not suit me in some particulars, but this is not time to pick flaws. In my opinion it is full as good a bill as WILBER'S, better in some respects, and I think the description given of it in your association circular is extremely erroneous and unjust.

I have seen no evidence whatever of improper influences or even of very active opposition to this general plan of legislation in the interest of honest trade in cheese on the part of the filled-cheese and oleo people.

It is certainly absurd and worse than unjust to accuse this committee or the subcommittee having this subject in charge of being under such influences.

Moreover, this effort to discredit this committee and its expected bill in advance and to organize opposition to it on the floor of the House is impolitic to the last degree.

The most carefully constructed and influential committee of the House has had this matter under deliberate consideration and is about to arrive at a conclusion. The character and intentions of this committee can not be challenged. Serious opposition to what this committee deems the best present action on the subject is morally certain to defeat, for this session at least, and probably for this Congress, all remedial legislation on the filled-cheese fraud.

Of course my position is such that I must not "officially" take any part in the matter aside from furnishing information, as instructed at the Department or called for by Congress. But a private letter to you, as a personal friend, can do no harm. I felt impelled to express my regret that your association has been induced, probably by misrepresentation, to take what seems to me such injudicious and injurious action.

With personal regards, very truly, yours,

HENRY E. ALVORD.

Prof. THOMAS F. HUNT,
President Ohio State Dairy Association.

For the information of General GROSVENOR, chairman of the subcommittee: Somebody is trying to make trouble, as is unfortunately successful in some places.

Respectfully,

HENRY E. ALVORD,
Chief of Dairy Division.

The purpose of the committee had been to report a bill made up of the best provisions, in our judgment, of both the bills to which I have referred and with some improvements suggested by what we had learned or thought we had learned through the investigations in the committee. The bill which we have submitted to the House has been reported with the assurance first that it is a more equitable and just measure than either of the others. It is also a more drastic provision, in our judgment, in the right direction, with some limitations of a conservative character that will render the bill less obnoxious to the assaults of its enemies and make it quite as effective if not more so for the purpose for which it has been framed.

Mr. BRUMM. I should like the gentleman to give me some information on this point: The committee in their report state that in 1893 the number of factories in the United States making this commodity amounted to about 265, and the total product to 14,000,000 pounds; while in 1896 there were about 100 factories and the product amounted to 12,000,000 pounds. Can my friend tell me why this decrease? How does he account for it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I dislike very much to turn aside at this point——

Mr. BRUMM. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought he was about to sit down.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] will yield, I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can answer; but I prefer to do it a little further on.

Mr. BRUMM. I will wait.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, the legislation provided in this bill is along the line and practically identical in legal principle with the oleomargarine bill. The committee has been very careful to adhere with considerable tenacity to the line of that bill, because it was an enactment anomalous in our legislation; it was passed in this House after a long struggle, in obedience to a popular demand, was submitted to the severest tests of litigation in all the courts of the country, clear up to the Supreme Court of the United States, and finally in all its essential provisions was held to be legal and constitutional. So, inasmuch as the evil sought to be remedied here is practically the same evil as was the promiscuous manufacture and sale of the oleomargarine product, the committee thought it wiser to pursue the beaten pathway of settled and established precedent than to go into untried fields and imperil the legislation which we sought to make effectual.

We are learning a great deal in this country, Mr. Chairman, on that subject, and I may refer, in passing, to a current event. In the great State of New York, with all of its mighty intelligence and wisdom in legislation, yet they seem to have just discovered that a law revolutionizing their whole regulations on the subject of excise or liquor traffic has turned out to be not in any respect what it was expected to be, or to perform the functions which it was expected to perform, but has succeeded in destroying a whole line of valuable legislation that the legislators of that State themselves did not understand they were assailing; and they even accidentally, as is said, repealed a law regulating the sewerage system of one of the great counties of the State. I refer to it not for the purpose of criticism or reflection upon the system, but to show how the statesmanship of to-day, if it can accommodate itself in the enactment of needed reforms by following the lines of well-settled principles of law, so that the legislation enacted can become at once effective, it will be recognized by the public as binding and conclusive, and will be obeyed as a lawful decision of the highest authority in the country, and not become, as we so often find it in other cases, at once the target for litigation, objection, and dispute.

Now, what is the proposition and what the necessity of the pending legislation? The product of filled cheese is manufactured, as near as I can now recall the figures, at the cost of about 4½ cents a pound. Incidental to the manufacture of cheese is the creamery butter manufacture. The butter fat is extracted from the milk and made into butter, and the refuse of the milk is put into this cheap article of food. Now it is claimed by the friends of this legislation that the product is seriously deleterious to the health of the human species. There is strong evidence in the record tending to estabish that fact, but there is contradictory evidence; and upon the whole case I think that a conservative view of it would be this, that it is a product unnatural, that it is a chemical combination that is not consonant, and that it is not so healthful an article of food as pure cream cheese or full milk cheese, and that under many circumstances it may be seriously detrimental. I do not go to the full extent of the opening statement in this case made by General Hatch, of Missouri, but there is sufficient evidence in this record to raise a doubt as to the general healthfulness of this product, and in any event there is sufficient evidence to make it imperative that it should be sold for what it is and not for what it is not.

It is one of the duties of the hour, Mr. Chairman, not only in Congress but in the State legislatures, to do all that is possible for legislation to do to protect the producer of any article of food product against the imposition of counterfeit or fraudulent articles of the same species, and it is the duty of legislation in all its branches to protect the consumer of food products against the purchase by him, innocently or unknowingly, of fraudulent articles under the guise of pure food products—articles essentially different from that which he thinks he is buying and for which he is required to pay. It is precisely on that principle that the oleomargarine act was passed. Not that the best and purest of the oleomargarine product was deleterious to human health, not that it is a crime to produce it, except where it is inveighed against by statute, but that the public—the purchasers, the consumers—should be protected against the imposition of a spurious, fraudulent, or counterfeit article.

Now, in the case of cheese it becomes vitally important that the producer of pure cheese—of the cheese of this country—shall have the chance of the markets of the country and of the world open to him, and shall not be affected injuriously by the introduction into those markets of a counterfeit or spurious article, cheaper in its production and ruinous to the market itself. We charge here, on the evidence in the case, that the introduction of this article into the markets of this country and its exportation abroad have been largely conducive to a practical ruin of the American trade in the pure article. And it has been evident to the satisfaction of the committee that that condition of affairs exists. It has been shown in practice. It has been done fraudulently and viciously, as the record abundantly shows. The real article can not be produced at an average, I think, of perhaps less, according to the testimony before the committee, than about 9 cents a pound, so that this product costs only about one-half as much, and yet we find that the system—I am not talking now of an occasional invasion of fair dealing—but the system has made it possible for the product to grow as it has grown here; that it is manufactured and sold as a fraud, that is to say, it is put on the market as a fraud under the similitude of the dairy cheese of the country, wrapped just as cheese is wrapped, boxed the same, and placed in the same manner on the market without a single identifying mark upon it to indicate its fraudulent character.

It is put upon the market in enormous quantities, and there are large sales of it made each year in the markets of the country. We have evidence here that is indisputable that the fraudulent dealer—the dealer who proposes to deal in fraudulent cheese—orders from the commission house, where this product is sent by the manufacturer, what is known as "filled cheese;" but he directs that it shall be branded as full cream cheese; "Orange County full cream cheese," "Badger State full cream cheese," or whatever brand is best adapted to his market, or that which has acquired the best reputation in the market where this fraudulent dealer operates, and he orders that brand to be put upon it. The fraudulent commission merchant who supplies the dealer puts this brand upon it and sends it to him, and through him it goes out to the consumers.

Mr. OTEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question just there—if this bill does not license the very fraud which he claims he is trying to prevent?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I will come along to that presently. But let me answer the gentleman at once with reference to his suggestion. We are not licensing the manufacture or trying to avoid the manufacture of filled cheese, but we are trying, and that is the purport of this legislation, to avoid the sale of it under a false name—that is to say, we are trying to avoid the sale of it as full cream cheese, thereby permitting a fraud upon the public, and that is an answer to the whole question. We do not license its manufacture, and we do not prohibit its manufacture. We neither promote it nor discourage it, and we say to the manufacturers of the filled cheese, "Make just as much as you please, manufacture all you please; but when you come to manufacture it the first thing you shall do will be to tell the truth about it, and at every step of the way along the line you shall continue to tell the truth about it." [Applause.] That is all there is of it. That is the principle of the oleomargarine bill. We do not license the making of oleomargarine, but we say, "You shall sell it for what it is"; and that is the first step toward honest dealing in this product.

Now, what has been the effect? We had a very large foreign demand for our cheese. And I may turn aside here at this point in the line of an argument that I heard this morning of a most interesting character. Very many of the products of our country have names that have become more valuable than the plants in which they are manufactured. I was told this morning that in the great whisky producing State of Kentucky there might be a quarter of a million of dollars invested in a plant for the manufacture of whisky, and it would not be worth 10 cents on the dollar as compared with a plant that cost no more or greater sum, but which for twenty-five years or upward had been establishing the character of its products in the market. And it is the brand of the article that makes its value, and not alone its cost of production. Now, in the States of Wisconsin, Ohio, Illinois, New York, and other States—I am only referring to a few by way of illustration—the manufacturers of cheese have builded up the character of their article by a long and patient adherence to the rule of honest dealing. They have manufactured a full milk cheese. They have branded it truthfully. They have entered the market and sold it honestly, and the market has grown until the fraudulent dealer recognizes it and orders from the fraudulent commission merchant the putting of a fraudulent brand upon this fraudulent cheese. It is put upon the market by the fraudulent dealer, and he at once becomes the controller of the market, through the reduced cost of the cheese, and, while putting money in his own pocket, destroys the value of the product of the man who for twenty-five years, perhaps, has been building it up as an honest dealer in an American product.

Mr. Speaker, I will consume as little time as possible. For the purpose, and I may say for the sole purpose, of eradicating that evil and forcing by law an honest manufacture and an honest sale of this commodity we have proposed this legislation. I will not go over the details of the bill.

Mr. BRUMM. I think it would be unsafe for you to go over the details of the bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, there is one thing to be said. Always while the gentleman from Pennsylvania is near by, nobody need fear that the details will not be carefully examined. There are some amendments which the committee will propose at the proper time, possibly unimportant, but in order to meet the views of some of the friends of this legislation; and there are other amendments which will be offered, probably, which the committee can not consent to.

Now, in general terms, this is the proposition of the law. The manufacturer of filled cheese will pay a tax upon his business of $400 a year. We put it $200 less than the oleomargarine tax, because the object has not been in this bill to destroy the manufacture nor yet to lessen it.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him just one question for information?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. In advocating the passage of this bill does the gentleman not advocate the licensing of what he considers to be a very grievous wrong?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for information.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not been happy in my expression, or the gentleman would have understood me.

Mr. TALBERT. I understood the gentleman to say that the dealing in filled cheese was an evil and he wants to crush it out; but he wants to pass a bill legalizing it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, the gentleman only wants me to repeat what I have already fully stated. I will now place it in language that I am sure the gentleman from South Carolina can understand. This bill does not license the manufacture at all; but for the purpose of placing the Government in a position to compel the regulation and manufacture and sale it charges a tax upon the manufacture.

Now, secondly, it is not claimed in this legislation that the manufacture and sale of filled cheese is an evil. Therefore we have not licensed it.

Mr. TALBERT. It seems that the gentleman makes a distinction without a difference?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman's mind may be without a difference. We do not say that it is an evil to manufacture it. So far as this legislation is concerned, it may be that it is not an evil to manufacture it, it is not an evil to sell it, it is not a very great evil to eat it. I should not like to eat it, with my knowledge of it. We say you shall not manufacture it as something else, and you shall not sell it as something else, and you shall not sell it to a man to eat as something that it is not.

Mr. TALBERT. You mark it so that it can be known what it is. I am asking for information.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, that is all right; I have given the gentleman information.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I have not fully read this bill. I understand that this fixes a tax of so much a pound?

Mr. GROSVENOR. At 1 cent a pound.

Mr. CANNON. And then fixes the license for the wholesale merchants.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Fixes the tax for the manufacturer, the wholesaler, and the retail dealers.

Mr. CANNON. Now, why not fix the tax at one-tenth of a cent a pound and make the license tax a dollar instead of $200. In other words, why not put a brand on this article for what it is, and then prevent the selling of it for something else, and not interfere with the people who make a product that other people think is a good product to buy?

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is an argument that ought to be made in the form of a speech against this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I am not making a speech against the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That relates, as I have said, to the details of this bill, and not to the general principles to which I am talking at this time. I am not trying at this time to discuss the propriety or impropriety of the licenses, forfeitures, or fines of this bill. I can say to the gentleman, in a general way, that the high tax upon oleomargarine—and we have been guided largely by that—has not only not suppressed the manufacture nor curtailed the sale nor limited the profit, but under the provisions of that law the manufacture has largely increased, although in fewer hands; the quality has greatly improved, and the consumption has largely increased, and, at the same time, returns to the Government about $1,000,000 of actual revenue upon the business. We have put these licenses far below the oleomargarine law—far below—the most of them I think two-thirds. The propriety of it probably lies in the fact that this commodity has been used fraudulently in the country, and is cheaper, as I was going on to say, largely so, than the price of that article and is enormously profitable to the manufacturers. Therefore these charges that we put upon it are a bagatelle in comparison to the sale of the article, that costs 4½ cents a pound, nearly up to the full price of pure cheese in the market.

Mr. CANNON. It was in the best faith that I interrupted the gentleman, desiring to get at wise legislation; and by way of suggestion I would elicit information, and if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. GROSVENOR. The propositions that you are making are well worthy of consideration.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me a minute, I want to state in connection with this discussion, and it will not take me more than a minute or two——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. My experience touching the tax on oleomargarine. I voted for it without much understanding of what oleomargarine was. Now, since that time I have regretted that the oleomargarine tax is as high as it is, for the reason that it interferes with and places burdens upon an industry which your constituents and mine are greatly interested in, namely, the growing of cattle. This matter interferes in the first place with the product of hogs, as I believe neutral lard takes the place of butter in the milk or the cream in the milk.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is right.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I have no hesitation in saying that oleomargarine is a product which is consumed by all, and that it is better than the average product of butter produced in the country; and for that reason much criticism, and I have thought just criticism, has been used in connection with the oleomargarine legislation—that it puts a tax of 2 cents upon the people who use it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And therefore I should be opposed to making the license so high. I fully agree in such legislation, if we have power to make it, and I suppose we have, as will brand this and all other products so that they will tell the truth; but there I want to stop. Certainly no man in the House ought to be opposed to putting a tax upon this product at the minimum and the license at the minimum, so that an industry shall not be burdened.

Mr. BRUMM. Place the tax at the minimum and the penalty at the maximum.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The experience of the oleomargarine law has been that after all the high taxation and penalties the manufacturers of that product have gone right on making vast profits and violating the law in every possible way that they could. The evidence before our committee, which it has had in its hearings, is that the law is violated a thousand times a day in the city of Washington.

Mr. McMILLIN. If that is true is it not a proof that your efforts here to proceed with the destruction of this industry by taxation will be wholly unavailing?

Mr. GROSVENOR. We do not want to "proceed to the destruction of this industry." The gentleman is using language that has no application here.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on this point of the high rate of license and tax, 1 cent a pound upon the manufacture of filled cheese in this country, with the licenses provided for in this bill, if the consumption is not to be greater than it was during the last year, will not amount to any very considerable sum above the expense of the administration of the law. Take a retail dealer who pays a license of $40 a year, and who sells, perhaps, 100 pounds of filled cheese every day—a very low estimate for a retailer of that commodity—and assuming that the consumer pays the tax, it amounts to a dollar a day upon the consumption. You have got to have something in the form of taxation that will point out these places, regulate their construction, investigate their modes of procedure, and make the business as nearly respectable as it can be made. It is not a very high-toned business in any country that makes an article in the similitude of a well-known food product and, even when the name is printed upon it, steals the form and part of the name of the genuine product and puts the imitation upon the market in that way.

Now, I have gone over the principles of this bill. It is not intended to give to the manufacture and sale of filled cheese the indorsement of the Government. It neither indorses it nor condemns it. It neither licenses it nor prohibits it; but it aims, all along the line, under the power of the legislative department of the Government, to levy this tax, to make it absolutely certain that in this country these fraudulent practices shall cease. I will put into my remarks an illustration of the operation of this business, showing the destruction of our foreign market for cheese and the declarations of dealers in foreign countries that it has been the introduction of this fraudulent cheese that has driven the product of our farmers out of the markets of England, Ireland, and Scotland. So vicious has this matter become that the Dominion of Canada, which is a large exporter of cheese to England and other foreign countries, has prohibited as criminal the manufacture and sale of this imitation cheese, and a large number of the States of the Union have done the same thing.

The gentleman need not be afraid that Congress is going to run into the teeth of public sentiment upon this subject. The great State of New York, with its magnificent dairy interests, has made it a crime to manufacture or sell this imitation cheese, and the commission merchant in Chicago or Cincinnati who handles this article for the foreign market is compelled to ship it through the State of New York, but dare not sell a pound of it there. The States of Wisconsin and of Minnesota have also made it a criminal offense to manufacture or sell this article.

Mr. CHICKERING. And at this session of the Ohio legislature there has been similar legislation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; the State of Ohio has made a regulation to insure the honest handling of the article. That, I believe, is as far as we have gone.

Mr. BRUMM. Have any of the States taxed it as you propose to tax it in this bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not so largely.

Mr. BRUMM. Anywhere near as largely?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; and I do not know but that some of them have taxed it even more largely. In many of the States, however, they have made it a crime to manufacture or sell the article, and the courts of your own State have upheld the regulation——

Mr. BRUMM. As to oleomargarine, yes. Now, will the gentleman be kind enough to answer the question I asked him?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman asked me why there was a slight falling off in the production of this article between 1894 and 1895.

Mr. BRUMM. Fifty per cent falling off in the number of factories.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The same is true of oleomargarine. There are vastly fewer oleomargarine factories now than there were when the oleomargarine law went into effect, yet the production of the article is much greater than it was then. That is because the law has driven the manufacturers into the production of a better article. Fewer men can engage in the manufacture now, because of the tax; but larger plants are employed, because they can manufacture on a larger scale and pay the tax. It has come to our knowledge that one man owns 30 filled-cheese factories; but after awhile perhaps those will all be consolidated into one. This accounts for the reduction in the number of places where the article is manufactured; and the reduction in the number of factories has been accompanied by an improvement in the quality of the article produced. We had evidence relative to the operation of the oleomargarine law, as the gentleman will remember, showing that very much of the materials that went into oleomargarine was absolutely villainous and poisonous. That condition of things has been relieved by our legislation. We have evidence now that some of the matters that enter into filled cheese are as objectionable as those which entered into the manufacture of oleomargarine, but we know that the quality of oleomargarine has been improved by the legislation upon that subject, while the product has not been increased in cost to the consumer. The only answer I can give to the gentleman's question as to why the manufacture has been reduced in quantity is that so many of the States are prohibiting its manufacture and sale. With that, however, we have nothing to do here.

Mr. CHICKERING. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that whereas 12,000,000 pounds were manufactured in 1895, it is estimated that 18,000,000 pounds have been already manufactured between the 1st of January, 1896, and the 1st of April, 1896.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Showing that the growth of the manufacture is rapidly augmenting.

Mr. BRUMM. The table that I have referred to runs up to 1896.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Up to 1896, but it does not include any part of 1896. I need not appeal to the House on this subject. Gentlemen understand the matter quite as well as I do. There is a demand for this legislation from every dairy-promoting community in the Union. The demand is unanimous from these producers with the bare exception of the few who are engaged in the production of this article. If, nevertheless, this demand is unjust and unreasonable, the universality of the demand ought not to control our action. But if upon the whole case we are compelled to say that this legislation is simply in the line of fair and honest dealing—simply in the line of giving to the public the fullest knowledge of that which they are buying—then the fact that there is a universal demand from our constituents for such legislation ought to be conclusive of the action of every member of this House.

Mr. PICKLER. Do the butter makers object to this?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not heard anything of the kind. The interest of the agriculturists is the interest of the common people of this country. If we have prosperity, it must be cornerstoned by agriculture. If we dominate as a nation on the face of the earth, we must dominate because of the strength and integrity of our agricultural interests. Too much of our legislation has omitted the farmer; too much of our legislation has been bestowed upon others and not upon him. Representing as I do an agricultural district, I stand here identifying this interest as an agricultural interest. I recognize the principles upon which this demand is made as true and faithful exponents of good legislation and as justice between man and man. Singular it may be, but its aim is honesty. Anomalous it may be, but its purpose is to do the fair thing among the people of the country. A nation that will not deal honestly will never prosper. A nation which does not promote fair dealing will be driven from the markets of the world.

Because I believe this provision is one of wisdom and justice and fairness, justified by legislative precedent, upheld by the judgment of the courts, and in the interest of the great mass of the American people, I sustain the report of the committee and shall support the passage of this bill.

[Mr. GROSVENOR took his seat amid loud applause.]

Mr. McMILLIN. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. OTEY].

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Chairman, I think this measure ought to be entitled, "A bill to manufacture crime." Sir, we have enough crime under human and divine laws without the House of Representatives undertaking to manufacture more. The purpose of all civilized countries ought to be to curtail crime rather than to increase it.

I am opposed to this bill, first, because it enlarges the scope of the internal-revenue system, which in my opinion it is our duty to curtail, cut off, and get rid of as soon as possible. It is laying the mailed hand of taxation on the people, which it should be our duty to relax and remove. What do we see now? When we get up in the morning we draw on a pair of socks that are taxed; we put on our undergarments, every thread of which is interwoven with taxation. We draw on our clothes, every pocket of which is full of taxation, and nothing else.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question, as I answered his question?

Mr. OTEY. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What commodity do you find in your pockets in the morning that is the highest taxed by the Government?

Mr. OTEY. I did not exactly understand the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman said that we got up in the morning to find our pockets full of taxed articles.

Mr. OTEY. I did not say that.

A MEMBER. "Full of taxation, and nothing else."

Mr. GROSVENOR. I thought the gentleman said taxed articles. I thought he referred to something that had been left over the night before, upon which was levied a high tax.

Mr. OTEY. I am ready to yield to the gentleman at any time for a question. If I had two or three hours, I would answer every one of his questions, for I think I could do so. Throughout my whole life I have made it a point when I go about a mule always to stay in front of him, never to get behind him. [Laughter.]

I was going on to say—the gentleman interrupted me right in the middle of my beautiful allegory—we get up in the morning, we go to the washstand, and there we pick up a cake of soap that is imprinted with taxation; we go on and wash, with a bowl and pitcher, the towel, the toothbrush, and everything about which is taxed except the water. We go and sit down to our table and our knives, our forks, our spoons, our cups, our saucers, our tablecloths—everything on that table is taxed except, perhaps, the sweet milk and the cheese, "filled cheese," if you please, as no one, it seems, can discern the difference except by an internal-revenue stamp.

You get up and you walk across a tax-ridden carpet. Everything around you—sunshine and shade—everything you see, everything you feel, everything you taste, everything you hear, single or married, young or old, all, all are taxed, taxed, taxed! Even the nails in the coffin are taxed. And when you go to put the tombstone over your friend or relative that is taxed. [Laughter.]

And now you come here with this bill and propose to do what? To tax cheese! What kind of cheese? Filled cheese! I started to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question, but I was so much embarrassed I had to sit down, because he is one of the old members of this House and I am one of the young ones—that is, young so far as term of service is concerned. I understood the gentleman to say that about 70 per cent of this matter that they put into this cheese is foreign to the milk. I do not know whether I quote him correctly or not. But, sir, the authorities which I consulted (which I lost on the cars this morning, and they have just come back to me) do not say so. But I will not go into that question now.

Take this bill as you find it. You propose to tax cheese. The deputy collector comes into your house or into the nice little cottage of some hospitable countryman; he calls in there to stay all night. The tenant in his hospitality consents that he shall stay. This collector takes particular notice what is on that table, and he sees some "filled cheese." He arrests that man and carries him off to jail, probably, and the cheese he takes somewhere else.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. OTEY. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. In what part of the bill does the gentleman find any authority for such action as he supposes on the part of a deputy collector?

Mr. OTEY. The bill provides for paying a penalty of $500, and when a man does not pay a fine, he is generally arrested.

Mr. TAWNEY. Who pays the tax under this bill, the consumer?

Mr. OTEY. The man violating the law.

Mr. TAWNEY. The manufacturer pays it.

Mr. OTEY. The man who has the commodity and sells it without tax—knowingly, I believe, is the word—is to be fined.

Mr. TAWNEY. But your remark implied that the consumer, not the dealer, was to pay the tax and suffer the penalty.

Mr. OTEY. Very well; let us refer to the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. Here is the bill. Section 12 is the one to which the gentleman from Virginia has referred.

Mr. OTEY. Section 12 reads as follows:

SEC. 12. That every person who knowingly purchases or receives for sale any filled cheese from any manufacturer who has not paid the special tax shall be liable for each offense to a penalty of $100 and to a forfeiture of all articles so purchased or received or of the full value thereof.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

The provision just read applies to the person who buys this article for sale and not for consumption. If the gentleman will note the language he will observe that distinction; that is, that it prohibits the dealing in it.

Mr. TAWNEY. The section the gentleman has read corroborates my statement, that every person who knowingly receives for sale this fraudulent article becomes subject to the provisions of the law.

Mr. OTEY. Well, I have not got time, as you all must see, to answer everybody. "You all" is an old Southern expression. I do not object to being questioned if I had time.

Now, you go before your constituents after passing this bill—and I will necessarily have to be desultory in my remarks, for I expected to make an hour and a half speech and have only fifteen minutes—but you go before your constituents and answer them this question—and I call your attention to the language here in the bill, which I will read:

Retail dealers in filled cheese shall pay $40 per annum. Every person who sells filled cheese at retail, not for resale, and for actual consumption, shall be regarded as a retail dealer in filled cheese, and sections 3232, 3233, 3234, 3235, 3236, 3237, 3238, 3239, 3240, 3241, 3243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are, so far as applicable, made to extend to and include and apply to the special taxes imposed by this section and to the persons, firms, or corporations upon whom they are imposed.

Now, you are going to vote on this bill repealing some 12 sections of the Revised Statutes or making them apply to the provisions of this bill, and I desire to ask what man among you has read them? I mean who has read them since this bill came up, to know just what he is voting on? If there is a man who has done so, let him stand up.

Mr. RAY. Here is one.

Mr. OTEY. Are you on the committee?

Mr. RAY. No, sir.

Mr. OTEY. Well, you are an exception. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. Yes; I have read them, and since this bill was presented to the House. I have read them carefully, and let me say to the gentleman that this bill is good law.

Mr. OTEY. Then out of the whole House we have one gentleman who has read these statutes.

Mr. CHICKERING. Here is another.

Mr. OTEY. You are entirely too late, my friend. You are out of time. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RAY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has read them himself?

Mr. OTEY. No, sir; and I would not undertake to do it, for I am not interested in that particular subject. The Revised Statutes are good enough for me, without applying them to cheese. I will take them as they are. I am not engaged in remodeling them.

I am not the man who proposes to do anything of that kind. You are trying to do that, and it is your duty to know what you are doing, and I want it to go in the RECORD that only one member has read these sections of the Revised Statutes. But when you go before your constituents on the stump, when people come up and ask about this legislation, then I want you to be able to tell them candidly whether you have or have not read these statutes. Now, one gentleman says that he has read them. He is an exception. [Laughter.]

But why do you tax this article? Do you tax it for revenue? You know you do not. Why, then, do you tax it? You say it is "a fraud." Why, have you any right to tax fraud? If you tax one kind of fraud why do you not tax all frauds? Why, my dear sir, a man with a wooden leg is a fraud to some people, some in this House. [Laughter and applause.] What is the meaning of fraud? Why, it means deceit, deception, with a view of obtaining an unlawful end, such as obtaining goods under false pretenses. It is deception, cheating, deceit, and so on. [Laughter.] Why, the hair on the top of your head is a fraud when it is a wig; it is a fraud when it is dyed. [Great laughter.] The false teeth in your mouth is a fraud; but it does not come under the provisions of this bill. [Laughter.]

Bring me [addressing a page] a decaliter of the protoxide of hydrogen. [Laughter and applause.] I have not got time to go over this whole subject of fraud and show you exactly what it is. I wish I had. There is some interesting matter here. Shakespeare says that—

The welfare of us all
Hangs on the cutting short that fraudful man.

Then cut him off. If he is a fraud do you wish to protect him? I ask again, are you doing it for the purpose of taxation? I asked the gentleman from Ohio that question, if he was not licensing fraud by this bill. He dodged the question and would not answer it. He knows that this bill is simply licensing fraud. He said that there were counterfeits of pure cheese.

Now, have you ever undertaken to tax counterfeits before? Suppose you did. Would not a tax on counterfeits license them to counterfeit? Would not it license them to make counterfeit money, as well as counterfeit butter? You condemn lotteries as a fraud. Did you license them by taxing them? No, sir; you passed a law that completely wiped them out of existence. Do you wish to destroy filled-cheese factories? Let a man go into Swift's or Armour's and compare the cleanliness of their food products, compare their fats with the fats in the dairies through the Northwest. But you propose to encourage what you claim to be a fraud by affixing the seal of your approval to it. I am opposed to any interference with legitimate business, and if I had the time I would show you that this is a legitimate business. If it is a fraud, then you can not license it. You can not, in justice to yourselves, consistently license a fraud; and yet you say here that if they will put the United States stamp on the thing that it may go all over the country, when you know it is a fraud.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McMILLIN. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow an interruption?

Mr. OTEY. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. As I understand, it is not contended that filled cheese is a fraud, because the testimony before the committee is that it is a wholesome product. The point about having a stamp upon it is so that the dealers and consumers can discriminate between that and the full-cream cheese.

Mr. OTEY. I want to ask the gentleman if it is necessary to tax it in order to do that? Why, in my own State we have inspectors of tobacco, inspectors of internal revenue, and all these things. Why can you not have them inspect this thing and see wherein the deleterious stuff lies? Why, Mr. Chairman, I wish I had time to read what was stated to us in the hearings. One of the gentlemen says that the fat from the hog is a great deal more wholesome than the fat from the cow, and that the cow is a great deal more liable to disease. I would like to go on and tell you all about the bacteria and the microbes that they kill in this process. They subject it to 200 degress of heat, whereas this butter, as they call it, is only heated to about 70 degrees.

Mr. TAWNEY. That statement was made by the only filled-cheese manufacturer who appeared before the committee, was it not?

Mr. OTEY. No; it is made by a distinguished gentleman that you are all fond of—the Hon. Sterling Morton. You had him before your committee, and that is his evidence.

He said:

What is now known as filled cheese was formerly called margarine cheese, and oleo' cheese, and is designated as imitation cheese in the laws of several States. It is apparently a perfectly legitimate food product and properly called cheese. It has the characteristics of cheese, although not of high grade, and is similar in chemical composition. The only essential difference between filled cheese and that made from whole milk is in the substitution of the fat of the hog for that of the cow. The natural fat of the milk being extracted, or separated, is replaced by a good quality of lard, at the rate of 2 or 3 pounds of the latter to 100 pounds of skim milk.

And:

The liability to use raw materials containing the germs of disease is about the same in making genuine cheese as in making filled cheese. It is possible to thus convey the germs of disease from cows and hogs to the human family; but the danger can not be regarded as serious in either case. It is probably true that at the present time in those districts where cheese is largely made insidious diseases which are dangerous to man are more prevalent among cows than among hogs.

Medical authorities and others differ as to the relative digestibility of different fats, such as butter fat and pork fat or lard; but the fact is known to all that immense quantities of pork fat in all forms are consumed by various classes of people without detriment to health. There is no just ground for claiming that filled cheese is necessarily unwholesome or deleterious to health. Large quantities of it are daily sold and consumed without apparently injurious effects.

But the gentleman says, "About how much of this stuff is in the cheese?" I have tables here which will show, but I have not time to read them. I asked the gentleman in charge of this bill, and I wish he would answer, what is the principle of the cheesy matter in milk?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, butter.

Mr. OTEY. No; it is not at all. It is what they call casein. Do you want to know what casein is? It is an albuminoid substance found in milk, soluble in alkali. It is coagulated by animal membranes. It dries into a yellow mass, and contains less nitrogen than albumin. A similar substance, called vegetable casein or legumin, occurs in peas, beans, etc.

That is the principle in cheese. Take that out and you could not make any cheese at all. But by putting in the oil with that you make cheese. And how do you get it? Why, you take the stomach of a calf, a sucking calf. Some of the authorities say it is the third stomach and some say that it is the fourth stomach. They dry it, and after drying it and smoking it and all that sort of thing they mix it in with the milk, and it produces the curd. Now, what does the curd contain? It contains 92.95 per cent of water, 0.24 per cent of butter, 0.81 per cent of casein, 5.27 per cent of milk, sugar, and lactic acid, and 0.73 per cent of mineral matter.

Now, what proportion of cheesy matter is there? The authorities which I get out of the Library say from 3 to 10 per cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, cheese is a solidified production from milk, the essential constituent of which is the proteinous or nitrogenous substance called casein. It is the basis of cheese, or purified curd of milk. Is any of this taken out of filled cheese? Not one particle. The butter is taken out, and then this oil is put in, and the testimony of all the experts is that the oil or fat is much purer than the butter itself. The testimony of everybody who testifies on the subject is that this neutral oil is much purer than the butter.

Now, these rich cheeses with which we are familiar commence to ripen very soon. They ripen from the outside to the inside, and if a poor man gets one of them it very soon spoils, whereas this filled cheese is a wholesome article of diet, and lasts. They can get it from 5 to 6 cents cheaper than they can get the other cheese. Now, you propose to put a tax upon it to debar the poor people from getting this wholesome product, except at the price of the other cheese manufacturers.

I believe that filled cheese can be and is made pure; that unfilled cheese can be and is made impure.

Cheese has been an article of food from the time of the early Jewish patriarchs.

The manufacture of cheese, whether filled or unfilled, in this day is a process both chemical and mechanical. Chemistry is playing a great part in the economy of things. In producing filled cheese it has conferred a benefit on mankind, cheapened the food of the millions, and given employment to thousands of our deserving fellow-citizens.

Strike it down by taxation, and you but add other burdens to the already overburdened and oppressed laboring people of our country.

Mr. TERRY. It is a proposition to tax the poor man's cheese.

Mr. OTEY. Yes, sir.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, my time is so limited, and I have promised to yield so much time to other members, that I will ask the Chair to notify me when I have occupied fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, it is not possible within the too limited time given for this discussion to give this important measure that care and attention which should be given to a measure proposing to add heavy penalties, fines, imprisonment, and additional taxes upon the people of the United States; but we have to take it as we find it. I will state, Mr. Chairman, the facts in such a way that I do not think any member of the committee will disagree with me. First, the weight of the testimony taken by the Committee on Ways and Means is to the effect that filled cheese is a healthful article of food; not so fine as the best cream cheese, but healthful; secondly, that it is cheaper than the cream cheese; thirdly, that the wholesale manufacturers of this commodity, all over the United States, manufacture and sell it as filled cheese and not as cream cheese.

These are propositions which will not be denied in the light of the evidence before me. Recurring to the question of the wholesomeness of "filled cheese," it will not be denied that the testimony shows that the milk that is used in the production of this cheese is raised to the same temperature as is the milk in the production of full cheese or full cream cheese; and in addition to this, that, by the processes of manufacture, the leaf lard and the skimmed milk of which this product is made become heated to 200° F., which is a higher degree of heat and more likely to destroy germs than that which is used in the production of full cream cheese.

Having said this much concerning the nature of the commodity, I will during this debate insert the testimony of Secretary Morton on this subject, as he has given us a fair and most lucid statement concerning filled cheese.

Mr. Chairman, two articles are used in the manufacture of "filled cheese," skimmed milk and the leaf lard of the hog. From the milk is taken by skimming the fat of the cow and the finest portion of the fat of the hog substituted. The ingredients are about 3 parts of lard to 100 of milk.

Sir, no man can or could object more than I do to any fraud or imposition on the public. If that were the only question involved we would have no difficulty. No man can be more the friend of our great dairy interests than I. But I am not willing to legislate for any industry purely to benefit another. That is what is proposed here.

Only a few years ago, Mr. Chairman, we were urged to pass the oleomargarine tax bill, because if we did not our dairy interests would suffer. It was done. I said then it would not accomplish the object. It has not. More oleomargarine is made here and consumed since the tax than before. In 1888, the first total year after that law went into effect, we produced 34,325,000 pounds. Last year we produced 56,958,000 pounds. To show how powerless is the statute to regulate and stop the use of oleomargarine, listen to the following from the statement of Hon. William H. Hatch, author of that bill, given before the Ways and Means Committee the other day:

> But right here in the capital of the country, right here in your hotels, boarding houses, and restaurants, right here in the city of Washington, that law has been oftener and more outrageously violated than in any city in any State in this Union, and I defy any man on this committee to go to any first-class restaurant of the city of Washington to-day and take what they will put before him as butter one time in ten with an absolute certainty he is going to get pure butter. I have seen oleomargarine handed out to me within the last ten days. I did not eat it, but it was given to me to eat in what are known as the best restaurants in the city of Washington.

Now, sir, we are again told we must legislate for the dairy interest, this time to stop the use of competing cheese.

Sir, where is this vicious system to end? You taxed oleomargarine before, and you tax "filled cheese" now for destruction. What industry will you assail next? When will you cease to lay your blighting hand on struggling industry. In your tariff bills you pretend to build up by taxation, and by your internal-revenue bills you tear down. Wherever you turn you hamper or destroy. You had far better let the citizen regulate his own business.

Sir, I do not hesitate to say, in view of all that has occurred both in the committee and in this House, that the purpose of this legislation is not to raise revenue, but it is to appeal to the taxing power to destroy or injure the filled-cheese manufacturers. It is the creation of new penalties; it is the imposition of new taxes; it is the subjection of the citizen to new surveillance; it is the right to take up and hold in the Federal courts citizens of the United States for things that were not heretofore criminal and are not now criminal per se; only criminal because they are made so by this statute. Given the right to legislate, you do not even say a single word about the necessity of this tax for revenue. Go and examine the condition of the Treasury, and you will find there are $272,000,000 of net funds in the Treasury, $172,000,000 in addition to the $100,000,000 of gold reserve which it has been the custom of the Government to keep there. This is a vicious intermeddling on the part of the Congress of the United States with the business of the citizen for the purpose of regulating that business and crushing it out for the benefit of somebody else, and against that kind of legislation and injustice I raise my protest here, as I have ever done and ever will do, whether my constituents or anybody else's constituents are involved in the question. Let the States crush it if they wish. Let the Government require that it be branded when it goes from State to State or to other countries if they wish, but do not use the taxing power to destroy.

We have the most magnificent form of government ever devised by the human mind. It would seem that the great Jefferson was almost inspired, Mr. Chairman, when he conceived the idea that he could avoid the centralized government and despotism which had been its inevitable consequence from the rise of the first republic to the downfall of the last despotism. He wisely concluded to frame a government that should consist of smaller governments within a great government, leaving the citizen all he could do without the interference of the government, State or national; leaving to the State government all it could do without the interference by the National Government; and giving to the Government of the United States the right to control the citizen only in those matters wherein it was permitted to do so by the Constitution, and wherein the State could not do it so well, and wherein the citizen could not do it so well.

That principle of government we wrested from Great Britain by blood and suffering; that principle of government we embodied in a written Constitution. Here was the beginning of State rights—of "home rule." But in the same Constitution we put the necessary power to tax the people for the purpose of supporting and maintaining the structure and to enable it to carry out those wise and proper functions of government. This right to tax the citizen for the common good has been perverted in these latter days, and a lot of legislators, conceiving themselves wiser than the framers of the Constitution, wiser than the masses of the people, wiser than the States and peoples who sent them here, have wrested the power or are perverting this great function to the purpose of private gain and for the purpose of crushing out an industry that does not happen to suit their taste. That is the situation now. Jefferson's conceptions are disregarded and his system of government is being assaulted.

Mr. TALBERT. That has been done upon the same principle as imposing the 10 per cent tax on State-bank circulation, for the purpose of preventing their existence.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is done on the same principle as the imposition of the 10 per cent tax on State-bank circulation, which was not to raise revenue but to crush the banks. It is the same principle involved as in the oleomargarine bill, where the tax was proposed and levied at a time when we had a big surplus revenue, and it was done for the purpose of crushing out that industry. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has confessed the impotency of human ingenuity to do that thing against the protest of the American people by admitting here to-day—as the author of the bill, Mr. Hatch, admitted in the hearing, as I have shown you—that in the city of Washington there is more oleomargarine consumed than in any other city of its size in the country, and the law has proved itself wholly inefficient.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. RAY. While you are complaining of the imposition of the 10 per cent tax on the issues of State banks, is it not true that that piece of legislation has brought us a better and a safer system of banking in the United States than we ever had before?

Mr. McMILLIN. It is wholly untrue that any tax imposed for destruction ever in the end benefited the American people. It is wholly untrue that we have the best currency system on the earth. On the contrary, any man who is satisfied with the present situation is easy to please, and I do not envy him his intelligence.

Mr. RAY. Whether I have any intelligence or not, would the gentleman now return to the old State-bank system?

Mr. McMILLIN. I did not mean to nor could I reflect on the gentleman's intelligence. I am not going to be diverted generally from the important question that is before us for consideration, but I will answer you because I avoid nothing. I favor the repeal of that tax. I would repeal it on the presumption that the people at home have as much sense as you and I, and can take care of themselves if we let them alone. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill is off the same piece of cloth out of which was cut the oleomargarine tax law. There is no excuse for this legislation. One class of persons engaged in this business you tax $400 a year, another class you tax $200 a year, and others you tax $40 a year. You propose to further fill Federal courts with these prosecutions. And you propose to appoint and send out a lot of "tasters and smellers" to go to every kitchen and churn in the country and see whether they are pleased with the methods by which cheese and butter are made in those places.

Mr. CULBERSON. Spies.

Mr. McMILLIN. Spies, as my friend from Texas, Judge CULBERSON, says—spies and informers. Furthermore, this measure goes further than any other to which my attention has been called, by providing in one of its sections that the citizens shall submit to any "surveillance" that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall impose. Not only do you enact this law, fixing the penalty and providing for its enforcement, making and punishing new crimes that are devised, but you launch out in the criminal field on a great terra incognita where you propose to allow the Secretary of the Treasury to make new regulations to which the citizen is compelled to submit.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does not the gentleman know that the oleomargarine law contains the same provision?

Mr. McMILLIN. I have not had an opportunity to compare this with the oleomargarine law.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the fact.

Mr. McMILLIN. Well, so much the worse for the oleomargarine act. Then, I will say, as I said at the beginning, that the oleomargarine law and this proposed legislation are two of a kind.

Mr. TAWNEY. You said that was an original proposition in this bill and I simply wanted to correct you.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I did not say that it was an original proposition in this bill; at least I did not purpose to say so. What I said was that this was the first time such a provision had been called to my attention.

Mr. Chairman, you have heard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] who reported this bill. Did he put the right to tax this article on any higher ground than the purpose to injure this industry? Not a bit of it. If any word placing it on any higher ground escaped his lips I do not now recall it, and I tried to catch everything he said. You heard yesterday the gentleman who opened the debate in favor of this bill [Mr. COOK], who comes from the State of Wisconsin, and who boldly admitted that the object was to "put a brand" upon this article as a fraud. They are not after revenue; they are out to destroy.

Mr. Chairman, we take a different view of the question from that which those gentlemen take. We insist that if you want to brand you ought to stop with branding; that you ought to go with this matter to a different committee; that you ought to apply a different process; that if you simply want to designate this article as it passes from State to State you should simply provide that when it is to be shipped it shall be properly branded, and let it come under the interstate-commerce regulation, instead of yourselves perpetrating "a fraud" upon the people by the very bill which you propose to enact into law. My friend on the left [Mr. OGDEN] has called my attention to another thing which I had intended to reach later, but which I may as well mention now. You provide that the dealer in this commodity shall put up a sign in his store. He may have paid every tax required by the law. He may not have a single package of cheese not marked as required by law; he may have complied with every legal provision as to the tax; yet if he has not stuck up on the door facing or somewhere within his establishment a statement "Filled cheese kept for sale here," he, too, goes to the Federal courts, passes through the Federal gin mill, and is mulcted in costs and fines.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In the provision to which the gentleman now refers is there anything different in principle from that which has always been in our internal-revenue laws in relation to the manufacture and sale of cigars and the manufacture and rectifying of distilled spirits?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, when the dealer in spirits has paid his tax he has discharged his obligation to the Government. The gentleman will not dispute that proposition.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But whether that is so or not, here is a tax you do not need; here is a tax for the imposition of which there is no excuse, except that you want to help some persons in a rival business, and for that purpose you subject the citizen to the payment of fines and costs, and also to imprisonment if he fails to put up on his shop door the sign, "Filled cheese for sale here." And when this legislation has worked out its full purpose, when you have taken possession of vast business interests through the oleomargarine law and through this bill and through your other prohibitory and restrictive laws, both internal and external, as applied to the tariff, when you shall have further filled the Federal courts with oppressive prosecutions, when you have accomplished all this, you will find another sign over your Federal courts, the sign which Dante has described so graphically in his Inferno, where he says that over the portal of the seventh circle of hell was seen this inscription, "Who enters here leaves hope behind." [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the subcommittee which first considered the subject of "filled cheese" with a view to the enactment of a law to regulate its manufacture and sale, and which drafted the bill now under consideration, I deem it a duty to myself and to the proposed measure to say a word in its behalf.

This bill, as my colleague on the committee said, has been drawn upon the lines of an act approved August 2, 1886, commonly known as the oleomargarine law, modified, however, so as to be applicable to the conditions attending the manufacture and sale of cheese and imitation cheese. These modifications consist principally in the reduction of the special tax, the licenses, the fines, and penalties; in the definition of cheese and filled cheese; in the definition of wholesale and retail dealers in filled cheese, and in the marking and branding of that article. The reduction of the tax and licenses was not made wholly upon the responsibility of the subcommittee. Experience, as shown by the testimony of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in the administration of the oleomargarine law has demonstrated that a lower tax and a lower license will afford the public and the honest dairymen of the country greater protection against the fraud now practiced upon both. It will enable the Internal Revenue Department of the Government to more rigidly enforce the law than it could if the tax and these licenses were so high that the manufacturer and dealer, rather than pay them, would assume the risk of incurring the penalties of a violation of the law as they are now doing in the case of oleomargarine.

So much for the general differences between the bill now under consideration and the oleomargarine law upon which it is based. When we come to consider the bill in detail these changes and modifications and the reasons for them will be more fully discussed.

Mr. Chairman, in determining whether or not this bill should become a law, we should be satisfied first that it is constitutional; second, that it is necessary and that its provisions are calculated to promote the public welfare; and third, will it injuriously affect any legitimate private interest? A careful consideration of the bill, its purposes and effect, will, I believe, show that the first two propositions can be incontrovertibly answered in the affirmative, and that the last may, with equal positiveness, be answered in the negative.

IS IT CONSTITUTIONAL?

By the Constitution the power of taxation for the purpose of revenue is vested in Congress. The amount of revenue is not essential to the exercise of the power. Whether this bill, therefore, will raise much or little revenue is not material. If it raises any, it is the legitimate exercise of a constitutional power, provided the revenue be raised by a tax levied upon an article which Congress may properly tax. The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. MCMILLIN], when driven to the wall to find a peg on which to hang his argument against the constitutionality of this bill, proceeds to assail the motives of the friends of the measure. Taxation, he says, is not the motive, but annihilation. If that were true, Mr. Chairman, the bill would nevertheless be constitutional. In that case the destruction of the filled-cheese industry would be due to the exercise of a power incident to the power of taxation, which power, as Chief Justice Marshall in effect has said, carries with it and legalizes all that may result from its proper exercise. If, therefore, Congress has the power to impose the tax and does it, neither the amount of revenue, the effect upon the article taxed, nor the particular motive that prompted the legislation will have any legal significance whatever. Judge Collamer, that distinguished jurist and eminent statesman, in a case reported in 11 Vermont, 22, said:

> Improper motives can never alter the character of a legal act. Whatever a man has a legal right to do he may do with impunity.

The same is true of a legislative act, which, if constitutional, will not be affected by the motive which prompted it, nor by the arguments used against its passage.

But, Mr. Chairman, the fact that the report accompanying the bill does not state that more revenue is necessary is urged by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] to prove that revenue has no place among the purposes of the measure. He also argues that because there is in the Treasury to-day, of borrowed money, an available cash balance of over $170,000,000; therefore a bill to increase the revenue is not necessary. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the report is silent as to the necessity for more revenue; but why was it necessary to expose the incompetency of the Democratic party and the insolvency of the Government in this report when the facts are known and admitted by every man, woman, and child in the land, except perhaps the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN]. The fact that more revenue is needed has been published almost daily. In the statements showing the condition of the Treasury and the receipts and expenditures of the Government which we have received every morning since the Wilson-Gorman perfidy bill went into effect in 1894, we have all the evidence that any man needs to determine the fact.

I have before me these daily statements for April 7, 8, and 9, 1896. What do they show? We see that on the 7th the Government expended $978,033.29 more than it received. On the 8th it expended $545,354.95 more than it received, and on yesterday the excess of expenditures over revenue receipts from all sources reached the enormous sum of $1,041,318.73. The total excess of expenditures over receipts during the first nine days of this month was $5,768,874.95, and for this fiscal year $24,519,577.16. The following figures, taken from these official statements, will show the receipts and expenditures more clearly and in detail:

APRIL 7, 1896.

In view of the facts thus made plain, I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, that any gentleman should assert on this floor that the Government does not need the revenue which this bill will raise. It not only needs that amount, but a great deal more, which the Republicans of the House at the beginning of this session of Congress attempted to raise by the passage of the Dingley revenue bill, which met its fate in some subterranean passage of a silver mine in the other end of the Capitol. Revenue, Mr. Chairman, is necessary, and one of the purposes of this bill is to meet that necessity by imposing a tax on an adulterated food product, manufactured and sold for that which it is not. Those who say we have a surplus in the Treasury of $171,000,000 forget that every dollar of that balance and more has been borrowed from the American people or from foreign syndicates. Why, Mr. Chairman, it can conclusively be shown that every loan negotiated by this Administration was occasioned primarily by a deficiency of revenue. There is every reason to believe that this deficiency in revenue will continue to the end of this Administration. We should therefore do something at this time to increase our revenue.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the deficiency should continue even as it has been shown to exist for the last year, would it not still require more than three years to absorb the fund now in the Treasury in excess of the $100,000,000 of gold reserve?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, that depends altogether on whether gold will be withdrawn from the Treasury under this Administration as it has been withdrawn in the past and whether the present deficiency in revenue will continue at a diminished or increased rate.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is not a question of gold; but how much is there in excess beyond the ordinary requirements of the Government and the reserve of one hundred million?

My assertion was, and my assertion is, that even if the revenues continue as now and the expenditures shall continue as they are it will require more than three years, or over four in fact, before you would need additional taxation on account of the deficiencies in the revenue.

Mr. TAWNEY. The assertion of the gentleman from Tennessee is based on the assumption that the only draft on the surplus in the Treasury will be to make up the deficit in revenues. This is not a fact by any means. He also ignores the fact that the apparent surplus consists of redeemed greenbacks and Treasury notes which if used to meet deficiency in revenue will afford the brokers of Wall street and Lombard street an opportunity to again raid the Treasury, deplete the gold reserve, and necessitate another Government loan.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it not a fact that there is less money in the Treasury to-day than this Administration has borrowed within the last three years?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir; that is true, as shown by the statements from the Treasury Department, and being true it shows conclusively that the money in the Treasury to-day is borrowed money or the proceeds of borrowed money.

Mr. Chairman, when the oleomargarine law was under consideration in the Forty-ninth Congress the same argument was used to defeat it. It was said that revenue was not its purpose. Since its enactment some of its provisions have been assailed on the ground of their being unconstitutional, but no lawyer has ever presumed to question in the courts of the United States the constitutional right of Congress to enact that law as a whole. This measure, being drawn upon the lines of that act, will for the same reason be unassailable on constitutional grounds.

Mr. Chairman, the motive behind this bill is not, as claimed by its enemies, the destruction of one branch of industry for the benefit of another with which it competes. That argument is only used for the purpose of scaring members. Those who make this claim fail to distinguish between a law that is expressly intended to destroy one legitimate industry legitimately conducted and a law, such as this is intended to be, which will raise revenue, and in addition prevent fraud and deception by compelling those engaged in a certain industry to conduct their business honestly and to sell their product for what it is, and which, to accomplish these two purposes, uses the taxing power of the Government. If the filled-cheese industry is destroyed in consequence of the passage of this bill it will owe its destruction to the fact that it can no longer practice a fraud upon the people by selling its product for what it is not, and because the people will not buy filled cheese when offered for sale as such. But the law can not be charged with its destruction, except in so far as it requires those engaged in the business to deal honestly with the people. If the filled-cheese industry can not live when conducted honestly, who upon this floor will say it has the right to live at all? [Applause.]

Nor can it be successfully claimed that the tax of 1 cent a pound imposed by this bill will even injure the business of manufacturing filled cheese.

From the evidence before the committee it appears that this product can be manufactured at a cost not to exceed 4½ cents a pound. It is even offered to the wholesale trade as low as 2½ cents a pound. So that with the tax and license fees added to the cost of production there would be a margin of profit to the manufacturer and dealer in this spurious product. It is sold to-day in competition with genuine cheese, which costs from 11 to 12 cents a pound to produce. If compelling its sale for what it is reduces the price, the manufacturers of filled cheese, after paying the tax, would still reap as large if not a larger profit than the manufacturers of genuine cheese receive. These are facts which members should consider in determining the effect of this proposed tax upon the filled-cheese industry.

If, therefore, more revenue is needed, and we can show that this industry as now conducted is fraudulently conducted, and to raise revenue and prevent this fraud the constitutional power of taxation is invoked, the bill is constitutional and we are not only justified, but it is our duty in levying the tax to make suitable provisions to protect the public against a glaring and stupendous fraud now practiced by the manufacture and sale of an article of food deleterious to health made and sold in the semblance of that which it is not and against which the people are powerless to protect themselves. [Applause.]

THIS LEGISLATION NECESSARY.

But, Mr. Chairman, the demand for revenue is not the only necessity for this legislation. If in the future we are to enjoy permanent prosperity, the great and overshadowing agricultural interest of our country—the very basis of our material progress and national prosperity—must receive from its representatives and the representatives of the people every consideration and all the protection to which it is entitled. New markets for the products of the farm should be discovered; old ones protected, enlarged, and preserved. And when, by the aid of science or through the dishonesty of man, the products of the farm are so counterfeited, adulterated, or imitated that the imitation, stealing the name and appearance of the genuine product, drives it out of the market through deception and fraud which can only be detected by the aid of chemical science, it is time for the lawmaking power of the Government, through the representatives of the people, to interfere and require the sale of the artificial product for what it is, and thus protect the honest producer of genuine food products. This is demanded not alone in the interest of the producers, but also in the interest of the consumers; and is especially our duty when the deception and fraud is practiced in respect to food products. [Applause.]

FILLED CHEESE DEFINED.

Mr. Chairman, what is filled cheese and what methods are employed in its manufacture and sale? Filled cheese is a compound or counterfeit cheese, the constituent parts of which are skimmed milk and uncooked animal fat, known to the trade as neutral oil. This neutral oil is substituted or put into the skimmed milk to take the place of the butter fat extracted by the use of the centrifugal separator. This substituted fat is not made by those who manufacture filled cheese, but is bought by them from the manufacturers of neutral oil or pork-packing establishments. It is claimed by the manufacturers of filled cheese that nothing but pure hog leaf is used in making this oil. They admit, however, that it may be, and doubtless is in many instances, made from the fat of diseased animals or from impure refuse or putrid fats, and that when they receive it they do not know and have no means of knowing whether it is pure or filled with the germs of disease. The percentage of skimmed milk and neutral oil used in making filled cheese is about 70 per cent of the former and about 30 per cent of the latter. To this is added a certain amount of rennet, with the necessary coloring and flavoring matter. It is made in the form and semblance of pure cheese, with absolutely no mark or brand of any kind to identify it as filled cheese.

The following are the ingredients used in some of the patents for making filled cheese:

Patent No. 136051, February 18, 1873: Skimmed milk, with tallow, lard, or butter of low grade; 15 pounds of fat to 1,000 pounds of skimmed milk; 3 ounces of saltpeter added to milk; heated and mixed.

Patent No. 264516, September 19, 1892: Artificial cream for making butter or cheese. Materials used: Skimmed milk, with olive oil, lard, oleomargarine, butter oils, other animal or vegetable oils, heated and mixed.

There are in all some 8 or 10 patents for making this bogus cheese.

Mr. CLARDY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARDY. Was there anything before the committee that showed that this product is unwholesome; that it is not suitable for food?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is. If the gentleman will turn to the hearings he will find on page 60 a very able article on the subject of whether or not filled cheese is deleterious to health.

Mr. CLARDY. Does their examination show that it is deleterious to health?

Mr. HOPKINS. No; I do not think that anybody can successfully claim it is deleterious to health when it is properly made.

Mr. CLARDY. That is what I want to find out.

Mr. TAWNEY. That question depends upon whether it is properly made, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, and upon the strength of a man's digestive organs.

Mr. CLARDY. So it is with eating bacon.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the uncooked fat of an animal is as easily digested as the butter which is extracted from the milk, and the uncooked fat is free from disease germs, then it is not an unwholesome product; but if the uncooked fat of an animal is not as easily digested, and if—as is the fact—some people can not digest it at all, then when they eat filled cheese they are eating that which is indigestible, and therefore unwholesome; and, further, if—as is the case in many instances—the fat is taken from a diseased animal it is not only unwholesome, but absolutely dangerous to health.

Mr. CLARDY. Is not that the fact with reference to almost any other article of food, that it disagrees with some particular stomachs?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; I think that is perhaps the fact, but I think as a general rule the doctors will admit that uncooked fat is not as digestible as the butter fat extracted from the milk.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think my colleague will agree with me that the Agricultural Department, on an examination of filled cheese, decided that there was nothing deleterious in it?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; the Agricultural Department did not so decide. But there was a chemist up here in the Internal Revenue Department who made that claim.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman, that is a very important question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Chemistry and physiology are two entirely different things; and if a man relies upon chemistry for the purpose of ascertaining whether that which he takes into his stomach is digestible he may in a very short time have an acute case of dyspepsia.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him, is only leaf lard or uncooked lard used in this manufacture, or do they use the rendered lard also?

Mr. TAWNEY. They do not use the rendered lard. The testimony shows that in the manufacture of this cheese they heat the leaf lard just to such a degree of temperature as will enable them to use it conveniently, about 130°. It is not cooked as we cook hog fat when we render it into lard. It does not reach that degree of heat that will destroy the disease germs, if there are any, in the fat.

The neutral oil used in the manufacture of this cheese is made by the pork-packing establishments and the neutral-oil factories and the oleomargarine factories. These men are not more scrupulous than the rest of mankind and do not make post-mortem examinations to determine whether the animal died from disease or other cause. What they are after is the fat, and when you eat filled cheese you have no assurance whatever that you are not taking into your stomachs the germs of some fatal disease.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman was speaking about the temperature to which leaf lard was subjected before being used in the manufacture of filled cheese. I have before me the evidence that was taken before the committee, and with the permission of my colleague I will read one sentence.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will not consent to it, unless the gentleman will read the evidence on the other side.

Mr. HOPKINS. But it says that it is raised to a temperature of 200°.

Mr. TAWNEY. By the injection of a live-steam jet; that is far from cooking.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I should like ten minutes more.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for ten minutes.

There was no objection.

EXTENT AND METHODS OF THE BUSINESS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the number of factories and the amount of filled cheese produced in the United States can be only approximately estimated. There are no reliable statistics on the subject. Some investigation has been made by the Agricultural Department to ascertain the facts, and the result shows that in 1894 there were in Wisconsin and Illinois about 266 filled-cheese factories, which produced that year about 14,000,000 pounds. The legislature of Wisconsin having since then prohibited its manufacture in that State, some of the largest factories have, I am informed, moved across the line into the State of Illinois, and in that State there was produced in 1895 12,000,000 pounds of filled cheese.

This suggests to me one of the points urged with much force by the enemies of this measure. It is this: That the matter of regulating and controlling the manufacture of this product should be left exclusively to the States. The answer to that is very simple. Suppose every State in the Union except the State of Illinois prohibited the manufacture of this product; that would simply concentrate the business in that State or in any other that did not see fit to legislate on the subject, and the injury to the legitimate dairy interests of the country and the danger to the public health would be as great as it is to-day. The only effective way to put a stop to the fraud and compel the manufacturer and dealer in filled cheese to conduct his business honestly and to sell his product for what it is is by national legislation.

But gentlemen claim this is an honest industry, honestly conducted, and that this bill if passed will unjustly discriminate against it. This argument depends solely upon assertion. There is not a single fact to sustain it. It is true, as claimed, that the manufacturers do not put any brand upon their product. But this is not done to enable the wholesale and retail dealer to sell it as filled cheese. On the contrary, the wholesale dealer wants it without brands so as to enable him by the use of the stencil to sell it for "Wisconsin full cream cheese," "New York cream cheese," "Badger State cheese," "Young American cheese," or any other special brand that has an established reputation in the cheese market of the world. The evidence taken before the committee shows conclusively that such is the practice of those who deal in this product. It also appears that it is sold to the consumer at about the same price paid for the genuine cheese of which it is the counterfeit. Why, Mr. Chairman, from the testimony of the expert from the Agricultural Department, Mr. Alvord, who investigated the subject, it appears that this fraud is practiced upon the people to such an extent that in the city of Columbia, S. C., he did not find a single full cream cheese, but found filled cheese bearing the New York and Wisconsin brands of full cream cheese. In the city of Macon, Ga., he found but 1 merchant out of 11 who had any genuine cheese on his premises. So extensively is this fraud practiced and the demand for pure cheese destroyed that the loss to the great dairy interests of the country is enormous. This is shown by the third and fifth annual reports of the dairy and food commissioner of Minnesota. From them I learn that in 1890 we had 130 cheese factories in that State, producing about 10,000,000 pounds. In 1895 there were only 35 factories, producing less than a million pounds of cheese. In 1890 there were more than 5,000 farmers supplying our cheese factories with milk; in 1895 only 1,250.

It may be true that we can not prove this result to be due entirely to the manufacture and sale of filled cheese, but the fact remains that until within a year there was in the adjoining State of Wisconsin more than 200 filled-cheese factories turning out this spurious product at the rate of 10,000,000 pounds annually. This was put upon our market at a price just a little below the amount for which genuine cheese could be manufactured and sold; hence the farmers have sought in the manufacture of butter a more profitable market for their milk, and are abandoning the cheese business. What is true, Mr. Chairman, of Minnesota is doubtless true of many other States, and until this blight upon the cheese market first made its appearance no State gave promise of grander results in this dairy industry than did the State which I have the honor in part to represent. I might add that no State in the Union possesses advantages for the production of all kinds of dairy products superior to those enjoyed by the farmers of Minnesota. Our climate is unexcelled; we have an abundance of the most nutritious grasses; a purer water supply no State can boast of. Every condition essential to the production of the best and purest dairy products are enjoyed by the farmers of my State. All they ask and all that is essential to their success in the matter of producing butter and cheese is to be protected against fraudulent competition.

There is another important fact disclosed by the census which shows how filled cheese is affecting the production of genuine cheese in this country. I will print with my remarks a table showing the cheese production in the United States since 1849:

[United States Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Animal Industry, Dairy Division.]

DATA AS TO CHEESE AND FILLED CHEESE.

Cheese production of the United States according to the census.

	Pounds.
1849	105,535,893
1869	162,927,382

NOTE.—Nine-tenths of this cheese is made in the States of New York, Wisconsin, Ohio, Illinois, Vermont, Iowa, Pennsylvania, and Michigan, ranking in the order named.

From this table it appears that in 1869 we produced 162,927,382 pounds of cheese; in 1879 243,157,850 pounds, the increase in 1879 over that of 1869 being 80,230,468 pounds. In 1889 we produced 256,761,883 pounds, the increase being only 13,604,033 pounds over the product of 1879, or 66,022,000 pounds less than during the preceding decade, and when we deduct from this increase the amount of filled cheese manufactured in 1889 the census shows no increase whatever in the production of genuine cheese in that year over the year 1879. This, Mr. Chairman, is an astonishing fact, one that does not exist as to any other important industry in the land, and one, too, that should impress every member of this House who wishes to see our great agricultural industry prosper and grow, with the necessity of finding the cause of the decline in the manufacture of one of our principle dairy products, and a remedy for the same. We believe, Mr. Chairman, the cause is the fraudulent manufacture and sale of adulterated, counterfeit cheese and that the pending bill affords a complete remedy.

OUR FOREIGN MARKET.

Mr. Chairman, the effect of the manufacture and sale of this spurious product upon the consumption and demand for genuine cheese is shown with greater accuracy in our foreign trade than in our domestic market. I have here a statement of the exports of cheese from the United States and Canada, which I will also print with my remarks:

Exports of cheese from the United States and Canada.

[For single years and yearly averages for five-year periods.]

Periods.	United States.	Canada.	Periods.	United States.	Canada.
	Pounds.	Pounds.		Pounds.	Pounds.
1850	10,361,189	17,100	1881–1885	118,813,685	61,502,949
1860	15,515,799	124,320	1886–1890	88,303,513	83,737,133
1861–1865	35,081,855	473,550	1891–1895	75,977,114	135,679,207
1866–1870	47,432,602	3,750,224	1893	81,350,923	133,946,365
1876–1880	113,606,609	40,676,856	1895	60,448,421	146,004,650

From this statement it will be seen that in 1885 we exported 118,813,685 pounds of cheese, while Canada the same year exported only 61,502,949 pounds. In 1895 we exported only 60,448,421 pounds, a decline in ten years of more than 58,000,000 pounds. Canada in 1885 exported 146,004,650 pounds, an increase during the same period of more than 85,000,000 pounds. Canada prohibits the manufacture of filled cheese; we do not. We manufacture and sell it abroad. Our export trade declines; theirs increases. That is the result, Mr. Chairman, of the difference between a Government that looks after and protects the interests of the agriculturists against imposition and fraudulent competition and a Government that does not. Had we guarded and watched over the cheese industry of this country as carefully as did our neighbor to the north of us by such legislation as we now propose Canada would have never taken from us our foreign market for genuine cheese.

Mr. CLARDY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will not; I have not the time. [Continuing.] But we would have held our supremacy in that market, as we were capable of doing, had it not been for the injury to the reputation of all American cheese caused by the sale of filled cheese to foreigners for that which it was not. [Applause].

Mr. Chairman, American manufacturers of cream cheese, knowing that because of the reputation of American cheese in the British market they can not sell their product in that market for what it is worth, are to-day exporting their cheese to Canada for reexport to Great Britain, not as American but as Canadian cheese. It is estimated that more than 10,000,000 pounds of American cheese is annually exported to Canada for this purpose, and that, too, as Canadian cheese. Mr. James Neal, consul at Liverpool, in his report says:

The Provision Trade Association, in criticising the cheese, say that the trade in American cheese in considerably prejudiced by the large shipment of bogus or filled cheese, manufactured chiefly in Illinois and Wisconsin, and are of opinion that it should be put a stop to. They make the following recommendations: Absolute prohibition of export of filled cheese and greater care in the manufacture of the best, so as to equal the Canadian in quality.

On the same subject Mr. Robert J. McBride, consul at Leith, Scotland, reporting on the subject of dairy products, says:

On this subject I again wish to quote from the testimony of Mr. Osborne before the select committee of the House of Commons. He said in substance that the public was often imposed upon by the cheese sent here from America, as there is no means of ascertaining the composition of these American cheeses except by analysis. His remedy for both butter and cheese is that foreign governments should be made responsible for the quality of the article shipped. If the foreign governments decline to accept the responsibility, then he would recommend that the articles from such countries should be prohibited from being imported into Great Britain. He would propose that the packages in which the articles were brought to this country should have a government stamp put upon them, and also that there should be a certificate of genuineness. He believed that most of the filled cheeses come from the Western States of the United States and that they were made principally of lard. They looked very like full milk cheeses, but they corrupted very quickly. He attributed the excellent trade in butter at present enjoyed by Denmark simply to the fact that the Danish Government are particular not to allow adulteration. In his opinion it is to the interest of foreign governments to make themselves responsible for the character of the dairy products they export, because it will improve their trade.

Mr. Allen B. Morse, consul at Glasgow, says:

The great trouble with the market for United States cheese in Glasgow is that too many cheeses of an inferior grade and poor quality are being sent here. Lately there has been coming into Great Britain, more notably from Wisconsin, what is called "filled" cheese, among the constituents of which are beef fat, lard, and like substances. This importation has been so marked and so deleterious to the trade in United States cheeses generally that the associations of provision dealers in Glasgow and Liverpool have this winter memorialized the legislature of Wisconsin to enact laws or to provide some means to prevent these filled cheeses being passed off upon dealers and consumers for other than they really are. The dishonesty of these manufacturers will, if not speedily prevented, ruin the market for United States cheese in this country.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to the reports of our consuls abroad upon the effect of the sale of counterfeit cheese in foreign markets on the demand for our genuine cheese I will print in connection with my remarks a protest against filled cheese by the Home and Foreign Produce Exchange, Limited, of London, addressed to the governor, senate, and assembly of the State of Illinois:

PROTEST AGAINST FILLED CHEESE.

HOME AND FOREIGN PRODUCE EXCHANGE, LIMITED,
HIBERIAN CHAMBERS, LONDON BRIDGE, S. E., ENGLAND.

To the Governor, Senate, and Assembly of the State of Illinois, U. S. A.:

A question of vital importance to the interest of the cheese-making industry of your State has for some time past been receiving the serious attention of the London provision trade, viz, the importation from your State of imitation or filled cheese, made of a mixture of foreign fat and poor skim-milk curd. This article has none of the properties of cheese, as the added fat merely disguises the poverty of the curd and rapidly becomes rancid and offensive. By reason of the difficulty of detection from outward appearances, unscrupulous dealers here are pushing it into consumption as genuine, with the result that a very grave taint is being attached to all cheese coming from Illinois, and consumers generally will be prejudiced against cheese as an article of food. This matter is of so serious import to your farmers, as it is most desirable that the good name of Illinois cheese should remain unsullied. The trade here, therefore, most respectfully urge your senate to legislate this matter without delay, and in such a way as will stop the manufacture of the spurious article altogether. Such action will at once remove all suspicion attached to the importations from your State and place the trade upon a creditable and honorable basis.

JOHN D. COPEMAN,
Chairman.
JOSEPH R. WEBB,
Chairman Subcommittee.
C. J. HIGGINSON,
Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, this memorial has been sent here by one of the leading commercial organizations of Europe, asking the people of the State of Illinois, in the interest of public health, in the interest of honesty, and in the interest of our farmers and the foreign market for one of their principal products, to legislate upon the lines proposed in this bill. Could there be more conclusive evidence of the great injury suffered by those interested in the production of honest dairy products than this? If not, why should members of this House shut their eyes to the necessity for this legislation? I believe it to be our highest duty to protect our agricultural industries from unfair rivals or fraudulent competition from within or from without, and I believe it to be our especial duty also to protect consumers against impositions and frauds in the matter of all food products, and against which they are powerless to protect themselves, and so believing I shall cheerfully support this measure. I do so because it is within the legislative limitations fixed by the Constitution, because it is necessary from a revenue standpoint and also necessary for the protection of the producing and consuming classes, because it will promote the public welfare by preventing fraud and deception, and finally, because it is demanded in the interest of the cheese eater as well as in the interest of the cheese maker. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire that the other side should use their time. We have only about thirty minutes left on this side.

Mr. McMILLIN. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill, because in my judgment it is the most infamous bill that ever was brought in this or, I think, in any other properly organized legislative body. I say "infamous." It is infamous, because it is not honest to start with. It does not mean what it says, and it does not say what it means. The advocates of this bill have already developed that fact. The gentleman who has just preceded me says that he wants to encourage foreign importation of this cheese, and yet in the same breath he says that he does not mean to destroy the manufacture of filled cheese. Now, I would like to know how you are going to encourage the importation of the pure cheese unless you absolutely destroy the manufacture of filled cheese?

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. BRUMM. I have not time.

Mr. RAY. You misstate what he said.

Mr. BRUMM. It can not be done, because you can not prevent the false branding of the cheese after it leaves your country. As long as we can manufacture filled cheese—I do not care how you brand it here—the moment it leaves your jurisdiction they will brand it themselves as they please; and the only way to help you in a foreign market is to absolutely destroy the manufacture of filled cheese, and yet gentlemen tell us they do not mean anything of the kind. Another thing; you certainly do not mean revenue by this bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. If they make filled cheese in foreign countries, there is no reason why we should not; and in fact they do make it there. There is not a market in Europe where you do not find it.

Mr. BRUMM. Then how will this bill help you in the foreign markets? It will not help you there. You are trying to gull the people with the idea that it will, but it can not possibly do it. The argument of the gentleman from Ohio proves that conclusively. He says that in Kentucky there are whisky establishments that are worth more than half a million dollars, and yet that if they were deprived of the use of the brand they would not be worth more than 10 per cent of the amount invested in them. The brand, therefore, is the value. They have earned that brand by making a good whisky. There is no law imposing taxation for the purpose of purifying their whisky, and there are many different grades of whisky, from the very best down to the meanest rot-gut, yet the better brands are worth more than the original plants that make them, because their reputation has been built up by making a superior article. That is the only way we can compete with the Canada cheese or with any other cheese—by establishing a reputation for making a superior brand. We can not compete with them by legislation.

Mr. TAWNEY. How are you going to protect your brands when these people counterfeit them?

Mr. BRUMM. You can not stop counterfeiting, especially in foreign countries.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I think we ought to try.

Mr. BRUMM. I want to say to the gentleman that any law that he will propose here that will prevent counterfeiting I will support. He can not go too far in that direction for me. I am willing that you shall brand; I am willing that you shall punish; but I am unwilling that you shall tax this article out of existence. I am unwilling, Mr. Chairman, that they shall tax it out of existence, first, because that policy is antirepublican, is against the genius of our institutions. I am unwilling, in the next place, because by doing so they take a cheaper food product out of the market and compel the poor man to use a dearer one. And let me say right here that butter and cheese as articles of food are not comparable. Butter is a luxury, cheese a necessity.

Mr. LACEY. Filled cheese a necessity? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, sir; filled cheese a necessity. Butter is a relish. Filled cheese is a food, and, being a food, it is a necessity. Of course there are other foods; but the man that will make two blades of grass grow where heretofore but one blade grew is a greater benefactor than he who wins a battle, and the man who introduces a new food product which will tend to cheapen the food of the poor man is equally a benefactor, because he supplies a necessity. Of course there are different meats and not any particular one is absolutely necessary, but there are families in which cheese is one of the leading articles of food, and if filled cheese can be made pure and can be properly marked, then I say, let everybody be his own judge as to whether he wants filled cheese or cheese of the other kind. Again, I am opposed to this bill because it tends to monopoly. I am opposed to it because it does not benefit the farmer. I am opposed to it because it does not benefit the dairyman.

Mr. CHICKERING. Are you opposed to monopolies in general?

Mr. BRUMM. I am always opposed to them.

Mr. CHICKERING. What is there about this that is a monopoly?

Mr. BRUMM. I am going to tell you, if you give me a chance. I say this legislation does not benefit the farmer or the dairyman. It helps only the monopolist. Even your oleomargarine law did not help the farmer. The cry for that legislation did not come from the individual farmer. Your butter is made now in the creameries. Those establishments are found dotted all over the land. Their agents collect the milk and cream and take it to the creameries and there the butter is made. So it is with your cheese. It is made in cheese factories. The agents of the cheese factories collect the milk from the farmers all around, and, as has been stated, there is evidence before the committee that one man owns 30 of these factories. This legislation means the greater concentration of the business. It means just what you say yourselves has been the result of the oleomargarine law, a reduction in the number of factories and the concentration of the business in fewer hands.

Mr. LINNEY. It breaks down healthy competition.

Mr. BRUMM. As suggested by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY], it breaks down healthy competition, drives the cheap cheese out of the market, and by thus reducing the supply enables the few cream-cheese manufacturers to raise the price of all cheese.

Mr. TAWNEY. Fraudulent competition.

Mr. BRUMM. I will go with the gentleman to prevent fraudulent competition.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what it is.

Mr. BRUMM. No; there is the trouble. You do not mean what you say in your bill, and you do not say what you mean. Your bill is an infamous bill. You attempt to tax entirely out of existence these manufacturers of filled cheese and the dealers in it. I would like to go over the provisions of this bill. My friend did not want to go over them; none of you gentlemen on that side seemed to want to go over the individual sections of the bill.

I say you absolutely tax this industry out of existence. Why, sir, just think of a grocer in a country town paying $40 license to sell filled cheese! No dealer can afford to pay such a tax as that. The provision of the bill means that no man dare sell the article; and it seems to me nonsense, an insult to our intelligence, to think that an American Congress would permit a bill to pass so filled from beginning to end with fraud and deception, carrying on its face a meaning different from that which you intend shall be its operation.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BRUMM. I am sorry I can not yield. If my time were extended I should be glad to do so.

You wipe out the filled cheese, or the cheese of the poor man, and you diminish the supply of cheese.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman know that the filled cheese of the "poor man" is sold for the same price as genuine cheese?

Mr. BRUMM. I have no doubt of that. And the gentleman knows very well, because he is a judge of the article, that poor whisky is sold at the same price as good whisky.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, and I want to suppress the sale of the bad article wherever I can.

Mr. BRUMM. But you can not do it by a law. That is the point. [Applause.]

Mr. McMILLIN. I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] five minutes more.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I say this bill will produce no revenue. You can accomplish the prevention of fraud much better by imposing a fair, reasonable tax, as suggested by my friend the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. LACEY. Now that the gentleman's time has been extended (and I hope he will have additional time if he wishes), will he yield for a question?

Mr. BRUMM. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. Has the gentleman had occasion to eat this cheese? Has he tried it, so as to be able to tell us whether it is a good article or a bad one?

Mr. BRUMM. I am no judge of cheese myself.

Mr. LACEY. That is what I thought. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. But if the gentleman is such a good judge of cheese and does not like the filled cheese, he need not eat it; that is all. [Laughter.] The question whether men are judges of cheese themselves or whether they are not is a matter that does not touch this argument. I am willing that this article shall be branded. I do not care how black a brand you put upon it. But I am unwilling to put our legislation in such a shape that if any man wants to buy this article with its black brand upon it, he is practically prohibited from doing so, for you say that no man shall sell it in my district. That is what your bill means.

I am opposed to this bill because it is against the doctrine of protection. I am opposed to it because it introduces a system antagonistic to our ideas of revenue. And I want to say here that the 10-per-cent tax on banks is not a case to be cited here, because our Government has absolute jurisdiction over the coinage, the issue, and the value of money. Therefore, the 10-per-cent tax on banks has no relevance in this case. But when you come to tax food products in an internal sense, you are only justified in doing so, first for revenue, and next because of an absolute necessity in the sense of self-preservation. There is no other ground on which you can justify yourselves.

Let me state how this bill is inconsistent with the doctrine of protection. Protection encourages home production; this bill does not. Protection destroys monopolies; this bill creates monopoly. Protection cheapens the article; this bill makes the article dearer. Protection raises revenue; this bill does not raise any revenue. Protection makes the foreign producer pay the tax; this bill makes the home producer pay the tax, notwithstanding my friends on the other side may disagree with me. Therefore, I say that by passing this measure you are striking at the very essence and root of the dogma that we are so proud of as Republicans. And, therefore, I shall oppose this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I am absolutely amazed at the language used and statements made by the gentleman from the great State of Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM]. I am amazed that any man from that State can in so short a time show himself possessed of so much absolute and appalling ignorance. [Laughter.] Now, I was brought up on a farm, and although for the last thirty years engaged in the law business, I have during most of that time managed farms, conducted dairies, had to do with cheese factories, and with butter, and with the people of this country interested in the maintenance of those industries. I think I know something about dairying, something about cows, something about butter, something about lard and other hog products, and also something about the habits of our people.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] started out by absolutely misrepresenting the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]. The gentleman from Minnesota stated that the filled-cheese business was destroying the legitimate cheese business of the country——

Mr. BRUMM. I must——

Mr. RAY. The gentleman from Minnesota stated that this filled-cheese business had so interfered with the legitimate cheese industry that our farmers and business men——

Mr. BRUMM. I deny the gentleman's statement.

Mr. RAY. That our farmers and business men are sending our pure cheese to Canada, where it is being branded as Canada cheese and shipped to England, thus giving us a market. That is what the gentleman stated.

Mr. BRUMM. I was not talking of what the gentleman from Minnesota said. I was speaking of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania misrepresented the gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. BRUMM. I was not talking about him.

Mr. RAY. By stating that he had said we were endeavoring to pass this bill for the purpose of giving a market abroad to this filled cheese.

Mr. BRUMM. That is what the gentleman from New York said.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman from Minnesota stated no such thing, and the gentleman from New York stated no such thing.

Mr. BRUMM. I did not say he did. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania must have filled himself with some sort of product except the genuine stuff. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. You seem to have nothing in you at all. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope that this merriment will not come out of my limited time, because I want to state two or three other things with reference to this measure.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that butter is not a food, but is a luxury. This is the first I have heard of that. It is surprising to me that a man should make such a statement. The farmers and the laboring men all up through the northern part of Pennsylvania, through New York, New England, and all of the cheese-producing States, and the great West use butter as a food—understand it to be food.

Mr. BRUMM. Let me ask a question right there. Did you ever have any butter issued to you while you were in the Army?

Mr. RAY. Oh, yes; I was in the Army——

Mr. BRUMM. But did you have butter issued to you?

Mr. RAY. Yes; I had butter issued to me occasionally; and we bought it once in a while, when we could find it and had the price.

But, sir, the evidence before the committee demonstrates beyond all peradventure that nearly all of the fat that goes into the manufacture of filled cheese is lard; and still the gentleman says that filled cheese is a magnificent, healthy, life-sustaining, pure-food product, because there is lard in it and no butter, and the people want it, long for it, and I suppose that in his district the "babies cry for it."

Now, when the laboring man and the people of this country who use these articles want lard, they can buy it for themselves in a pure form and by its proper name; and if they want to eat lard they can do so, and eat it as lard. When they want cheese, let them have cheese; and the main object and purpose of this bill is to compel the dealers in this article known as "filled cheese" in the cities and villages all over this country to sell cheese as cheese and filled cheese as filled cheese. The main purpose is to prevent the commission of a fraud upon the customer by selling him one thing under the name of another. We purpose to pass this bill that the purchaser may know when he goes into a store exactly what he is buying and what he is paying for and using.

I regret, sir, very much that time will not permit of a more extended consideration of the question, but I wish, at all events, to call attention to the fact that there was very much fallacy in the position occupied by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM], and to impress upon gentlemen the fact that this is not a question of taxation, but one of honesty, pure food, and the protection of the agricultural interests of the dairying States of the Union.

This bill defines and imposes a tax upon and regulates the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of what is known as filled cheese. The bill says that all substances made of milk or skimmed milk, with the admixture of butter, animal oils or fats, vegetable or any other oils or compounds foreign to such milk, and made in imitation or semblance of cheese shall be known and designated as filled cheese.

Mr. Chairman, the people of this country who use any article as food have the right to know what they are consuming. Cheese is understood to be the product of the dairy, an article made from milk and containing the substantial constituents of milk. Filled cheese is not manufactured from milk, but from lard, the product of the hog, and thus the hog is placed in opposition to the cow as a producer of cheese. I am opposed to this imposition upon the American food consumer. I am not opposed to the American hog or to those who desire to ally themselves with the American hog, but I am opposed to the product of the hog being used as the milk of the cow, and am opposed to any such imposition upon the American bovine.

Under date of March 5, 1896, H. W. Wiley, chief of Chemistry Division in the Agricultural Department, tells us that a sample of filled cheese is composed as follows:

	Per cent
Ash	5.44
Casein	22.25
Fat	34.02
Water	31.09
Sugar and undetermined matter	7.20
Reichert No.	1.80
Iodin No.	50.07

He further tells us that the fat found in filled cheese is composed almost exclusively of lard stearine. Stearine, as its name might imply, is not extracted from the steer, but is a hog product, and the residue or offscourings resulting or obtained from the manufacture of lard oil. The only milk used in the manufacture of filled cheese is that from which the cream has been removed by the separator. In other words, filled cheese is the result of mixing refuse lard with skim milk and so combining the two as to produce an article that is sold to the laboring masses of this country as the product of the dairy, when, in fact, it is not cheese and does not contain the life-sustaining power found in cheese. Filled cheese is a fraud and an imposition upon those who would purchase and use cheese as a food. Filled cheese is an imposition upon the farmers of the United States, for it substitutes in our city markets an article that is not cheese for cheese—substitutes a fraudulent article that is sold as cheese. Filled cheese is an indigestible mass of lard or other animal oils flavored with skim milk.

This bill seeks to compel manufacturers and dealers in this article to brand it as filled cheese and to sell it as filled cheese, and it imposes penalties for failing to comply with the law in this respect. The bill seeks to protect the honest farmers and also the consumers of cheese.

In the first instance, the bill proposes to raise revenues for the support of the Government by imposing a tax upon all persons who deal in filled cheese. If any person desires to enter into competition with the American cow and produce and sell "filled cheese" by combining skim milk with lard, he is permitted to do so by first taking out a license and paying a tax entitling him to engage in this business. Then the retail dealer must put up a sign indicating that he is dealing in filled cheese and not in cheese the product of the dairy.

Again, these filled cheese when manufactured and ready for the market must be plainly branded, so that he who buys may know that he is purchasing the fraudulent article instead of the genuine. The bill imposes fines upon those who deal in filled cheese without first having paid the tax and secured a license.

It is the duty of the American Congress to see to it that the farmers are protected in the legitimate industry of butter and cheese making. It is the duty of the Congress to see to it that the food consumers are not imposed upon. This bill seeks to accomplish the three objects: First, the raising of revenue for the support of the Government, of which we are sadly in need; second, to protect the dairying interests of the United States, and third, to protect the food consumers against fraud and imposition. Those who undertake to claim that butter is not a food product, but only a luxury, need only to inquire at the dinner table of the laboring man to know that they are sadly deceived or grossly ignorant.

The cow has held her place in the affections of the people of all countries in all ages, and will continue to hold her place, and butter and cheese will hold their places in the affections of food consumers for all time. It is only recently that certain individuals, who care much for the almighty dollar, but nothing whatever for the stomachs of the American citizens, have started the manufacture of this bogus, fraudulent article known as filled cheese. The proposition now before this House is to prevent imposition and permit those who desire cheese to have cheese, and those who desire lard to have lard. When the roll is called on this bill the friends of the farmer, of the agricultural interests of the United States, will vote aye, while those who favor fraud will vote no.

The same cry that is now raised against this bill was raised against the bill that sought to tax oleomargarine or bogus butter. It was claimed that that law would be unconstitutional. But it was passed, and it has stood the test in the courts and has been pronounced constitutional in every feature. This bill is framed upon the same lines, and will be found constitutional in every respect. It is a just bill. As the gentleman from Minnesota has already stated, this filled cheese, this fraudulent article, has been largely manufactured and shipped abroad as genuine cheese, as the product of the American dairy.

The people over the water were not slow to discover the imposition, and the result has been that American cheese has been brought into disrepute, and the market for the genuine article has been almost destroyed. As stated by him, our farmers have been compelled to send our genuine cheese to Canada, have it there branded as Canadian cheese, and shipped thence to England and the Continent of Europe in order to obtain for it a market. All this we have done because Canada has prohibited the manufacture or sale of this filled and fraudulent cheese, and hence has maintained for herself a market abroad, not only for the products of her own dairies, but for the products of dairies in the United States. It seems strange to me that any member of the American Congress can for a moment oppose the passage of a bill that seeks to sustain, and that will sustain, the character of the product of the American dairy and restore to us a profitable market in foreign countries for the legitimate article.

Mr. Chairman, I have no sympathy with those gentlemen who oppose this bill because it seeks to tax the business of manufacturing filled cheese. We have the right to tax it for the purpose of raising revenue. Incidentally we have the right to tax the business for the purpose of protecting legitimate cheese and butter making in the United States. If we have not this right, then the United States of America had better go out of business, and the farmers of the United States would do well to resign at once in favor of fraud and imposition.

Every legitimate business has a right to every lawful protection we can throw around it, and no honest man will complain. The tillage of the soil is an honorable employment, and the hard-worked farmer has the right to appeal to the American Congress for such laws as will give him the benefit of the business in which he is engaged.

It has been stated here that filled cheese is a wholesome article of food, not deleterious to health. With this statement I can not agree. I do not suppose that a small amount of lard taken into the human stomach is very detrimental provided the digestive apparatus is in good condition. But I am quite certain that no human being can eat lard in any form in the same quantities he would eat cheese and survive the operation unless he has the digestive apparatus of an ostrich.

It may be that an Eskimo in the very highest northern latitudes might eat filled cheese with impunity, but it is quite certain that no human being in our latitude can eat filled cheese as cheese and long maintain a decent degree of health or a respectable equanimity of temper.

If any of the gentlemen who oppose this bill desire to consume filled cheese and thus add to the market for hog products, I have no objection, but I do insist that it is our duty to see to it that they are protected in having filled cheese when they desire it. I insist that the retail dealer shall sell cheese when he purports to sell cheese and only sell hog cheese or filled cheese when he purports to supply his customer with that article. The passage of this bill will secure protection not only to the hog-cheese eater but to the consumer of the legitimate product of the dairy.

It is a conceded fact that filled cheese can be sold at a profit and at from 5 to 7 cents per pound less than the genuine cheese, and it is also a conceded fact that manufacturers and dealers in filled cheese are now quite generally selling the bogus article as genuine and for the same price that the genuine article commands. Therefore it is not at all strange that the lobby of this House is crowded with the hired attorneys of these manufacturers of filled cheese, who are using every possible effort to prevent the passage of this bill.

The Fifty-fourth Congress owes to itself the duty of rebuking these men who would fatten at the expense of the honest farmers of the United States engaged in a legitimate business. If we fail in our duty now we shall be held responsible by the great army of American farmers and that other great army of honest workingmen who consume the products of the farm, now marching side by side under the Republican banner justly expecting that our pledges to them will be redeemed. This should not be made a political question, but the bill seems to excite opposition only from the Democratic side of this House. The plea is that we are unjustly taxing an honest industry. If the industry of manufacturing filled cheese is an honest one, why this excited and strenuous opposition to those features of the bill which require filled cheese to be plainly branded, advertised, and sold as such?

If the industry of manufacturing and selling filled cheese is an honest one, why have those engaged in it heretofore sold the article as genuine cheese, the genuine product of the dairy? Why have they not given the article some other name? The answer is plain. Filled cheese has maintained itself in the market only by false pretenses. The manufacturers of this fraudulent article have borrowed the name cheese and applied it to this sham in order to impose upon the trade and upon the consumer. As already stated, the production of the genuine article has largely fallen off since the manufacture of this fraud commenced. Our farmers are suffering; the market for their legitimate product is being destroyed; and at the same time the consumers of cheese are being imposed upon, and an extravagant and exorbitant price is being demanded and received of them in exchange for the fraudulent article which they have no intention of purchasing. In effect, the consumer is being fraudulently deprived of the fruits of his honest toil, while his health is at the same time being steadily impaired without his knowing the cause.

Justice to the farmer, justice to the consumer of food products, and justice to the national character all demand that this bill speedily become a law.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY].

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that this bill will not pass in its present shape.

The question raised by the bill has in it more than appears on the surface, and goes to the very bottom of the exercise of the taxing power.

Now, so far as the product itself is concerned, the testimony, as stated, shows, I think, conclusively that it is not deleterious to health. If it is deleterious to health, then the bill does not go far enough. If it is not deleterious to health, it goes entirely too far.

Now, if the testimony is in accord with what I have stated—and so far as I have been able to examine it it seems to be in entire accord with it—that the food product known as filled cheese is not deleterious to health, then the bill is unquestionably wrong in principle, because the tax it seeks to impose on the manufacture and sale of this article is one that will make its manufacture and sale impossible. Therefore the question presented by the bill is whether the taxing power shall be exercised in the interest of or to the prejudice of the people. If it is to the interest of the people to so exercise the taxing power as to abolish an institution or an industry, then I am in favor of it on the ground that the institution or industry abolished was injurious. But if it is to the prejudice of the people, or any large class of them, to exercise the taxing power to the extent of abolishing or destroying an industry, I am opposed to the exercise.

This seems to be an instance, Mr. Chairman, where we are attempting to use the taxing power of the Government so as to destroy an industry that has grown to considerable proportions in this country, that employs a considerable number of people, and that furnishes a food product of which chemists and others testify that it is not injurious to the health of those who consume it, and a food product that can be furnished at from 5 to 6 cents a pound less than the genuine article.

Now, in so far as the bill proposes to compel the manufacturers of filled cheese to brand their products so that every purchaser will know precisely what he is getting, I am in favor of the bill. I believe that both those who manufacture and those who sell it should be compelled to brand it, in so far as the law can compel them to do so, to the end that every purchaser may be advised as to what he is purchasing. When you have provided for such branding and have provided the means of enforcing it upon all manufacturers and dealers, have you not accomplished all that is really desirable? In its present shape the bill is not in any sense a revenue measure; it is a bill for the destruction of what appears to be a legitimate industry. It may be said also of the industry itself that it is not a competitor of the cow, nor does its prosecution in any way interfere with or limit the usefulness of the cow; on the contrary, it extends that usefulness by using the skim milk, after the cream cheese has been extracted from it, for the manufacture of filled cheese.

We have taken that course with oleomargarine, that is, required its marking and branding, and the growth of the manufacture of oleomargarine has proceeded right along, for the reason that there are millions of people in this country to-day who use no butter on their tables or in their houses except oleomargarine. It is used in more than one-half of the hotels of America to-day, and I have no doubt that there are plenty of men upon this floor who use oleomargarine, many and many a time—I had almost said every day of their lives—without knowing whether it is oleo or whether it is genuine butter.

Now, these products and these industries that fill a place in our industrial system, and that furnish cheaper food products to a large class of people, and which products are palatable and healthful, are in my opinion doing a good thing instead of a bad thing. While I should be in favor of levying a sufficient tax upon the manufacture and sale of the product to pay for the supervision of it, I am opposed to the levying of one single cent more than will pay for the complete supervision of the business by the Government. Whenever it can be determined just what amount of tax is necessary to that end, I am in favor of that tax. I believe that a tax of $50 a year upon the manufacturer, $25 a year upon the wholesale dealer, and $1 a year upon the retail dealer will pay for all the supervision necessary upon the part of the Government in order to insure to the people the sale of the genuine product, if they want the genuine, and the liberty to purchase the filled cheese if they want that.

This, Mr. Chairman, seems to be the question at issue, the question raised by this bill. I have read a portion of the testimony, but have not had time to read it all. I heard the statement made a while ago that the motive which prompts an act is of no consequence if the act itself is legal. Now, I undertake to say that that is not sound philosophy. The motive which prompts an act is always a question to be inquired into, especially by those who engage in the making of laws. The motive that prompts an act is the best index to the character of that act itself, and therefore ought to be inquired into. It may be true that the motive which prompts an act does not determine its legality or illegality, but it may determine its morality or its beneficence, or the contrary. It may determine that to a very considerable extent.

I have listened to the statements relative to the manner in which this cheese is made. Now, while there is some conflict in the evidence, there seems to be a preponderance of testimony that there is a sufficient cooking of the raw fat which enters into the makeup of filled cheese to absolutely destroy every disease germ there is in it, if there are any. There is a sufficient cooking, according to the testimony given before the committee. It is true that one man stated that the temperature at which the raw fat was cooked was 130 degrees; but he was informed by the chairman of the committee that the testimony showed that statement to be incorrect. So we have from the committee itself the statement that there is a sufficient cooking of the principal ingredient that enters into the makeup of this food product to make it healthful so far as the cooking is concerned.

I undertake to say, however, that this is not so much a question of digestion as it is a question of exercising the taxing power to promote the welfare of the people, or to impede that welfare. It is not so much a question of the economy of health as it is a question of the economy of the pocketbook upon the part of a very large class of the people of this country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not use any more time at present, and whatever time I may have left I yield back to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman is exhausted.

Mr. McMILLIN. I yield fifteen minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to trouble the House with any remarks on this subject, but it has seemed to me, since the discussion of this bill began, that it was due to myself that I should state the views I entertain, in justification of the vote I shall cast in opposition to this bill should it not be materially amended and modified.

In my short experience in this House I have found an exceeding disposition upon the part of some one interest, whether it be one sort of interest or another to obtain some kind of Congressional legislation in aid of itself, as against a rival interest.

Now, if I am not mistaken, that is largely the germ and origin of this proposed measure. I believe I can say with accuracy that until this discussion began in the Committee on Ways and Means I never consciously heard of the article called "filled cheese." I have heard but little of anything else since. I have no constituent, so far as I know, who feels much interest in the bill. So that I have come to the consideration of this question without any feeling or any kind of prejudice for or against the article called "filled cheese." If this article were a mere luxury, and a possibly injurious luxury, as is or may be alleged against whisky, if there were doubts of its being a good thing for the country and the people, I should not oppose this bill; but it is nothing of that kind. Filled cheese is unquestionably a meritorious food product. It is a product made of skimmed milk in which rennet, pure lard, and other harmless substances take the place of the butter or cream, and the milk being filled in this way, the product is called "filled cheese" in contradistinction to cream cheese made without skimming the milk. Doubtless it is not as meritorious a food product as full-cream cheese, but that it is healthful, or rather that it is not unhealthy, is demonstrated by the fact that 12,000,000 pounds of it have been made and consumed in this country annually and not one single particle of proof has ever been heard or suspected to exist that those who use it as a food have in any wise been injured by its consumption.

Now, while that may not demonstrate that it is as good a product as full-cream cheese, unquestionably it demonstrates that it is not a deleterious article of food. That being so, the question is, as presented in this bill, Shall this food industry be in any wise injured by legislation discriminating against it and in favor of another food product, I do not care if that other product is a better food product than this? I am a protectionist of the straightest sect; but I have not so learned the doctrine of protection as to believe that under it you can either wisely, justly, or fairly legislate in the interest of one meritorious home industry against the interest of another meritorious home industry, though the latter may not be so fully meritorious as the former; but let each stand upon its own merit. I am willing to protect a home industry against a foreign industry every time, but never one meritorious home industry against another home industry. Let each of these food products stand on its own merit; and in order that that may be done I am inclined to favor that part of this bill which provides that these manufacturers of filled cheese shall be required to brand it, shall be required to identify it in such a way that the marks of identification shall remain with the article until it goes into the hands of the consumer, so that when he buys and eats he may know exactly what he is doing.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Is not the proposition to abolish the tax on alcohol for the arts directly in the interest of the manufacturer of wood alcohol?

Mr. EVANS. Whether that is so or not is a question I may discuss at the proper time, should there be any legislation submitted to the House to call for it. It can not be denied that if this bill is passed it will be greatly to the discredit of filled cheese, as something that Congress thought not quite as fit for food as cream cheese and that it ought to be legislated against to the extent at least of putting a tax upon it, and requiring that those who deal in it should pay a license fee for so doing.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood the gentleman a moment ago to say that he was in favor of branding this filled cheese.

Mr. EVANS. I am.

Mr. TAWNEY. Would not that discredit it fully as much as taxing it?

Mr. EVANS. Not at all. It only makes it say what it is; and I shall favor that, though somewhat doubtingly, and only because I am willing that far to aid the great foundation industry of farming, coupled as that object is with the equally meritorious one of furnishing the consumer with the means of knowing what he is getting.

Mr. TAWNEY. What right has Congress to legislate as to that?

Mr. EVANS. If you will allow me, I will develop my idea. I did not interrupt you, and have not interrupted any gentleman; and perhaps it would conduce to the clearness of my expression, and I may cover the whole field—if I can in fifteen minutes—if I can be allowed to proceed without interruption.

I doubt very much whether Congress ought, as an original proposition, ever to legislate upon this or kindred subjects unless there should be some overwhelming reason for it. But I say, so far as this bill is concerned, my opposition to it is not so radical as that I would say I would not support it if you reduce the taxes to nominal sums and immensely modify the severity of the punishments prescribed. I do not say that I would not support it in that event. On the contrary, I would. But you must remember that the only power that Congress has to pass such legislation as this lies in the fact, as I understand it, that it may levy a tax upon any article, it makes no difference what it is.

If you want to raise revenue it is perfectly legitimate for Congress to tax any article. It may tax this or it may tax that; and if the object of this bill were to raise revenue for the Government—if we needed this revenue—then I might support it even in its present form. But that is not the purpose behind the proposed legislation. The object to be accomplished by this bill is to protect cream cheese and the public who use it, and this end is to be reached by requiring filled cheese to be branded and marked. That far I am willing to go and to put a nominal tax upon it, so as to give Congress jurisdiction of the subject, and thus secure the accomplishment of the great object of identifying this cheese, and giving everybody notice of what it really is. But I do not believe that anybody will contend, on the evidence produced before the Committee on Ways and Means, that this industry is one which gives a product which is injurious either to the morals or to the health of the people. In this connection I will read a statement from one of those who were most intelligent upon the subject, Mr. Adams, food and dairy commissioner of Wisconsin. In his testimony he made this statement, which, I believe, is a frank declaration, and the truth in the case. He said, on page 122 of the hearings:

> This question is not one of public health; it is not one of hygiene; it is not one of dietetics; nor is it one of digestion; it is simply and purely one of honesty and trade.

That is all. I say that he exactly gave the facts in this statement. He stated them with accuracy and with fullness. Then, so far as the merits of the bill may be concerned, the question is one affecting only honesty in trade. There is no question of health in it.

Mr. STEELE. Will my colleague allow me a question?

Mr. EVANS. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. Will you not read the statement of the Chemist of the Agricultural Department, where he says that the heat that is applied in making this filled cheese is not sufficiently great to kill the trichinæ?

Mr. EVANS. I will say this: That it is and must be a wonderfully small, feeble, insignificant germ that has been put into this filled cheese, when there has been 12,000,000 pounds of it manufactured and used per year and not one of those germs has been in the business of injuring anybody at any time since this manufacture was started. [Laughter.] No, this is a matter of requiring honesty in trade, and I say all right. Make these people place marks of identification on this cheese. I am very doubtful whether, in your efforts to bring this about, you ought to charge the expense of it to the industry. You ought to make the Government pay for it instead of taxing this one industry. You ought not to tax one industry in a business to make it pay for protecting the public where you are discriminating against it and in favor of another industry.

What is the principle involved? It is that Congress can sit in judgment upon every industry, and if it shall decide that the product of one is being sold as a counterfeit resemblance of another it can for public protection require the placing upon it of such identifying marks as will distinguish it from the genuine. I doubt, I say, if this is within the constitutional power of Congress, unless coupled with the taxing power or as a regulation of interstate commerce. In this bill that difficulty is relieved by the taxation provided for. But another one arises when the question is viewed from the standpoint of taxation.

We ought not to single out one individual food product even though it be a rival of a better one and tax it. If we do it here, we do not know where we shall stop. We may be called upon to try every inferior and cheaper product of every industry, thus necessarily making it higher in order to protect the dearer products. In my judgment we should go no further than to require branding, etc., and impose no tax high enough to increase the price of this food to men whose taste or poverty leads them to buy it.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this matter is narrowed down to a very small compass. It is, in my judgment, a question whether you are going to tax the filled-cheese interest in order to build up the cream-cheese industry, or at least to keep it from retrograding. In this age we can not undertake to keep down modern ideas or modern inventions. In almost every field of production you will find industries that were well established and had gone on prosperously for years when some great modern improvement came in and cut under them, and undermined them. Those superseded industries might come here and claim that the new processes which produced the goods cheaper ought to be taxed for the benefit of the old industries, but would anyone concede the claim? Not at all.

I do not believe that the taxing power of Congress ought to be exercised upon individual products unless upon articles, like whisky and beer, which may be alleged to be deleterious to the public health. But no such charge as that is made with regard to filled cheese. Therefore, what we have here is simply the case of one industry seeking to discredit another industry in order that its own interests may be built up. I am willing, though I have some doubt as to the propriety of the step, I am willing to vote for this bill in so far as it proposes to require the branding and identification of this product, but I do insist that the other discrediting elements in the bill, the subjecting of this business to such severe punishments and to overtaxation, ought to be eliminated.

If you are going to tax this article at all, make your tax nominal. It is necessary to impose a nominal tax in order that Congress may get authority over the matter. I am willing to impose a nominal tax, so as to give Congress jurisdiction, although as a rule I believe it would be safer to discourage legislation of this character altogether. I believe the first effort that was made in this direction was when the oleomargarine act was passed, and I think that was a step in the wrong direction. The only ground upon which legislation of this character can be justified is that it is immoral for any man to attempt to palm off upon the public an article under a false designation. I am willing to go far enough to prevent that. I am willing to say that this article shall be marked and branded, so that it can be distinguished and known for what it is, but I think we ought not to go any further than that in this kind of legislation.

Mr. Chairman, if I have any time left I yield it back to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. McMILLIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY].

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat startled at this proposition. One thing that shook my confidence in the patriotism and wisdom of the Democratic organization, to which I more than ten years ago belonged, was its disposition to drift away from what I have thought, ever since I have given any attention to public matters, to be the proper system of taxation to support the Government of the United States, to wit, the tariff system; and I have been taught to believe and I do believe to-day as firmly as I believe anything, that the true policy of this great Republic of ours is to abstain totally from the imposition of excise taxes. The laying and collecting of internal or excise taxes can be justified only by some great overpowering necessity. The history of this Republic, from its foundation down to the present, I think, establishes that proposition.

In the earliest period of the country's existence resort was had to a system of direct taxation. That resort was brought about by a war necessity, to wit, the burdens of the Revolutionary struggle. Subsequent to that period, the statesmen of the past contented themselves with a properly regulated system of indirect taxation, or rather of customs dues, by reason of its beneficent operation upon the industries of the country, while at the same time it supplied revenue enough to meet the demands of the Government, and thus obviate the necessity of the hand of the taxgatherer being placed upon the industries and the energies of the individual citizens of the Republic.

I think it is very easy to prove that the present system of internal revenue can be defended only as a war necessity. The war between the States necessarily imposed upon the Republic a war debt, the pressing weight of which can hardly be estimated. Hence the same necessity was upon us that had come upon us immediately subsequent to the Revolution and subsequent to other wars that we had after the Revolution; but the very moment that the necessity ceases, wisdom and patriotism dictate that this kind of tax, which is imposed as a necessity, shall likewise cease. Hence I have indulged the fond hope and the people of the South have indulged the hope that the time was near at hand when, instead of putting additional articles upon the list for internal taxation, we would be able to wipe out the whole internal-revenue system, and it gladdened my heart only a few days ago when the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] said that he was willing to do that now.

But, Mr. Chairman, this bill, I respectfully submit, goes far beyond anything that has hitherto entered the mind of any careful, painstaking, conservative thinker in the United States. Now, let me see whether I can not prove that proposition. The system of excise taxes hitherto existing, being a necessity visited upon our people by reason of war, has been confined to certain articles which were regarded as luxuries, things which were not necessary to human existence, which did not answer the purpose of food—such articles as whisky, that the great State of Maine, I believe, has dispensed with long ago; such articles as tobacco, without which the citizen can probably exist in a better state of health than with it. But what does this bill propose? As I understand, it proposes to lay the hand of the taxgatherer upon a product of industry fit for human consumption. Not only that, but it proposes to effectually blockade some lines of hope—yes, thousands of lines of hope—that are now open to the poor, the energetic, and the industrious people of the country. Pass this bill, and the hundreds and thousands of people who are engaged in this legitimate business will have to seek employment elsewhere. That is what I understand to be the effect of the measure.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, I doubt our power to pass such a bill as this. The Constitution of the United States yet exists. Every member of this House swears to support it. How far may we go in the direction of such legislation as this? If we may tax this particular class of manufacturers of cheese in order to benefit the manufacturers of another class, why can we not tax the yellow-corn in order to benefit the white-corn grower? Why can we not tax spring wheat in order to benefit the grower of wheat of other varieties? Why can we not tax the inferior kind of potatoes that are grown in some parts of the country in order to benefit the sellers of the "White Rose"? Tell me, some one who is in the habit of thinking about these matters—who has made great questions of state a specialty for years and years—tell me where is the limit? Because I think this bill passes the true limit of our constitutional power I oppose it.

When the oleomargarine bill was passed many of the best thinkers of this country believed that we exceeded our constitutional authority. Unquestionably we took then a step beyond anything that ever received the sanction and encouragement of the best thinkers of the country in its earliest days. This bill goes a step beyond the oleomargarine legislation. And if this House in its wisdom should conclude to add this article to the list of those coming within the system of excise taxes, as we now have it, where is the limit of our authority?

Besides, sir, if we go on adding to the articles covered by this system of excise taxes, when can we begin to reduce and finally abolish that system? Instead of making additions, something ought to be lopped off somewhere. If gentlemen in charge of this bill will agree to strike out its provisions and substitute therefor a proposition to repeal the tax now imposed upon fruit brandies, I will vote for it. Why? Because that would be one step in the right direction; it would lop off a portion of our excise taxes. I believe that the great leader of thought in the other end of the Capitol—that conservative, painstaking, philosophic thinker, Senator SHERMAN—has already advocated legislation in this direction. He has declared, I believe, that the time has now come when, instead of enlarging our system of excise taxation, instead of placing additional articles upon the list, the Government of the United States should dispense with this system of taxation entirely, leaving all the articles now subjected to this species of taxation to be taxed by the States, if need be, in order to relieve local burdens. [Applause.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SHAW].

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, there is one feature of this bill which very forcibly affects the people of my district in the State of North Carolina. I refer to the $40 tax which it is proposed to lay upon the retail dealer. In my section of North Carolina we have a great many country stores—stores which are away from the railroads 25, 30, or it may be 40 miles. Many of these stores do not sell perhaps $100 worth of cheese during a year. But there are some people who want cheese—everybody wants cheese occasionally—and if a tax of this kind is imposed upon these small dealers, a great many people will be absolutely deprived of a cheap article of food.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman—I do not know how it is in other sections of the country—in the South labor has been reduced year after year during the last few years, until to-day in the cotton fields and in the turpentine forests of the South the laboring man can not make half as many dollars within a given time as he did ten years ago. But under the provisions of this bill, instead of doing something to reduce the price of food in proportion to the reduction in the price paid for labor, you increase the price of food upon which the laborer must subsist.

I would not object to this bill, Mr. Chairman, provided there were no tax attached to it. I think it would be right that when a man offers an inferior class of cheese for sale he should brand that cheese as a cheap or inferior article. But, sir, if this bill be enacted, then in addition to the great horde of spies and revenue officers that we now have in my State we shall find the courts crowded with numerous indictments which ought never to have been brought.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] has stated that cheese is a necessity, while butter is a luxury. That is not so in my State. Where we live, almost any poor man living out in the sand hills can keep a little cow and have butter occasionally, but a number of cows are required if one wishes to engage in making cheese; and if one wishes it for his own consumption it takes money with which to buy it. I submit, sir, as a matter of fact, that if this bill is passed in its present state there will be numbers of poor people throughout this country who have heretofore been able to eat cheese who must do without it in the future.

Now, if the bill is so amended as to strike out the clause imposing the tax on the country stores, and all taxes, I think I shall vote for it, but not otherwise.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLARDY].

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman, there has been so much said on the pending bill that I shall occupy the time of the committee but for a very few moments.

If this bill sought only to require the manufacturers of filled cheese to brand it what it really is, then I should have no possible objection to it. In fact, when I first saw the caption of the bill, and believed that to be its purpose, I thought I would vote for it. It seemed to propose to do what was just and fair. When I come to examine it more particularly, however, I see that it goes very far beyond that.

I believe that every manufacturer of goods should sell them for what they really are, and not for what they are not. I do not object to that restriction. If that were the only restriction, I should certainly favor it. But it goes, as I have said, far beyond what is reasonable and seeks to crush out one industry apparently for the benefit of another.

It is not only against the genius of our country, Mr. Chairman, and our system of government, but it is a bill that is decidedly to the disadvantage of many of the citizens of our country. A man who manufactures filled cheese does it as a legitimate industry, just as much as any other manufacturer, and he has as much right to make filled cheese as the other man has to make any other kind of cheese or any other class of goods.

Now, there is just one other question. It is admitted that this product is not injurious to health; that is to say, it is a healthful article for human sustenance. If that be so, why should we tax one healthful article to make another healthful article sell higher or give it a better or more extended market? The great masses of the people of this country are compelled to use cheap food, which they are able to purchase or produce. Now, if this healthful food is a cheap food, and not deleterious to health, why should not the people be allowed to exercise their own option and buy it and use it instead of paying the higher price that they would be compelled otherwise to pay for the genuine article?

There is one other point, and I propose to be very brief. I have stated two propositions connected with the matter, but there is still another. Gentlemen say that this bill seeks to protect the products of agriculture. I represent one of the best agricultural districts in this country, and have at present no other interest except in farming. But there is not a single article used in the manufacture of filled cheese that is not an agricultural product. I ask your especial attention to this statement: There is not a single article entering into the manufacture of this cheese that is not a part of the agricultural products of this country just as much as milk is. My district is not a cheese-making district, it is not a butter-producing district, it is not a dairy district; but it is a district that raises in large numbers hogs and cattle for the markets of the country, and these, you gentlemen say, are the products which enter largely in the manufacture of filled cheese. I claim that they are just as healthful as any other products of agriculture.

Gentlemen say that with some stomachs this filled cheese might disagree. I say the same statement might be made of bacon and many other products which we produce on our farms. The healthiest farming people I have ever seen or known, either in my experience as a farmer or a physician, were the negroes of the South when they lived almost exclusively upon bacon and corn bread. There never was a healthier people. If these are facts, and they have not been denied here in this discussion, then this bill seeks to benefit one class of our farmers to the detriment of another, and I am opposed to it on that ground; and the only reason I rose, Mr. Chairman, was to express these views from the standpoint of a farmer.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I yield five minutes of the remaining time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, this bill is introduced for one of two purposes—either for the purpose of driving this filled-cheese industry out of existence, or it is for the purpose of allowing another industry to come in competition with it. In other words, the purpose is to build up one industry at the expense of the other.

Now, if the bill comes before the House for the purpose of driving this industry out of existence, why is it brought here at all? Does the committee claim that filled cheese is deleterious to the health of the community where it is used? Not at all. After considering the question, and hearing a great deal of testimony on one side and the other, the committee comes in here with a report in which it is stated that the evidence on one side pointed to the fact that the product was deleterious to health, and on the other, with equal force, that it was not. It did not bring before the House, in a conclusive manner, any evidence which the committee itself accepted. It reported no conclusion upon the subject. The report of the committee does not claim that the sale of the product should be prohibited on that ground.

If it is injurious to the health of the consumer, the people of the States, through the powers vested in the legislatures of the different States of this country, can and will prohibit its sale. I think we can safely count on the fact that the governments of the States of this country will protect their citizens from the sale of injurious commodities. It does not require the aid of the Government of the United States to see that the people of this country shall be protected from the sale and use of deleterious food. Therefore I can not see why the committee should bring this bill before Congress for the purpose of absolutely prohibiting the sale of the commodity. If it is only to prevent a fraud, if the committee only intends to see that these filled-cheese manufacturers shall not impose on the people of the United States by selling them one article when they think they are buying another, Congress has the power to require that this cheese shall simply be branded "filled cheese," and wherever it goes it will carry on its face a statement of what it is, without any taxation accompanying it. That being the case, there can be but one conclusion we can come to, and that is that this bill is introduced here for the purpose of protecting one class of people at the expense of another.

Now, there are numbers of farmers in this country who raise cotton, who sell their cotton seed for the purpose of having it manufactured into cotton-seed oil. Cotton-seed oil is one of the ingredients that largely goes into the composition of this filled cheese. Why should this House, by its legislative action, seek to prevent the sale of that commodity, seek to destroy the market for cotton-seed oil for the purpose of benefiting those gentlemen who are engaged in dairy farming?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, in the remaining time I want the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture on this subject read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the communication. Before he had concluded,

Mr. TURNER of Georgia said: Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this very clear and excellent statement by the Secretary may be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The communication is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 27, 1896.

GENTLEMEN: In connection with the proposition to legislate on the subject of filled cheese, now under consideration by your committee, the following statement may be of some interest:

The matter of filled cheese having been brought to the attention of this Department of late, from various directions, a thorough investigation has been made as to this article, and it is hoped an impartial one, including the materials which enter into its composition, methods of manufacture, its position in the markets, and its relation to other cheese of commerce.

What is now known as filled cheese was formerly called margarin cheese and oleo cheese, and is designated as imitation cheese in the laws of several States. It is apparently a perfectly legitimate food product and properly called cheese. It has the characteristics of cheese, although not of high grade, and is similar in chemical composition. The only essential difference between filled cheese and that made from whole milk is in the substitution of the fat of the hog for that of the cow. The natural fat of the milk being extracted, or separated, is replaced by a good quality of lard, at the rate of 2 or 5 pounds of the latter to 100 pounds of skim milk.

At different stages in the development of this industry various fats and oils have been used, including oleo oil, margarin, cotton oil, and unmerchantable butter, as well as others still cheaper and of doubtful origin. But objectionable results have led to the rejection of all except neutral lard. At the present time the only fat not natural to milk which is used in making 95 per cent or more of the filled cheese produced is neutral lard, and this of a superior quality, tasteless, odorless, and usually selling at about 1 cent per pound more than the best family lard. The wholesale price of "neutral" has been for some months in the vicinity of 7 cents per pound.

In view of these facts the most correct and significant legal designation of this article would be "lard cheese."

In the process of manufacture the bulk of the milk is raised to the same temperature as in making ordinary cheese, while part of the milk and all of the neutral lard is raised to a temperature of at least 200° F. This is about as high a temperature as pork fat is subjected to in cooking, and much higher than the fat of milk is heated in ordinary cheese making. The places and processes of manufacture of lard cheese, or filled cheese, and the same where whole-milk or full-cream cheese are made are practically equal, so far as care and cleanliness are concerned.

The liability to use raw materials containing the germs of disease is about the same in making genuine cheese as in making filled cheese. It is possible to thus convey the germs of disease from cows and hogs to the human family, but the danger can not be regarded as serious in either case. It is probably true that at the present time in those districts where cheese is largely made insidious diseases which are dangerous to man are more prevalent among cows than among hogs.

The materials used in making filled cheese are all products of the farm and recognized, separately and combined, as wholesome articles of food.

Medical authorities and others differ as to the relative digestibility of different fats, such as butter fat and pork fat or lard; but the fact is known to all that immense quantities of pork fat, in all forms, are consumed by various classes of people without detriment to health. There is no just ground for claiming that filled cheese is necessarily unwholesome or deleterious to health. Large quantities of it are daily sold and consumed without apparently injurious effects.

But there are many people who can not safely consume hog fat in any form, and many more who will not do so knowingly. These people very properly claim a right to be reasonably guarded against the imposition of having lard cheese sold to them under the guise and name of cream cheese. This practice has been found to prevail in all parts of the country where there are not stringent State laws of exclusion and prohibition, with special agencies for their enforcement.

No merchant or consumer who is any judge of cheese would, upon examination, mistake the best filled cheese which is made for a first-class, full-cream cheese. It is devoid of true cheese flavor, and seldom attains the dry and crumbly consistency of a well-cured cheese. But the imitation has the appearance of a fresh or mild cheese, and can be, as it is, successfully and generally substituted for the genuine article of second or third quality.

The filled cheese is made and placed in market without any brand or marking on cheese or package indicating its real nature. It is held in large quantities by the wholesale merchants in this form. These merchants generally (although not in all cases, it appears) sell it for what it is. But it is the common practice, after sale to jobbers or the smaller wholesalers, to place all sorts of misleading and false brands and marks upon it, which enable it to pass into the retail trade and be sold to consumers under false pretenses. No additional information on this point is necessary. Cheese designated as "filled," or "imitation," or "lard," is nowhere to be found in local trade, but the "filled" article is always sold under some other name.

It is this element of fraud which constitutes the serious objection, and about the only one, to the manufacture and sale of filled cheese, and which is the only just ground for restrictive legislation in regard to it. But the imposition and deceit systematically practiced is indefensible and so injurious to public morals and to trade as to demand prompt and effective measures for its repression.

The sole object to be obtained by legislation on the subject seems to be to enforce honesty and prevent fraud by compelling this form of cheese to be made and sold for exactly what it is. The same principles apply to all other articles of food and general merchandise in which deception is possible. The simpler the form of attaining this the better.

An enactment directed solely against deceit and fraud, with severe penalties for violations of the same, appears far more reasonable and just than any perversion of the taxing power of the Government for the real purpose of securing police regulation.

If there be reasons why it is deemed necessary to accomplish the object under cover of a "revenue measure," the facts stated herein certainly sustain the conclusion that minimum rates should govern the fixing of licenses and special taxes rather than such as would prove prohibitory to an industry not reprehensible itself, although indirectly responsible for much imposition on consumers, deception in trade, and injury to the purely dairy interests of the country.

This latter phase of the subject is sufficiently presented in the last annual report from this office for the year ended June 30, 1895, at pages 24 and 25.

Yours, very respectfully,

J. STERLING MORTON, Secretary.

THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
House of Representatives, Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, is the time on the other side exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. The time on the other side is exhausted.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hold in my hand an analysis, made by the Chief of the Chemistry Division of the Department of Agriculture, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, to accompany the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture which has just been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to have certain documents printed in the RECORD, to accompany the statement from the Secretary of Agriculture which has just been read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 13, 1896.

SIR: I have the pleasure of handing you herewith a copy of an analysis by the chemist of this Department of the specimen of cheese received from you on the 11th instant, marked "Family's Favorite, Jersey Creams." The chemist reports that he is able to determine the foreign fats determined in cheese, and that this one has at least three-fourths of this foreign fat. It is a well-marked case of filled cheese.

Very respectfully, J. STERLING MORTON, Secretary.

Hon. D. F. WILBER,
Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives.

Washington, D. C., February 13, 1896.

SIR: The sample of cheese sent by you, and obtained from Mr. WILBER, of the House Agricultural Committee, has been analyzed with the following results:

	Per cent.
Fat	31.13
Casein	32.13
Water	29.81
Undetermined	3

The fat derived from this cheese was composed of one-fourth butter fat and three-fourths foreign fat, which, from its high melting point, was thought not to be cotton-seed oil. The cheese was made from skim milk, which retained about one-fourth of its butter fat. It is, therefore, a well-marked case of filled cheese. No substance other than the added fat was detected as a make-weight.

Respectfully, H. W. WILEY, Chief of Division.

Hon. CHARLES W. DABNEY, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary of Agriculture.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
DIVISION OF CHEMISTRY,
Washington, D. C., March 5, 1896.

SIR: The large sample of filled cheese which you sent for examination has been analyzed with the following results:

	Per cent.
Ash	5.44
Casein	22.25
Fat	34.02
Water	31.09
Sugar and undetermined	7.20

A microscopic examination of the extracted fat, after crystallization from ether, showed that it was unmistakably composed almost exclusively of lard stearine. The flat rhombic crystals so characteristic of this glycerid were easily obtained and definitely shown under the microscope.

The low iodin absorption number of the fat, viz, 50.7, also shows that it is a lard stearine. The low Reichert number, viz, 1.8, indicates that the cheese was made from milk from which the cream had been removed by a separator. The ordinary creaming of milk—by allowing it to stand in shallow pans—would not remove a sufficient quantity of the butter fat to give as low a Reichert number as indicated.

In summarizing the results of the analysis it may be said that the cheese in question was made from milk skimmed by mechanical means, leaving not to exceed half a per cent of butter fat therein, and that the abstracted fat was replaced by lard stearine, presumably the residue from the manufacture of lard oil.

Respectfully, H. W. WILEY, Chief of Division.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUERHERING].

Mr. SAUERHERING. Mr. Chairman, the State of Wisconsin stands second in the United States in the manufacture of dairy products. The Second Congressional district of that State, which I have the honor to represent, stands first on the list. The measure before the House is intended to protect the dairy industry against a fraud which has greatly injured it. The only objection I have to this measure is that it does not impose a tax of 2 cents a pound upon filled cheese instead of 1.

I regret that so short a time has been allotted to me in which to defend the interests of my constituents and the interests of 9,000,000 people of the United States, for it is impossible to say too much in favor of this bill.

The protection of the dairy interests of the United States against a bold-faced fraud which is gradually but surely drawing the life-blood out of that great industry is to-day a burning question. The dairying industry is to-day one of the great commercial factors of the world. In importance and magnitude it ranks higher than any one industry known to commerce, and its wealth-producing power has far outstripped our world-famous "king cotton." It directly affects over 9,000,000 men on American farms, and involves a money business of $800,000,000 annually.

In late years this great industry has been much hampered and imperiled by the manufacture of a spurious imitation of cream cheese, called "filled cheese," which has been placed upon the markets of the world and offered for sale as a pure and unadulterated food product. The process of manufacture is quite simple and inexpensive. By the use of a modern cream separator the butter fat is extracted from the milk and manufactured into good creamery butter; then the skimmed milk is taken, and, by a peculiar process known to the trade, lard and neutral oils are forced into it to take the place of the butter fat which has been extracted. From this skimmed milk, so "filled" with lard and neutral oils, "filled cheese" is made. By a comparison of figures furnished by good authorities we find that the cost of producing a pound of filled cheese is about 3½ cents. As a rule, the producer of filled cheese pays no more for the milk he gets from the farmer than does the producer of pure full cream cheese, while, on the other hand, he sells his cheaply produced spurious article at practically the same price that is paid for full cream cheese. It can be easily seen that the profits accruing to the manufacturer of filled cheese must be enormous. Whatever may be the merits of filled cheese, it is not equal to full cream cheese, and should not be placed upon the market as such. The fraud has been detected, and has materially affected our foreign trade in cheese, all of which ultimately must result in a loss to the American farmer.

It is the purpose of this bill to compel the manufacturer of filled cheese to sail under his own colors and to reestablish our good name in foreign markets so far as our dairy products are concerned.

It is a matter of great surprise to me that a bill of this nature should require so much time for debate or call forth any opposition in this House. I have observed on numerous previous occasions during the present session, when opportunity offered itself, gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber eagerly clamored for recognition by the Chair so that their voices might be heard in defense of the interests of the American farmer. Why, Mr. Chairman, so impressed was I with the apparent loyalty of the members of this House to the agriculturists of the United States that I thought any measure to the interests of that class of our fellow-citizens would pass this body without debate and by a unanimous vote.

When the Agricultural appropriation bill was before this committee a great interest was manifested in the subject of securing for the farmer the publication of a book on dairying which had been out of print for many years and contained nothing but statistical abstracts of dairying in foreign countries. Although the appropriation required to republish that book would have been small in comparison with general appropriations, I am convinced that I voice the sentiment of the farmers of the Second district of Wisconsin in saying that while the farmer does not object to the expenditure of large sums of money to support this Government in maintaining its dignity and making proper provision for the happiness and welfare of its people, he does most emphatically object to the expenditure of one cent for anything that will not serve a good purpose. Had the House consented to the Senate amendment calling for the republication of the book referred to, it would have been an insult to the American dairyman, an injustice to the American farmer, to attempt to satisfy these people by giving them a cheap book that has been out of print for years and containing nothing but out-of-date statistics about the dairy interests of foreign countries. It is a universally recognized fact that we lead the world in the superior quality of our dairy products when untainted by fraud. Now, Mr. Chairman, the point I am trying to get at is that the farmer is not benefited by nor is he satisfied with windy talk, so often indulged in by members of this House in his behalf. What the farmer wants and demands is good, honest, square legislation, and he fully expects that every member of Congress will assist in the enactment of laws which will be of lasting benefit to the farmer as well as all the people of the United States.

The object to be accomplished by the so-called "filled-cheese" bill now before the House for consideration is of the greatest importance to 95 per cent of the American people. It is intended by this measure to give a proper reward to honest labor and honest industry, to protect the producer and manufacturer of pure products against a fraud which has grown up in this country by false labeling of dairy products. During the past seven years this pernicious practice has caused a falling off in the exports of American dairy products of 58 per cent. The great decline in the exportation of our cheese since 1889 is plainly shown by the following table:

Cheese exported from the United States.

Year.	Pounds.	Year.	Pounds.
1889	98,140,486	1893	67,925,712
1890	91,014,571	1894	68,607,186

It is shown by authentic reports that in the year 1884 the exports of cheese from the United States reached the enormous figure of 111,950,686 pounds, while in 1895 the exports from all parts of the United States amounted to only 40,610,242 pounds, showing a falling off in eleven years of 63 per cent in this one article alone, while it is a fact that its production during the same period has increased 25 per cent. As a result of this, a great surplus of cheese for consumption has been thrown upon the home market, and the producer has received ruinous prices. The question naturally presents itself, Where has our trade gone to, who has been benefited by this enormous falling off in our exportations of cheese, and what is the cause of the great decline? Mr. David Muir, cheese exporter from New York and Montreal, Canada, presented to the National Dairy Union, at its annual meeting last year, statistics showing that for every pound of decrease in the cheese exports from the United States those of Canada increased to a corresponding amount; also that the increased demand over what little was taken from the United States, and what Canada was able to produce, was obtained from New Zealand and Australia. In fact, it was conclusively shown from letters received by exporters that foreign importers were taking all the cheese they could obtain from other countries where they were certain of getting pure goods before they would take the risk of buying from the United States. The reason given for this was that these foreign importers had been deceived by having filled cheese shipped to them when they had ordered and thought they were getting the pure and unadulterated article.

It has been urged by gentlemen who are opposing this bill that the regulation and suppression of this fraud should be left to the various States, and that Congress has no authority to act in the matter. I will say that some of the States have made desperate efforts in that direction, and the legislature of my own State passed a very stringent law, entirely prohibiting the manufacture and sale of filled cheese in Wisconsin. While this absolutely guarantees the purity of cheese produced in Wisconsin, it does not prevent the filled-cheese producers of other States from branding their fraudulent goods "Wisconsin full cream cheese," and thus robbing us of the benefits to be derived from a good name and savory reputation. State legislation, however stringent, has failed to give the desired relief, and the farmer and producer of pure cheese now look to Congress to help them by enacting a national law which will compel filled cheese to stand on its merits before the world by being properly marked and branded. All they ask is simple justice, and honesty in marketing dairy products; so that the consumer may be able to buy the pure article when he chooses without fear of getting filled cheese when he pays full cream cheese prices.

In the year 1889 the State of Wisconsin stood first among the States of the Union in the per capita production of dairy products. Her fame as a producer of pure goods was well known throughout the commercial world, and she found a ready market for all she could produce. However, with the advent of the filled-cheese fraud that favorable reputation became an element of danger. How could the manufacturer of filled cheese find a better and wider market for his goods than by branding them as a Wisconsin product? The fraud was soon discovered in foreign markets, and our goods have been regarded with suspicion ever since. While we have suffered greatly during the past seven years from this parasitic fraud called filled cheese, Wisconsin even to-day stands second in the amount and value of dairy products.

The statistics for 1895 show that there are within the State 1,337 cheese factories, valued at $1,000,000, with an output of over 50,000,000 pounds, valued at $4,000,000; also 800 creameries, valued at one and one-half million dollars, with an output of 75,000,000 pounds, valued at over $12,000,000. The Second district of the State which I have the honor to represent stands first on the dairying list, having 245 cheese factories, valued at $201,000, with an output of 8,600,000 pounds, valued at $594,000, and 250 creameries, valued at $426,000, with an output of 14,101,600 pounds, valued at $2,397,000. I simply mention these facts to show that I come from a section of country where this subject is thoroughly understood and where the need of legislation like that proposed in the pending measure is fully appreciated.

The line of argument followed by gentlemen in opposition to this bill is characteristic of the argument of a lawyer when he knows he has a bad case. Instead of meeting the issue fairly and squarely, gentlemen shoot off on a tangent, expatiating with great enthusiasm on the elements of a finely spun theory of constitutional construction and State's rights.

These are the same arguments that were used in opposition to the oleomargarine bill when that measure was considered in this House. Almost the entire debate against that bill was based upon the ground of its want of constitutionality. But what do we find as a matter of fact? In every case that was carried to the courts on that point the law was declared constitutional, and it stands to-day firmer than ever.

It is urged that the tax feature of this bill is not only unconstitutional, but un-American and unjust. I have devoted a great deal of study to this particular feature and can not, for the life of me, discover any difference between this tax and the ordinary tax paid for engaging in the liquor and cigar business. The principle is precisely the same in both cases, and nothing is clearer than the right of this Government to impose this tax.

The gentleman from Alabama says that if filled cheese is injurious to the health of the consumer, the people of the States, through their legislatures, can and will prohibit its sale. I will say to the gentleman that as a matter of fact many States have passed such laws, but find that they do not give the desired relief. As long as anyone may produce this filled cheese in some other State and with impunity label it "Full cream cheese," how is the consumer of any State to be protected? Further than this, the gentleman seems to forget that there are other and broader principles involved in this question. What we contend for is commercial honesty and simple justice. We demand that every producer of a commodity shall offer it for sale for just what it is, and most emphatically object to the dishonest practice of passing off a cheap, impure, and unhealthy article for something it is not. The States which have taken a stand on this question and declared their disapproval of the pernicious practice of cheating our foreign customers and robbing our farmers of their just dues are to-day being preyed upon by the filled-cheese sharks of other States, who brand their goods as the product of the States having these prohibitory laws. It is the plain duty of the United States to protect the people of one State against imposition by citizens of other States when they are powerless to protect themselves. In this matter it is simply impossible for a single State to assure its own rights, the gentleman from Alabama to the contrary notwithstanding.

Quite an elaborate argument was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the point that the tax clause of this bill endeavors to tax out of existence an industry, and therefore is unconstitutional, unjust, and antirepublican. Even if it were true that this clause does tax out of existence an industry, we have a very good precedent for such an act. There is upon our statute books to-day a law imposing a tax of 10 per cent upon State bank issues, for the sole purpose of taxing them out of existence, and, thank heaven, it is doing it very successfully, too. The constitutionality of that act has never been questioned except by Democratic national conventions, and although the present Administration was elected on a platform pledging the repeal of that 10 per cent State bank issue tax, they have not had the moral courage to live up to their pledge, because they know the law is good law and in the interest of public policy.

But the tax imposed by this bill would in no wise destroy the filled-cheese industry. The profits in that business are so large that it could easily stand three times the proposed tax without any serious results, provided that filled cheese could, as it is at present, be sold for the same price that is obtained for the pure article. If anyone cares to use filled cheese rather than full cream cheese, we are perfectly willing that he should have it, but, Mr. Chairman, when I go into a grocery store for the purpose of buying full cream cheese and pay the price demanded for full cream cheese, as an American citizen I most seriously object to being hoodwinked and cheated by being given a fraudulent and unwholesome imitation of the article I paid for.

The merits of this bill are so evident, the justice of it so plain, that it ought not to require much argument to secure for it the support of every member of this House. Without saying one word against filled cheese as such, if it has the merits claimed for it by gentlemen who oppose this bill, what possible objection can there be to making it stand or fall on those merits. When your purposes are honest and your cause a good one, why endeavor to shun the light of day? We desire the passage of this bill because it strikes at the root of an evil which is fast destroying our foreign markets for dairy products, curtailing the possibilities of the dairy farmer, reducing the value of his stock in trade, and defrauding millions of consumers of cheese. The filled-cheese industry as carried on to-day is a detriment to every one of the 70,000,000 people who live in this country, and a benefit to only about 200 people who are engaged in this nefarious business and who are getting wealthy at the expense of all the rest of the country. Filled cheese is sold at practically the same price that is demanded for the pure article, hence it does nothing in the way of supplying a cheaper article for the poorer classes, a claim made for it on this floor.

This bill should be enacted into law and strictly enforced after being enacted, because it stands for honesty and justice. It is a step in the direction of that grand Republican principle, protection. There is no class of people in this country who work more hours per day and more days per year and who receive smaller remuneration for their labor than the honest, thrifty farmer. The duties of his calling are so numerous and exacting that he usually finds little time to take a hand in public affairs and see that his interests are properly protected. He is rarely represented in Congress except by so-called professional farmers, who rather misrepresent him. Let us pass this bill and secure to the American farmer what properly belongs to him. Let us protect him against the impositions of a few wealthy monopolists who are growing rich at his expense. The farmer is universally recognized as the backbone of a nation, and those nations that have made his welfare one of their first considerations have always endured longest. It is impossible to secure the welfare of the nation without securing to the food-producing part of our population those advantages which nature has provided for them. Let us protect the farmer in his right and thus bring prosperity to all our people.

Mr. Chairman, I represent an agricultural district. I am proud of the fact, and glad of this opportunity to speak in behalf of my people. I am proud of the Republican party, because it stands for protection to all the people and has always been the friend of the farmer. I feel certain that that grand old party will not be found wanting when the time comes to take a vote on this important measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask that all gentlemen who speak on this bill may have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on the bill may have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BARNEY].

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, in the short space of time allotted to me I can hardly expect to be able to present a detailed argument upon the important bill before the House.

In my humble opinion no measure has been or will be presented to the present Congress of greater moment to the people of this country than the bill now under consideration. The last three years of financial depression have borne heavily upon all the people of this country, but no class has suffered so much as the farming community. For some reason which I can not explain, the Democratic party seemed to owe this class a particular grudge, and has fully paid it by the enactment of the Wilson-Gorman tariff measure, which took away every vestige of protection which had theretofore been given to the farmer. Free wool and free barley have brought down the prices of these staple products of the farm to such a low figure that it is no wonder that the agricultural classes are bitterly complaining that their interests have been neglected, if not entirely forgotten, in the legislation of Congress. For this reason it is no wonder that they have turned their attention to the dairy products of the farm, trusting that in this direction at least they would not be brought into competition with foreign labor and that some reasonable remuneration might be received in this way for the hard labor of the farm. This fond hope has been blasted; and in this business the farmer has been met with the meanest and most dangerous of all competition—that of the fraudulent manufacturer and counterfeiter.

I submit to the Republican members of this House that if it is good policy for this Government to protect the American laborer from the competition of the pauper and poorly-paid laborer of foreign lands, it is equally good policy to protect the American farmer from the competition of the counterfeiter at home. I am not surprised that the Democratic side of this House opposes this bill, for such opposition is entirely consistent with members of a party which has declared in substance that taxes levied for the purposes of protection are unconstitutional. But I trust when this bill is put upon its final passage no Republican member will record his vote against it. This legislation is along the lines of the settled policy of the Republican party and is as loudly called for as the protection of any industry in this country. Members of this body who come from some of the sections of this country are too apt to belittle the industry of dairy farming and to underrate its importance to the prosperity of this country and to the farmer in particular. It is the chief farming industry of many of the States of this Union and ranks first in importance among all the varied products of the farm.

The dairy products of the State which I have the honor in part to represent for the year 1895 are estimated at $30,000,000, and would have been much more were it not for the competition of this composition of skim milk and soap grease, improperly called "filled cheese." Our foreign exportation of cheese, which a few years ago amounted to $16,500,000, last year dwindled to $3,000,000 because of the discredit brought upon the American dairyman by the exportation of the products of filled-cheese factories falsely branded as "full cream American cheese."

The Government of Canada has already passed a similar but more stringent law than this, and is rigidly enforcing it. As a result the Canadian dairyman has driven us out of the European market and American cheese has been denounced and refused as a fraud. In order to get some market abroad for his cheese the American farmer has been compelled to first export it to Canada, there to receive the Canadian stamp of excellence, before he puts it into the foreign market. Think of it, that the dairymen of the richest agricultural country in the world are compelled to filch the stamp of a neighboring province to sell their goods! And this, not because their pure cheese is a poor article (for the world makes no better), but because the filled-cheese counterfeiter has robbed the farmer of his good name by filling the market with a fraud and a lie.

This is not the full measure of the injury done, for this counterfeit product in the markets of our own country is rapidly destroying the best market in the world, the American home market. It is destroying the taste of our people for this article of food, and is rapidly diminishing the demand for any kind of American cheese.

My own State has already passed a stringent law on this subject and several other States have done the same thing; but history has shown, and it needs no argument to prove, that individual State legislation is powerless to remedy this evil. After the passage of this law by the State of Wisconsin, the filled cheese factories there were loaded up and carted over into the adjoining State of Illinois, adjacent to the great grease-extracting city of Chicago, and there skim milk is loaded with hog fat and put upon the market branded as "Wisconsin full cream cheese." In this way a double crime is committed—the putting upon the market of an article called cheese which is not cheese, and stealing from the farmers of a neighboring State the good name which they sought to establish by the enactment and enforcement of a law against the perpetration of a fraud.

They have argued long and loud upon the other side of this House that the tendency of this law will be to build up a monopoly and to destroy an honest industry. I must say that this is the first time I ever heard a fear expressed that the farmers of this country were in danger of becoming monopolists! They ask, and by the passage of this law will receive, no monopoly except that which every principle of equity and justice gives to them—the right to place upon the markets of the world the honest products of the farm without the unjust competition of counterfeiters. And a business can not be called honest which depends for its success upon stealing the good name of another. An industry which has prospered and been built up by false representations, and by cheating both the honest producer and the consumer, is entitled to no consideration at our hands. The counterfeiter of our currency is sent to prison and the counterfeiter of our food can not complain if his business is placed under the restrictions of the law.

Neither can it be justly said that the passage of this bill will tend to increase the price of the food of the American consumer; for when you take into consideration the real value of the article, judged either by the standard of the cost of production or its value as a food, American cheese will be made cheaper instead of dearer. The pure article may be enhanced a little in price to the wholesaler, but the consumer, if he wishes to get it, can buy the counterfeit article for what it really is, and consequently, for what it is really worth. The reports show that filled cheese, the cost of production of which is about one-half that of the genuine article, is sold to the consumer at retail for three times its actual cost, and for but little less than that of pure cheese. Who gains anything by this fraud but the grease extractors and the skim-milk "fillers"? And the loss is upon the consumer as well as upon the American farmer.

From another standpoint this bill commends itself to this legislative body and to the approval of the American public. The people of this country have the right to know the kind of food they are eating and of what it is made. A system of food adulteration has been rapidly increasing in this country for the last twenty-five years, and it is high time that one step at least should be taken to stop it. The charge made against our Connecticut forefathers of having manufactured nutmegs out of basswood may not be true, but it can not be denied that there is some proof of its truth in the fact that there are people in this country to-day who are adulterating and counterfeiting almost every manufactured article of food which is used upon our tables. This is the reason, and the only reason, why, if you go into a grocery store to-day and ask prices, you will find that the imported article of food sells for about twice as much as the same kind of domestic goods; and this is why the honest American manufacturer of these goods is compelled to brand them with some foreign name in order to get a fair price in the market for them. This state of things is a disgrace to the American people. Every food product of this country ought to stand at the head in excellence and in price in the markets of the world; and it would if we would enact more just such laws as this against counterfeiting and then see that they are strictly enforced.

Then I say that from every reasonable point of view this legislation is justifiable and is demanded. The farmers of this country do not often knock at the doors of Congress asking legislation in their behalf. They have no system of organization which makes them heard, as they have a right to be heard, in our legislative halls. Even under the present mixed tariff system of free trade and protection enacted by the last Congress the manufacturer and the miner are afforded a measure of protection, but the farmer is left "out in the cold," to protect himself as best he can and "to root hog or die."

Let us, then, give the American farmer this just measure of relief from a dishonest fraud at home, and when we have the power, as we expect to have after the 4th of March next, we will give him the further relief of protection from cheap labor abroad.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Chairman, what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in charge of the bill and by my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] makes it unnecessary for me to occupy the attention of the committee in talking about the constitutionality of this measure or about the general character of the article of commerce commonly called "filled cheese." I think the committee understands exactly what problem we have to deal with. So far as I am personally concerned, I intend to speak with absolute candor of the phases of this matter that are involved in the debate. I have nothing to conceal from anybody on the filled-cheese question. I intend to support this bill for three different reasons, each one of them, in my judgment, good and sufficient; and the first reason is that the enactment of the bill will have a tendency to bring into the public Treasury additional revenue.

A MEMBER. How much?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not pretend to know how much, but I know it will be visible to the naked eye, and in these times of shortage and deficiency even that is of some importance to the Government. [Applause.]

I am a little sorry that that question should have been brought into the discussion, because there is a large number of fairly good people in this country, like my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], who have adopted the higher mathematics which emanates from the Treasury Department, and who regard the national finances as entirely above the common rules of arithmetic and bookkeeping. There has grown up in these later months in this country a school of Democratic opinion which treats every dollar that comes into the Treasury in the orderly process of taxation as in some way the social inferior of the choice and selected funds that have come in under the auspices of the syndicate. [Laughter.]

It seems to me that no man ought to make such an objection as that against any increase in the revenues of this country. But when a proposal is made to bring in a few extra dollars in a perfectly legal way, the cry goes up on all hands that there is money enough, that the funds are ample, that the Treasury is overflowing; and yet everybody in this House, unless possibly my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] may be excepted, knows perfectly well that the President of the United States has borrowed money at the rate of $167 a minute from the day of his inauguration until this hour, and that he has fastened upon the people of the United States an additional burden of interest equal to $20.26 a minute for the next thirty years, and yet when a man stands up here and honestly suggests some method of producing a little additional revenue it is met with a statement that the funds are ample and that there is no deficiency.

Now, I wish to say to my friend from Tennessee—and I speak to him because he has put forward the idea, and it is a rather general idea in the Democratic party—that the precise logic which is used to show that there is money enough in the Treasury of the United States, that its receipts and its expenditures are in accord—the very same logic that is used to show that could be fairly employed to demonstrate that the Prodigal Son was an itinerant capitalist in search of a live-stock investment and eating husks for his health under the advice of his physician. [Great laughter.] The exact logic that has been brought in here by my friend from Tennessee to show that the national income needs no addition could be properly used to show that Lazarus, luxuriating among the rich man's dogs, was in reality engaged in organizing a loan and trust company and collecting bread crumbs for his personal amusement. [Great laughter.] Every man, it seems to me, who has in his heart a lingering prejudice in favor of national solvency ought to welcome every dollar that comes in the direction of the Treasury of the United States. The oleomargarine law of 1886 ran the gauntlet of the exact objections that have beset us in this debate, and yet that law has produced an aggregate revenue of more than $10,000,000, nearly $2,000,000 annually being brought into the Treasury of the United States. I support this bill, therefore, as a revenue-producing measure.

Again, I support the bill because it offers an appropriate legal protection against the adulteration of the people's food. In the process of taxation it identifies a fraud and escorts a notorious swindle into the light of day. [Applause.] You have read the precept of Scripture which exhorts you to take no thought of what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink or wherewithal ye shall be clothed. That Scripture will need a new interpretation unless we can in some way manage to rescue the food and drink and clothing of the people of the United States from the hands of the counterfeiters. As the case now stands neither the clothes on our backs nor the food on our tables nor the common weapons for fighting thirst between meals have escaped suspicion. In this carnival of deceit the rich and the poor alike suffer.

Look at it. Even the expert appraisers at our custom-house in New York are hardly able to tell the difference between a standard sample of woolen cloth and a bogus imitation, gently softened by glycerin and brought up to full weight by adding a solution of raw tin. Only last year, in the State in which my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] resides, a package of oleomargarine took the first prize offered for "butter" at the Pennsylvania State fair [laughter]; an award almost worthy of that early governor of Pennsylvania who used to complain of the people of Connecticut because they were selling his people nutmegs made out of basswood instead of the genuine sassafras. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was a judge of butter at that time.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have no doubt of it, or at least I have no doubt that he would have approved the award of the committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. That is not saying anything against oleomargarine, though.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that this world in which we live will not go on permanently under a system like that. It will not go on forever buying coffee grains delicately molded out of blue mud. [Laughter.] It will not go on buying tea that has been generously commingled with the dried leaves of the forest. [Laughter.] It will not go on drinking wine that has been manufactured in a cellar without the intervention of grapes, nor those other and more penetrating beverages that have entered into partnership with such a fatal assortment of explosive chemicals as to greatly facilitate the descent of our fellow-citizens, as the old negro preacher expressed it, down the lubricated steeps to the opaque profundity of damnation. [Great laughter.]

Oh, but says the gentleman from Tennessee, this is a matter for the States. Well, that is partly true. I admit that it is a matter for the States, and right manfully the States are grappling with the question. But, Mr. Chairman, it is a matter for this House also; and wherever Congress can get a legal hold on it, it comes within the jurisdiction of the Representatives of the United States. I have great respect for the doctrine of State jurisdiction, though so far as the old-fashioned doctrine of State rights is concerned, the gentleman from Tennessee ought to know that thirty years ago that doctrine was so disabled by a collision with the United States of America that in 1886, on this very question, even the lowly American cow was able to kick it into a cocked hat. [Laughter.] That was on the oleomargarine bill. Fortunately for the public health, every principle upon which this bill stands has been already justified at the bar of our highest court. There is not one of those principles that is any longer open to dispute. The business of manufacturing filled cheese is a fraud. I do not mean to say that the manufacturers are all guilty of fraud——

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then this bill is not for the purpose of taxation for revenue, but for the purpose of suppressing this business?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am now engaged in telling the gentleman the three things that this bill is for, and before I get through he and the House will understand them perfectly. I do not say that all the manufacturers in the present stage of the industry are guilty of fraud. I will not even go so far as to say that all the wholesalers habitually perpetrate a fraud. But I do say that the evidence is sufficient to show that the business itself is a fraud, and for one I am here for the purpose of looking a little to the rights of the man who orders "Iowa full cream cheese" and is furnished by the wholesale dealer with a spurious and inferior article. I am here looking to the rights of the citizens of this country who go into a store for the purpose of buying cheese and take home with them an objectionable admixture of skimmed milk and soap grease. [Laughter.]

I am speaking here for the victims of the American boarding-house system who eat cheese for the purpose of promoting the digestion of pie, and then have to take another pie in order to secure the digestion of the cheese. [Laughter.] The American dairymen understand this question thoroughly. The dairy commissioner of my own State, Mr. W. K. Boardman, has been especially vigilant in the investigation of this question, and I will read an extract from his letter received this day indorsing this bill and urging the friends of American agriculture to stand by it in exposing the commercial fraud known as "filled cheese":

You will be performing a great service to the people of Iowa by championing this bill when it is before the House for final action. I have this day received from the chemist of the experiment station of the Iowa Agricultural College a report of two analyses of samples of cheese which was being sold in this city. The cheese that these samples represent was purchased from Chicago parties by wholesalers here as full cream cheese. The sample of one of the cheeses was branded on the outside in red letters, "Wisconsin full cream." Both samples are pronounced filled cheese by the chemist. Following are the words used by the chemist for the analysis of the cheese marked "Wisconsin full cream": "From the above result I would say that this sample of cheese was made from milk having its content of butter fat almost entirely removed and replaced by an animal fat of the nature of lard. It is, in other words, a filled cheese."

I give you this information in order to show no matter how closely this business is watched the dealers at Chicago will, through deception and other means, get their fraudulent goods before the people. With the provisions of the bill now before Congress enacted into a law, the branding and stamping of such cheese would at once make known its true character, and no jobber or retailer could then be deceived.

That is the fraud, which has become bold and naked in the commerce of this country, which this bill, by the process of taxation, the only jurisdiction we have in the matter, aims to identify and thereby in some degree seeks to arrest.

So far as the licenses and penalties provided by the bill are concerned, nobody need be troubled about them. They are barely sufficient to induce the trade to keep clear of the fraud.

But somebody says here that the real object of this bill is not to raise revenue, nor even to identify a fraudulent article of commerce, but to protect the interests of the American dairy against a new business which injuriously competes with the old one. And that enables me to speak very briefly (for I have only six minutes left) of the final reason that leads me to give my hearty support to this bill.

The morbid researches of modern chemistry have been able to do some very curious things. They have substituted a cheap vegetable oil for the old-fashioned pork fat and put it upon the American market under the label of "prime steam lard," and at the same time they have taken the animal fats out of milk and substituted neutral animal oils and made two products, one of which for the sake of its color they call "butter," and the other for the sake of its shape they call "cheese." [Laughter.] Now, butter has had friends enough in the past to take care of it and protect it by law with more or less success. The law has been a little more slow in coming to the protection of cheese—probably because many varieties of cheese have been thought able to take care of themselves. [Laughter.] It would seem, for example, that limburger cheese, now safely domesticated in the district from which my friend SAUERHERING comes, is endowed by nature with means of defense that require very little assistance from an act of Congress. [Laughter.]

It is not necessary for me to deny on this floor that the possible effect of this bill will be to give an advantage to American agriculture. The bill is not objectionable to me on that account. On the contrary, every profound student of human affairs teaches us that agriculture is the basis of civilization itself, and that no possible prosperity can exist in this world under conditions that do not yield to the cultivation of the soil a fair return. So that if a new business, begotten in the laboratory of the chemist, by false pretenses, threatens to narrow the opportunities of the American farm by occupying its market place at home or by destroying its reputation abroad, as my friend from Minnesota indicated, and the law comes in and levies a tax on that new business, it does not alarm me that the tax may operate in some measure, at least, to promote the welfare of the most ancient and honorable occupation of the human race. [Applause.]

One-half the American people live on the farm; and nearly all the rest of them that are worth mentioning were born there. [Laughter.] The general welfare, to provide for which our institutions were established, requires that the food-producing millions should be secure in their pursuits; nor should any adroit imposition, however backed by money, be allowed to take from the farm any portion of its legitimate earnings. "Oh, but," says one, "this business which you are condemning and complaining of has simply taken the butter fat out of milk and substituted lard; therefore this is a fight between the cow and the hog." Now, I happen to represent a State that is first in the production of swine and first in the production of improved milk kine, and I feel authorized for one to say that the American hog does not ask my friend from Tennessee, who has already, for the sake of cottonseed oil, helped to drive him out of the lard business—does not ask him to repair the injustice by trying to stick his nose into the butter and cheese business.

Mr. McMILLIN. We ask you to keep yours out of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. I was making no reference to my friend's nose; but the law, for the protection of the public, proposes to put its nose in because the integrity of the business concerns the American people. I say, give the American cow a fair chance. She has been the faithful servant of man. She landed with our ancestors at Plymouth Rock [laughter]; and, tied behind the old weather-beaten emigrant wagon, she has marched, with the household goods of the pioneers who have taken possession of this continent, from ocean to ocean. [Applause.] She has increased and multiplied and replenished the earth, until to-day the industries which she has made possible contribute annually to the wealth of the world more money than the great combinations of modern capital—more than iron and steel, more than lumber and coal, more than cotton and wheat, more than all the looms of New England, more than all the mysterious riches of gold and of silver. Yet there are men in this House whom I have heard to-day sneering at this bill who spend most of their time trying to get protection for some insignificant local enterprise or "talking through their hats" in the silver debate. [Laughter.] I say, give the American cow a fair chance! For myself, I am in favor, Mr. BRUMM, of her monopoly—a monopoly that God gave her—in the production of butter and cheese. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. Then you ought to encourage the production of her cheese rather than cut it down.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is one monopoly that I am in favor of. And if every man in this House who in the days of his boyhood got up at daylight to feed the cows and stayed up after dark in order to milk them; if every man who has churned actual cream with a reliable upright churn and has watched with a boy's enthusiasm the old-fashioned process of making cheese in the days of its honor and repute, will stand by this bill, we will drive from the American barnyard the horde of counterfeiters and cheats at common law and keep them out "till the cows come home." [Long-continued applause.]

Mr. OGDEN. The gentleman has astonished both the boy and the cow by the enthusiasm he has invoked over this measure.

The time for general debate having expired, the Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule.

The following was read:

SEC. 3. That special taxes are imposed as follows:

Manufacturers of filled cheese shall pay $400 for each and every factory per annum. Every person, firm, or corporation who manufactures filled cheese for sale shall be deemed a manufacturer of filled cheese. Wholesale dealers in filled cheese shall pay $250 per annum. Every person, firm, or corporation who sells or offers for sale filled cheese in the original manufacturer's packages for resale, or to retail dealers as hereinafter defined, shall be deemed a wholesale dealer in filled cheese. But any manufacturer of filled cheese who has given the required bond and paid the required special tax, and who sells only filled cheese of his own production, at the place of manufacture, in the original packages, to which the tax-paid stamps are affixed, shall not be required to pay the special tax of a wholesale dealer in filled cheese on account of such sales.

Mr. CANNON. May I ask, Mr. Chairman, if that is considered a paragraph, or if the entire section must be read before amendments are offered?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is only one of the paragraphs of the section.

Mr. CANNON. Is it proper to offer an amendment here, or to wait until the entire paragraph is read?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think we should go to the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that this paragraph is open to amendment now.

Mr. CANNON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move, in line 2, on page 3, to strike out "400" and insert "50."

Mr. McMILLIN. We can not understand the amendment of the gentleman here.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not yet been reported from the desk.

Mr. CANNON. I offer that amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, a great many gentlemen have retired from the Hall under the impression that no votes will be taken on this bill this afternoon, a suggestion having been made to that effect, and therefore, pending the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8008, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REPRINT OF BILL.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the print of this bill (H. R. 8008) both in the House and Senate was exhausted on yesterday, and by an oversight I failed to ask for a reprint. Inasmuch as it is now open to amendment, I ask for a reprint of the bill and the report also, which is very brief.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HENDRICK. I object.

Mr. BRUMM. I hope the gentleman will not do that. The more the bill is distributed and read the less support it will have.

Mr. GROSVENOR. A number of gentlemen have asked that the bill be reprinted——

Mr. HENDRICK. Very well, I will withdraw the objection.

So, there being no further objection, the reprint was ordered.

A bill (H. R. 5161) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; and

A bill (H. R. 5672) to grant to railroad companies in Indian Territory additional powers to secure depot grounds.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MAHON, for three days, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. LAWSON, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BISHOP, for one week, on account of important business.

JOHN R. BIGELOW.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7436) for the relief of the estate of John R. Bigelow.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Eunice P. Bigelow, administratrix of the estate of John R. Bigelow, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $284.66 as rent of a tract of land, with the buildings thereon, known as Clermont, in Fairfax County, Va., 3 miles from Alexandria, as found and set forth by the Court of Claims in its findings of fact reported in House Miscellaneous Document No. 19, Fifty-second Congress, second session, and that this sum be paid to her in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States on account of the purchase of the Clermont property in July, 1864, by John R. Bigelow and Westel Willoughby, and its subsequent occupation by the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I will explain the bill in a few brief moments, if the House will give its attention.

John R. Bigelow, now deceased, whose estate is the claimant here, was enlisted as a surgeon in the Union Army. In the year 1864 he bought some land which was condemned by the United States Government as belonging to a man who was then in the Confederate service. He bought the land under condemnation proceedings, for which he paid the sum of $1,900. He supposed that he was getting a title in fee simple to the property, but it turned out afterwards that under the law the Government could only confiscate the life estate of the man, and he dying soon after the war, Mr. Bigelow was unable to occupy the property for a longer period than some three or four years. Immediately after the purchase of the property the United States Government took possession and occupied it for the purpose of a smallpox hospital.

This claim was referred, I think, under the Bowman Act, to the Court of Claims; and the findings of the court are precisely as I have stated. They found that the estate was entitled to receive only the rent for the use of the property for the time the Government occupied it at the rate of $20 per month, which they say was a reasonable rental, although it is very much less than the claimant says it ought to have been rented for. The estate loses altogether the $1,900 which was paid into the Treasury; and all that is derived from this rental is the small sum of $284, which is the amount of the rent of the premises as a smallpox hospital for the time the Government occupied it.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? What time was this property occupied by the Union forces?

Mr. PAYNE. The report shows that it was occupied at the rate of $20 a month for about fourteen months.

Mr. COX. But what time; in what year?

Mr. PAYNE. From early in 1864.

Mr. COX. Then the occupation by the Government began in 1864?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. McMILLIN. Was the occupation before or after the death of the owner whose interest had been confiscated by the Government on account of treason?

Mr. PAYNE. It was before the death of the owner. It was occupied immediately after the sale by the Government, which took possession of it for a hospital. The party by whose death it reverted back to the estate lived only three or four years; but the occupation by the Government was for the period of time I have mentioned and was before the death of the party.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is to say, the Government occupied the property before the death of the owner, whose interest had been confiscated?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; it was occupied by the Government as a smallpox hospital for fourteen months at the rental fixed—$20 a month—and was occupied during the lifetime of the party whose property was confiscated——

Mr. McMILLIN. What I am trying to get at is——

Mr. PAYNE. During the lifetime of the party whose estate was confiscated.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is the important question. Because if it was after that it would be the property of the heirs. What I wish to ask is whether any portion of this was after the death of the original owner?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; it was all during his lifetime.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand the gentleman to state that this is a claim which has been found by the Court of Claims.

Mr. PAYNE. Found by the Court of Claims. The findings are in the report.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What reason is there for making an exception in favor of this case when there are something like $950,000 of similar cases that have been favorably decided by the Court of Claims and are now on the Calendar of this House?

Mr. PAYNE. This is a small amount.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I know, but there are a great many similar cases coming from my section of the country, and the aggregate of all is something over $900,000, on which there have been favorable findings by the Court of Claims. Now, I want to know why this case should be allowed, while the others should not be?

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman that in the first place this party paid the Government $1,900 for this title which he received from the Government in 1864, over thirty years ago. He is out that money, and all he can get back is this pittance of $284 and a few cents. It seems to me that this is different from any other claim, because it is a case where the party is out actual money paid into the Treasury of the United States for this title which failed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman does not understand that there was any warranty of title in the case, of course?

Mr. BRUMM. Where is this place located? Was it within the Union lines? We have a number of cases before my committee, and I should like to know about that.

Mr. PAYNE. The property was located in Alexandria.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COX. Unless we can get some further explanation about this matter—I do not want to be forced to the point of objecting, but I want to ask——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that there was no objection.

Mr. COX. No; I want to get at one point.

The SPEAKER. The question is before the House for consideration.

Mr. COX. As I understand the gentleman's statement, this property was confiscated?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. COX. And it was sold?

Mr. PAYNE. By the Government.

Mr. COX. Sold by the Government, and your party bought it and paid the money into the Treasury of the United States for the property?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. COX. Now, did the rental under which you claim occur after the sale or prior to the sale?

Mr. PAYNE. It occurred after the sale and before the party whose property was confiscated died. I want to say further that there was a litigation brought by the heir to the property. One French Forrest was the party whose property was confiscated, and his son, after the death of French Forrest, brought an action in ejectment, and that action was defended and afterwards affirmed, I think, by the Supreme Court, ousting him from the premises. The occupation was after the sale and before the party died whose property was confiscated.

Mr. COX. In other words, the Government got the use of the property after the sale?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. COX. And this is a claim for the rental after the sale by the Government?

Mr. PAYNE. It is.

The bill was order to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOHN WALLER.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5253) to reimburse John Waller, former postmaster at Monticello, N. Y., for moneys expended in carrying the mails.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to John Waller, late postmaster at Monticello, N. Y., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $800, to reimburse him for moneys expended in carrying the United States mails and for damages consequent therefrom.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. Reserving the right to object, let us have the report read to see what the foundation of this claim is.

The report (by Mr. BRUMM) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5253) to reimburse John Waller, former postmaster at Monticello, N. Y., for money expended in carrying the mails, have carefully considered the same, and report:

A bill in all respects similar to the present bill was introduced into the Forty-eighth Congress, and was referred to the Committee on Claims, and by that committee reported favorably. Your committee adopt the report of that committee and recommend that the bill do pass. Said report is as follows:

"The committee find that the said John Waller was, during the months of February, March, April, and May, in the year 1875, the postmaster at Monticello, in the county of Sullivan, and State of New York; and at that time Monticello was at the head of the railroad route, and the mails were received via the Port Jervis and Monticello Railroad and via the Midland Railroad at Fallsburg Station.

"The committee further find that during the months aforesaid the said railroads were compelled at various times to abandon their service as carriers of the mail, on account of snow obstructions, which prevented running of trains. This stoppage was a serious embarrassment to the business interests of Monticello and the surrounding country. The post-office at Monticello became choked with the letters of adjoining towns. To give relief the postmaster employed O'Neil & Co., who were running passenger sleighs between Monticello and Liberty, in said county, and between Monticello and Middletown, in the adjoining county of Orange, to perform the temporary service of carrying the mails, and thereupon reported the facts to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

"In providing for this temporary service the postmaster relied upon section 259 of the Rules and Regulations of the Post-Office Department, which had been furnished him for his guidance in the discharge of his duties. That section reads:

"'Whenever any contractor fails to commence the service stipulated in his contract, or abandons the same, it is the duty of the postmaster at the head of the route to employ temporary service at the lowest rate possible, and report the facts to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General immediately.'

"The postmaster followed these instructions. The railroads were the contractors. They abandoned the service, and the postmaster employed temporary service and made report of the facts as required.

"When O'Neil & Co., the temporary contractors, made out their bill and demanded payment of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, it was refused on the ground that there were no funds applicable to the payment of the claim. Thereupon they brought suit against Waller and recovered judgment against him, and he was compelled to pay, and actually did pay on the 29th day of March, 1883, the sum of $426.25.

"In addition to this, the said postmaster has paid, in part, and incurred obligations to the amount of $375, for his counsel fees and costs and necessary disbursements in defending suit.

"Your committee is of opinion that the claim is a just and meritorious one, and therefore reports the bill back favorably, with a recommendation that it pass."

STATE OF NEW YORK,
County of Sullivan, Village of Monticello, ss:

John Waller, of said village, being duly sworn, says that during the months of February, March, April, and May, 1875, he was postmaster at Monticello, and that mails were received by the Port Jervis and Monticello Railroad, and via the Midland Railroad at Fallsburg Station.

That during the months named heavy falls of snow in this section of country blockaded said railroads, and that great quantities of mail matter accumulated at the Monticello post-office.

Deponent further says that in the rules and regulations furnished him for his guidance as postmaster there was a certain provision known as section 259, which was as follows:

"SEC. 259. Whenever any contractor fails to commence the service stipulated in his contract, or abandons the same, it is the duty of the postmaster at the head of the route to employ temporary service at the lowest rate possible, and report the facts to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General immediately."

Deponent further says that, believing it was his duty to attend to the forwarding of the mails which had accumulated in his office as aforesaid, and relying upon the directions in said section 259, he employed O'Neil & Co.,

who were running passenger sleighs between Monticello and Liberty, in said county, and between Monticello and Middletown, in the adjoining county of Orange, to perform the temporary service of carrying the mails, and thereafter reported the facts to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

That upon the completion of such service the said O'Neil & Co. made out their bill, which was duly presented to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and payment demanded, but refused.

That thereupon the said O'Neil & Co. sued this deponent for said services and recovered judgment, and this deponent was compelled to pay, and actually did pay, on the 29th of March, 1883, $426.25.

That no part of the money thus paid has ever been refunded to him.

JOHN WALLER.

Sworn to before me this 21st day of March, 1884.

PETER E. PALER, Notary Public.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COX. There is quite a number of these claims that have come out of the Committee on Claims. One is just about as meritorious as another. As there is a question about that sort of legislation in a special bill, I think the bills ought to take the regular order; and I object to the present consideration of this bill.

JOHN R. BIGELOW.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the bill that I asked the attention of the House to was a House bill, and there was a Senate bill passed which I desire to have substituted for it.

The SPEAKER. The House bill that was passed at the request of the gentleman from New York was the House bill instead of the Senate bill. If there be no objection, the Senate bill can be substituted for the House bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. Are they exactly the same?

Mr. PAYNE. They are.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (S. 100) for the relief of the estate of John R. Bigelow.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Eunice P. Bigelow, administratrix of the estate of John R. Bigelow, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $284.66, as rent of a tract of land with the buildings thereon, known as Clermont, in Fairfax County, Va., 3 miles from Alexandria, as found and set forth by the Court of Claims in its findings of fact reported in House Miscellaneous Document No. 19, Fifty-second Congress, second session, and that this sum be paid to her in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States on account of the purchase of the Clermont property in July, 1864, by John R. Bigelow and Westel Willoughby, and its subsequent occupation by the United States.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

REV. EDWIN WARRINER.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill. It will take but a minute.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 505) for the relief of Edwin Warriner.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Edwin Warriner on the rolls of the First Battalion Connecticut Cavalry Volunteers as chaplain, and to recognize him as of that grade and organization in the service of the United States from the 1st day of December, 1861, the date of his commission, to the 12th day of March, 1864, the date of the acceptance of his resignation by the governor of the State.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, it will take but a minute to state the object of this bill to the House. This gentleman is a leading Methodist clergyman in my district. He served as chaplain for nearly three years in the First Battalion of Connecticut Cavalry. That regiment was organized into two battalions, and he served with the First Battalion. He was paid for his services by the State of Connecticut during all that time, but the regimental organization was not completed until about two months before his resignation, and consequently he never was mustered. I will not detain the House by reading this report, but will only read the last sentence, which is sufficient:

The case is a plain one, and the reasons why he was not mustered into the service of the United States ought not to prejudice his claim nor prevent the Government of the United States from doing an act of simple justice to one who had rendered his country valuable service in the hour of trial and danger.

There is no question of money involved in the case; there is no claim for a pension or back pay about it. It is simply for the correction of an honorable record.

Mr. LOUD. Who said that?

Mr. HILL. It was the unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOUD. That is the committee's report.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report by (Mr. FENTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 505) for the relief of Rev. Edwin Warriner, have had the same under consideration, and report it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The facts in the case, as indicated by the papers and documents submitted to the committee, are as follows:

Rev. Edwin Warriner was commissioned as chaplain of the First Battalion of Cavalry Volunteers from the militia of this State (Connecticut) by Governor William A. Buckingham December 3, 1861, and served as such until the 12th of March, 1864, when he tendered his resignation, which was accepted, and he was honorably discharged the service.

Mr. Warriner was never mustered into the service of the United States for the reason that there was no legal vacancy for a chaplain of that regiment during his alleged incumbency of the office, the regiment not having completed its organization until about the time of his discharge, as shown by the records of the War Department and communicated to Hon. Ebenezer J. Hill, member of Congress from the State of Connecticut, by Col. F. C. Ainsworth, under date of December 5, 1895.

Mr. Warriner was paid his salary as chaplain by the State of Connecticut during the entire period of his service, which sum was refunded to the State of Connecticut by the United States, and which tends to prove that the United States recognized the validity of the commission, appointment, and service of the claimant.

The service of Mr. Warriner as chaplain is further substantiated by Colonel (afterwards General) Blakeslee and First Lieut. William T. Cook, who submit affidavits upon that point and testify to his fidelity and efficient service. The case is a plain one, and the reasons why he was not mustered into the service of the United States ought not to prejudice his claim nor prevent the Government of the United States from doing an act of simple justice to one who had rendered his country valuable service in the hour of trial and danger

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it seems that this party has already been paid by the State of Connecticut and that State has been reimbursed by the Government of the United States. Now, what is the object of this proceeding?

Mr. HILL. It is simply this: This gentleman has served as a member of the Union Veterans League and also in the Grand Army of the Republic, and he finds to-day, much to his surprise, that he was never mustered into the United States service, and that he has no right to a membership in those organizations.

Mr. McMILLIN. Where was his regiment?

Mr. HILL. His regiment was organized into two battalions, and his service was all, except about three months of his three years, with the First Battalion, before the regimental organization was complete.

Mr. McMILLIN. Where was he engaged?

Mr. HILL. He was with the First Battalion of Cavalry Volunteers of Connecticut, and served with them. This is simply to correct his record, and carries no money whatever,

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed,

On motion of Mr. HILL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONDEMNED CANNON AND CANNON BALLS FOR L. W. COOPER POST, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC, OF LATHROP, MO.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the passage of a little bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that probably there is hardly time to pass another bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. There are two minutes, and it will take but a minute if nobody objects.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8013) donating one condemned cannon and cannon balls to Grand Army of the Republic, L. W. Cooper Post, Department of Missouri, No. 81, of Lathrop, Mo.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to L. W. Cooper Post, Department of Missouri, No. 81, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Lathrop, Mo., one condemned cannon and five cannon balls: Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment to the service, and that no expense is hereby incurred by the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. Executive Document No. 346, being a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the cases of Hannah S. Crane, Mary Ives Crocker, Kate Mary Dillon, and James S. Boyd against The United States, should have been referred to the Committee on Claims instead of the Committee on War Claims, and without objection the change will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the rules the House is now in recess until 8 o'clock this evening, and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PAYNE] will please act as Speaker.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 p. m., and was called to order by Mr. PAYNE as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the Clerk to read the special order.

The order was read, as follows:

The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

JONATHAN SCOTT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first business in order is a bill which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time at last Friday evening session, when the reading of the engrossed bill was demanded. The Clerk will report the engrossed bill.

The Clerk read the engrossed bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $72 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jonathan Scott, of Oswego, Kans., late of Company M, Sixth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. PICKLER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

J. S. COCHENOUR.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, a week ago I gave notice that I desired to call up the bill which I now send to the desk and ask to have considered by unanimous consent at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of J. S. Cochenour, late captain of Company H, Sixtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $50 per month.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the report in that case read.

Mr. WOOD. Let it be read, Mr. Speaker. It is very brief.

The report by (Mr. WOOD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3189) to increase the pension of J. S. Cochenour, submit the following report:

John S. Cochenour was enrolled December 24, 1861; was mustered as second lieutenant of Company H, Sixtieth Illinois Volunteers, February 17, 1862, and as captain of said company November 6, 1863.

On September 1, 1864, in the battle of Jonesboro, Ga., his left foot was shot off, and his leg amputated 10 inches below the kneejoint. It appears from the evidence on file in the Pension Office that this wound never entirely healed; that the flaps receded, rendering the end of the stump sore and ulcerated, and from that time to the present it often bleeds, discharging pus, and is painful. He has for this reason been unable to wear an artificial limb a portion of the time.

He is now confined to his bed and has been most of the time for nearly six months past. He has heretofore frequently been confined to his bed, and the evidence clearly shows that he requires the frequent services of an attendant. As early as May 25, 1866, his medical examination shows him "totally incapacitated for manual labor" on account of this wound. He is now 55 years of age, and his condition appears to be growing worse, rather than better, with his advancing years. His last medical examination, May 31, 1893, disclosed that the "end of the stump is sore and ulcerated."

Claimant was discharged on account of his wound December 14, 1864, from which time he was pensioned at $20 per month, which was increased to $24 from March 3, 1883, and to $30 from August 4, 1886, which sum he is now drawing. Applications for increase were rejected August 26, 1875, and August 22, 1893.

The committee have examined the affidavits now on file in the Pension Office of the following physicians: Z. D. French, J. H. Hundley, H. A. Lemen, M. D. Foster, and E. J. French, in addition to the reports of the medical boards. The affidavits of the following laymen have also been examined: O. C. Palmateer, Sylvester Utterback, Elizabeth Utterback, John C. Rush, Caroline C. Cochenour, D. Burnett, A. J. West, John A. Berry, Emily S. Clark, Calvin U. Fishel, also that of Hon. J. C. Allen, a former member and Clerk of this House.

These affidavits show applicant entirely incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and also that at times the attendance of another person upon him is absolutely necessary. The witnesses have personal knowledge of his condition, and under the circumstances the committee are unable to perceive why the evidence of a layman is not as accurate and valuable as that of a physician.

There is no question but that $30 per month is insufficient for applicant's care and support or that he ought not to have $50 under existing law unless the same be very strictly construed. He requires "frequent" though not "periodical" attendance of another person.

In view of all the facts and the gallant record of this soldier the committee recommend the passage of the bill with these amendments: Change name in bill and title to "John S. Cochenour," and also add to the end of bill "in lieu of the pension he is now receiving."

The amendments recommended in the last paragraph of the report were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the special order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. PICKLER, the Speaker pro tempore declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes none; so the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the special order. The Clerk will report the first bill.

SOLOMON HYAMS.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2602) for the relief of Solomon Hyams.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Solomon Hyams, of Charleston, S. C., Indian war survivor, to $50 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by him, under certificate No. 1352.

The report (by Mr. ELLIOTT of South Carolina) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2602) granting an increase of pension to Solomon Hyams, have considered the same and report:

Solomon Hyams was a private in Captain Robinson's company, Washington (D. C.) Volunteers, and served from June 26, 1836, to December 31, 1836, in the Seminole Indian war.

On October 5, 1882, he filed an application at the Pension Bureau, declaring that while in said service he incurred a rupture from a fall in line of duty. The testimony filed in support of the claim showed that he had been a sufferer from hernia ever since his discharge from the service, but being unable to furnish the required proof as to the circumstances attending the injury his claim was disallowed.

Subsequently, however, he was granted the pension of $8 per month provided by the Indian war service-pension act of July 27, 1892, and he is now in receipt of that sum.

The claimant is now over 90 years old, and in addition to the disabilities incident to that great age, he is suffering from the hernia above mentioned. He is absolutely without any property or income, aside from the pension, and can do nothing whatever to aid in his support. The facts are shown by the affidavit of Dr. T. P. Whaley, of Charleston, S. C., and by the statements of the claimant and others.

There are many precedents for an increased allowance to the aged and destitute veterans of these old wars, and in the light of the facts stated above the passage of the bill is recommended with an amendment striking out the word "fifty," in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty," so as to fix the rating at $20 per month.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I am requested by my colleague, Mr. ELLIOTT, to state that he is personally acquainted with this old man, who is 90 years old and in indigent circumstances. He lives in the city of Charleston, and has no means of support except the pension he is receiving. I do not know him myself, but that is the statement which my colleague authorized me to make.

The amendment recommended in the report was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY JANE LYNN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 483) for the relief of Mary Jane Lynn, daughter of John R. Lynn, a Revolutionary soldier.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Mary Jane Lynn, the daughter of John R. Lynn, who served as a private soldier from the State of Pennsylvania, under General Wayne, in the war of the Revolution, and allow the said Mary Jane Lynn a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. HALTERMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 483) granting a pension to Mary Jane Lynn, and appropriating money therefor, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

Mary Jane Lynn, the applicant, is now over 78 years of age, and resides in the city of Altoona, Pa. She was born in Union County, Pa., November 23, 1817, and is the only surviving child of John R. Lynn and Jane Lynn. John R. Lynn, her father, enlisted as a private in Captain Gill's company of Colonel Moylan's regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers in 1780, to serve during the war, and resided at the time of his enlistment at Lancaster, Pa., and was honorably discharged from service. At the age of 63 years he was granted a pension as a Revolutionary veteran, his application being dated April 6, 1818. He died in Union County, Pa., September 28, 1847, and left to survive him a widow and the applicant, who continued to reside with her mother until her mother's death, in 1854.

Miss Lynn, the applicant, is a maiden lady and is in indigent circumstances, and has made her living as a seamstress. She is now of such an age and is so infirm that she is unable to follow her employment, and is dependent to a very large degree upon her friends (she having no relatives) for support.

All the facts relative to the service of the soldier are shown in the papers on file at the Pension Bureau, and competent evidence was given your committee as to the age, relationship, and dependence of the beneficiary.

There are several precedents for the proposed legislation, and, in the light of the claimant's necessitous circumstances, your committee believe that the small pension proposed in the bill should be allowed to her. The passage of the bill is therefore recommended.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the report in this case says that there are several precedents for such legislation. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions if he can cite any of those precedents?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. There are several precedents, not only in this Congress, but in the Fifty-third. The precedent that has been established by the committee and by Congress as to the amount of pension is $12 a month, and the Committee on Pensions have adhered strictly to it. This case comes within the line of the precedents referred to in the report. The facts have been proven to the satisfaction of the committee.

Mr. TALBERT. This strikes me as a very exceptional case.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MICHAEL PETTIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3007) granting an increase of pension to Michael Pettis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Michael Pettis, First Mounted Rifles, regular service, who performed conspicuous service in the war with Mexico, to $30 per month.

The report (by Mr. HARDY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3007) granting an increase of pension to Michael S. Pettit, have considered the same, and respectfully report as follows:

The claimant, Michael S. Pettit, was a private in Company F, First United States Mounted Rifles, and served from August 25, 1846, to April 11, 1848, in the war with Mexico.

On January 23, 1893, he filed an application at the Pension Bureau declaring that at Chapultepec, near the City of Mexico, December 13, 1847, he fell from a scaling ladder and broke his foot, and at the same time a shell exploded near his head, bursting the tympanum of the right ear, entirely destroying the hearing of the ear.

The claimant was discharged from the service on a surgeon's certificate of disability, which recites that he was at that time suffering from deafness and lameness to such a degree as to be unfit for further duty with the Army.

The report of the examining surgeons, dated August 2, 1893, shows severe deafness of right ear, an injury of the right foot, and other disabilities, causing total inability to perform manual labor, but owing to the long time that has elapsed since the service was rendered he has failed to secure the testimony required to complete the application, and no allowance of the disability application has ever been made.

After the passage of the Mexican war service-pension act of January 29, 1887, Mr. Pettit made application thereunder and was allowed the pension of $8 per month provided by that act. Since then the pension has been increased to $12 per month under the act of January 5, 1893, because of the claimant's destitution and inability to earn a support by manual labor.

Mr. Pettit is now about 74 years old, without property of any kind, and an inmate of the Soldiers' Home at Marion, Ind. His statement concerning his services and the reasons for asking the increased allowance provided by the bill are as follows:

SOLDIERS' HOME, Marion, Ind., December 8, 1895.

DEAR SIR: In the latter part of the last Congress there was a bill introduced by Mr. McNagny in my behalf, granting me an increase of pension. I will state the facts in my case as briefly as I can:

In 1846 I enlisted in the First Regiment of Mounted Rifle Regulars, under Persever F. Smith as colonel and John C. Fremont as lieutenant-colonel, and served all through the war with Mexico. I was in every engagement from Vera Cruz to the capture of the City of Mexico. I served as pioneer for Company E at the storming of Chapultepec; was with the storming party at that time; lost one shoe, and got my foot cut with glass, but tied it up and still kept with our regiment. Between the castle and the Belen Greety Gate, while we were going from one arch to another, and when near the gate, a shell burst close to where I was standing in one of the arches and the concussion bursted the tympanum of my right ear, and totally destroyed my hearing in that ear. I still kept with my company, and on the morning of the 14th of September, 1847, helped place our flag over the capitol. After we had been in the city some time my foot and leg became badly inflamed, my ear ran corruption constantly, and I became so bad that I was forced to be sent to the hospital, where I remained until discharged on April 12, 1848. At that time our company (E) was disbanded, and while I was in the hospital I was transferred to Company F, and discharged from Company F.

We had but a short time before got a new surgeon, Newton by name, and our captain being away at home, and I myself not thinking anything about pensions at that time, and being anxious to get away on the next wagon train, paid no attention to the advice of our acting surgeon in chief, who told me at the time that I was entitled to a pension. Now, the facts are these: I have been deaf in my right ear from that time, and I have been lame from the day I was discharged, and I received it all in the line of duty. There was not a stouter or more healthy man in the regiment, as all who knew me would testify. Through neglect I never applied for a pension until a short time before the bill passed giving the Mexican veterans $8 per month at 62 years of age. Out of the number who were with the colors on the 14th of September, 1847, there are only two living, as far as I can ascertain, myself and Jacob Tourga. Captain Roberts, of the "Rifles," was in command of the colors on that day. He died in Washington a few years ago.

Now, I suppose that all of the papers that I signed at the time I got my pension are on file in the Pension Department, and the testimony there will show that I have stated facts.

Congressman Martin had a copy of my discharge, but I do not know what he has done with it.

I am at this time an inmate of our grand Home here, and it could be almost a paradise for the "vets" if they would make it so—sheltered from storms and rain, every comfort provided by a grateful country that is denied to thousands, and as far as I am concerned, if it were not for family ties at home, I could be content; but one that has always been surrounded with a happy family can not be happy away from them.

Now, if it is just and right for me to be granted an increase, or back pay, so that I can spend the few remaining days with loved ones at home it is all I ask. I am now nearly 74 years old, and I am certain that I have been entitled to a pension ever since I was discharged.

I need not say one word in regard to the Rifle Regiment. Every reader of history knows its record, and as for the fact in regard to planting the first flag over the Capitol, see Scott's Official Report, or Goodrich's History of the War with Mexico.

I should not ask anything, even now, had it not been for adversity unavoidable.

Now, if it is possible to help me I will be very thankful, and I am very thankful for what I already receive. If I should be allowed a small increase it would not be for long.

I enlisted at Logansport, Ind. Spear Tipton was first lieutenant. There is not a prominent business man in Logansport but will testify to my moral character—such men as Judge Chase, Judge McConnell, Baldwin & Nelson, Murdock, or any old resident there.

I am, very respectfully, yours, truly,

MICHAEL S. PETTIT,
First Regiment United States Mounted Rifles.

Hon. C. W. STEELE.

P. S.—Senator DAVID TURPIE ought to do all he can for me, as he is an old acquaintance; used to live in the same town.

I do not know if you are a kinsman of Uncle Charley Steele, of Wabash, or not, but if you are, I have a right to call him uncle, as he was uncle to my wife. Colonel Butler was her grandfather.

Many of the material facts set forth in the foregoing statement are fully shown by the papers on file at the Pension Bureau, and the claimant's reputation for truthfulness and reliability is fully vouched for by Hon. William D. Owen, secretary of state, and by other prominent citizens of Indiana.

The passage of the bill is respectfully recommended, with an amendment striking out the word "thirty," in line 6, and substituting therefor the word "twenty," so as to fix the rate of pension at $20 per month; also amend by adding the initial "S." to claimant's Christian name, and by changing the spelling of his surname to "Pettit."

The amendments recommended in the last paragraph of the report were adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. HELEN MORRELL CARROLL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 730) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Helen Morrell Carroll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Helen Morrell Carroll, widow of Samuel Sprigg Carroll, late a major-general in the United States Army, at the rate of $75 a month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. MILES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 730) granting a pension to Helen Morrell Carroll, have carefully examined the same, and, adopting the accompanying Senate report (No. 53) as their own, respectfully recommend its passage.

[Senate Report No. 53, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 730) granting a pension to Helen Morrell Carroll, have examined the same, and report:

A similar bill was introduced in the Fifty-third Congress, referred to the Committee on Pensions, examined, reported favorably, and passed the Senate.

The facts are as follows:

Mrs. Carroll is the widow of the late Maj. Gen. Samuel Sprigg Carroll. She is now drawing a pension of $30 per month. She is in feeble health and without property. General Carroll's military record is one of conspicuous merit. Entering the service in 1856, he gained great renown, especially in the late civil war, as will appear from the appended statement from his military service furnished by the War Department. He was promoted to major for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Chancellorsville; to lieutenant-colonel for gallant and meritorious service in the battle of Gettysburg; to colonel for gallant and meritorious service in the battle of the Wilderness; to brigadier-general for gallant and meritorious service in the battle of Spottsylvania, and to major-general for gallant and meritorious service in the field during the war.

The record is one of great brilliancy, and your committee are of opinion that it entitles the widow to a much higher rate of pension than she is now receiving.

Your committee recommend, therefore, the passage of the bill.

"That Bvt. Maj. Gen. S. S. Carroll, lieutenant-colonel, United States Infantry, is incapacitated for active service, and that said incapacity results from wounds received in battle, while commanding two brigades of from 15 to 17 regiments in the battle of Spottsylvania, Va., May 13, 1864, and the board recommend that he be retired in conformity with the thirty-second section of the act of July 28, 1866."

General Carroll was therefore retired from active service June 9, 1869, with the full rank of major-general, being the rank of the command held by him when wounded. He died January 28, 1893.

J. C. GILMORE,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Mr. TALBERT. I think, sir, that we should stop a while and discuss the merits of this proposed legislation. There has been no objection raised to a single bill out of, I believe, four that we have passed which appear to be meritorious. But when we strike this case we can see that the purport of the bill is to discriminate in favor of the widow of a major-general. She is already under the law, and according to the regulations and rating of the law, drawing $30 a month. This bill proposes to give her in addition $45, making her pension $75 a month, when the very first bill we passed to-night, providing for that gallant old soldier, Captain Cochenour, who was proven to be a gallant soldier, grants him only $50 a month.

Now, you propose to give the widow of this major-general $75 a month for no other reason on the face of the earth than that she was the widow of a major-general. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is not a sufficient reason why this woman's pension should be raised from $30 to $75 a month. I submit there is not a man in this House to-night who will get up here and claim that there is sufficient evidence in this case for thus increasing this widow's pension. If so, let him speak out, or forever hold his peace. No doubt her husband was a gallant soldier. He served in two wars, and his memory should be revered. I respect him for what he did for his country. He was a grand and gallant man. But there are to-day, all over this Union, thousands of widows of as gallant men as this major-general ever could have been, and yet those widows are drawing only eight, ten, or twelve dollars a month. I submit it is not just to those women and their departed husbands, lying to-day in the cold and silent grave, to make this unjust discrimination in favor of the widow of a major-general. It is wrong in every sense of the word.

There may be precedents for this bill, but if so they are based on exceptional cases—cases where there were distinguished services on the part of the wife as well as the husband. If I mistake not, the very next bill which we shall reach is one proposing to increase the pension of the widow of General Doubleday, she having actually taken her gun and gone forth to perform the service of a soldier. That is an exceptional case. There may be some reason in such an exceptional and distinguished case for granting an exceptional pension, but this is only an exception to the rule.

In this case there is a long report, the statements of which, of course, I do not undertake to deny. No doubt the report is truthful in stating the gallant services of this man in the Mexican war and in the "late unpleasantness." I do not deny those statements. Yet I say there is an insufficiency of evidence to justify raising his pension from $30 to $75 a month.

I appeal to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. PICKLER] to come to my aid to-night and to show his faith by his works. He has stood on this floor and urged the claims of the private soldiers and their widows; he has stood up for their rights as against the rights of major-generals and others. I do not think he can sit here to-night and complacently vote $75 a month to a widow for no other reason than that she is the widow of an officer. If he does he will depart from his assertions.

It will be borne in mind that there is, if I am correctly informed, no rating above that of a lieutenant-colonel. The general law makes no provision for any higher pension than to the widow of a lieutenant-colonel at the rate of $30 a month, the same pension which the officer himself would receive; and that possibly is just and right. But, sir, I submit that when you propose to increase a pension of this kind, without any testimony except that the applicant's husband was a gallant officer, it is not just toward the thousands of widows of soldiers who were just as true and just as brave as this general and who suffered privation away down at their homes through many dreary days and nights alone.

Now, one word as to the way in which cases are presented in these reports. I wish to send to the desk to be read a letter which I received some time ago from a gallant soldier in regard to a pension already passed. This letter shows the misrepresentations upon which reports may be made. It is a letter written to me in regard to the pensioning of Mollie Crandall. I would have had it read on a previous Friday evening if I could have obtained the opportunity when the bill to which it refers was under consideration. This letter is written by an old soldier who knew Captain Crandall. I desire the letter read in my time, and I ask that the House give it attention, for although it does not bear directly upon the pending case it shows that misrepresentations sometimes find their way into the reports of committees, that our committees may be imposed upon by misrepresentation, and upon such incorrect information they sometimes bring forward their reports. Let the Clerk read.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 20, 1896.

DEAR SIR: If you care to continue opposition to the granting of an increase of pension to Mollie Crandall, widow of the late Capt. Clark Crandall, when final action is to be had by the House, I beg to suggest that you call the attention of the two members who came to your assistance on the evening of the 20th instant to what I have to claim for Captain Crandall, and reasons why I object to the kind of excuses given why the captain did not apply for a pension under the general law, and fifty others of his comrades who knew him as well and intimately as did the three or four who were called upon to, and did, certify as printed in the report of the committee. As one of his personal intimate friends, I protest against any record being made, under any pretext or for any purpose, that will reflect to the discredit of the good name for integrity and intelligence he bore among his comrades and all others who knew him best.

One certifies that he knew of his physical condition and advised him to apply for a pension. This advice was not taken by the captain, for he was a pension attorney, familiar with the pension laws, and knew that he could not support a claim for a pension under the law in force at the time the advice was given to apply. "Poor and in distress" at that time, it is true, and "proud," he made no claim, or he would have been pensioned, as he was entitled, at $20 per month. I claim for him and the good name he left that it was because he was an honorable man, well knowing that under the law he was not entitled, and never for one moment did he harbor the thought of applying and supporting the claim by false testimony.

Another certifies to the frequent talks he had with the captain and how he related his experiences and attributed all the ills he suffered to his army life. This would make Captain Crandall a liar with his army record before us. But no one who knew him would agree that he was a liar. Another certifies that he frequently talked with him over the effect the firing of cannon had on the sense of hearing, and leaving the impression that the captain claims his deafness was the result of shooting of cannon. I do not believe he would lie, and do not believe he even said one word to leave the impression that he ever saw any such service as is now claimed for him in support of this bill.

The chairman of the committee points to the certificate of Senator MITCHELL, who says he knew Crandall several years before and ever since the service, etc. At least two Representatives in Congress know Captain Crandall and of his service as well as did Senator MITCHELL, and one of them rose in his seat in Congress and stated it, but that testimony is not to be considered. The chairman of the committee also stated that Crandall made no application for pension until driven by poverty to do so, when the facts are he applied under June act of 1890, and was at the time in receipt of $1,440 per year as an employee of the Senate. Mr. Crandall was an honest man, and I object to any record being made that will prove him to have been otherwise. I claim for him that he applied for pension and it was granted him under June, 1890, act, because he knew it was justly due him, and in doing so he did not represent that he was starving, neither was it necessary for him to have done so. If it was, then the captain lied. But he was not a liar, and I again object to the record as now made up. Give the widow $20 if you will, but not at the expense of the good name of my deceased friend and comrade.

Respectfully, J. B. BURKE.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, that letter speaks for itself. I have no comment to make upon it. I only want to say that the widows of the common soldiers suffered privations, poverty, and want during the war, and are suffering in the same way now, while the widows of officers were living "in clover" and having a fine time.

Mr. Chairman, I will ask this House to agree that this bill be laid aside with an unfavorable report. Let this widow remain just where she is, drawing a pension of $30 a month. I move that the bill be laid aside with an unfavorable recommendation. I hope there will be no objection to this motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question "Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?" takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that I have offered an amendment to that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understood; but the question on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation takes precedence of the gentleman's motion.

Mr. TALBERT. You consider the principal motion before you do the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, in cases of this kind.

Mr. TALBERT. That is strange parliamentary law; but, however, go ahead with your rat killing.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Pending this question, I move to strike out "$75" and insert "$50."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire to amend the bill as stated by him.

Mr. ERDMAN. In the absence of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES] who reported the bill, and as there seems to be some opposition to it and no one here to defend it, being a Senate bill, I ask that it be passed over, not to lose its place on the Calendar, until Mr. MILES returns.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MRS. MARY DOUBLEDAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1203) granting an increase of pension to Mary Doubleday, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Abner Doubleday.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Doubleday, widow of Maj. Gen. Abner Doubleday, and pay her a pension of $100 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. ERDMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1203) granting an increase of pension to Mary Doubleday, quote from the report of this committee in the Fifty-third Congress the following, which they adopt as their own:

The beneficiary under this bill is the widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Abner Doubleday. She is now far advanced in life, is in feeble health, and requires care and medical attendance, which she is not able to secure with the amount provided for in the existing pension. We find that after General Doubleday's retirement from the Army he lived very economically in the village of Mendan, N. J., and devoted all his income above the amount necessary for his support to the providing of a policy of insurance in behalf of his widow; that shortly before his death the insurance company failed, and that his last hours were clouded with the fear that his widow would come to want.

We find that independent of the notable services of her husband in behalf of the Union, she herself, during a long life as his companion upon the frontier and in campaign, rendered valuable service to the country. Particularly was this the case in the Florida wars, when she remained with her husband in the wilderness, and by her presence and influence over the soldiers assisted in maintaining discipline and good order; also at Fort Sumter, when it was besieged and the garrison very small, she took her regular turn in relieving the guards and in keeping watch of the approach of the enemy, and also in securing medical supplies from Charleston.

In view of all these facts the committee have unanimously decided to recommend the increase asked for, so that the few remaining years of her life may be at least surrounded by necessary comforts, and earnestly recommend the passage of the bill.

If long-continued, distinguished services merit recognition at the hands of the Congress, such recognition should be accorded in this case, especially in view of the advanced age, physical infirmities, and necessitous condition of the beneficiary.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. ERDMAN. As this would seem to come within the line of the last bill, I ask that the gentleman from Pennsylvania who introduced the bill say a word in regard to it.

Mr. DALZELL. I have no desire to occupy the time of the committee unless there be some objection. I prefer that we have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation?

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported to the House favorably.

JOSEPHINE FOOTE FAIRFAX.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3112) granting a pension to Josephine Foote Fairfax.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Josephine Foote Fairfax, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Donald MacNeill Fairfax, of the United States Navy, at the rate of $100 per month.

The report (by Mr. MILES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3112) granting a pension to Josephine Foote Fairfax, have examined the same, and, adopting the accompanying Senate report (No. 248) as their own, respectfully recommend its passage with the following amendment:

In line 8, strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty."

[Senate Report No. 248, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1784) granting an increase of pension to Josephine Foote Fairfax, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The applicant is the widow of the late Rear-Admiral Donald McNeil Fairfax, of the United States Navy, and the daughter of Rear-Admiral Andrew Hull Foote. Both these officers served with great distinction, and their careers reflect credit to a remarkable degree upon the American Navy.

Rear-Admiral Foote was born in Connecticut September 12, 1806. He was a son of United States Senator S. A. Foote, of that State. Entering the Navy as a midshipman in 1822, he saw active service almost immediately under the elder Porter in breaking up the piratical haunts in the West Indies. He became lieutenant in 1830.

During the years 1849, 1850, and 1851, while in command of the Perry, he did effective service in the suppression of the African slave trade. While commanding the Plymouth in China, in 1856, protecting American property during hostilities between Great Britain and China, he was fired upon by the forts on Canton River. An apology being refused, he attacked the forts, carrying them by storm. At the outbreak of the war of the rebellion he was selected to command the flotilla forming on the western waters. His conduct in connection with this and similar subsequent duty was so conspicuously fine that in June, 1862, he received the thanks of Congress and was made a rear-admiral. In June, 1863, he was selected to succeed Rear-Admiral Dupont in command of the fleet off Charleston, but while on his way to assume this command he died in New York, June 26, 1863.

Rear-Admiral Fairfax was born in Virginia March 10, 1821, and appointed midshipman in the Navy August 12, 1837. During the Mexican war he served on the California station and took part in the capture of Mazatean and Lower California. At the outbreak of the war he had been promoted through successive grades to lieutenant, and was serving as executive officer of the San Jacinto. The boarding of the British mail packet Trent, and the taking therefrom Mason and Slidell and their secretaries, Eustis and MacFarland, was directed in person by Lieutenant Fairfax, a most delicate and important event.

In May, 1862, he was ordered to command the Cayuga, reporting to Admiral Farragut, off New Orleans. In January, 1863, he was ordered North to command the monitor Nantucket, just built at South Boston. He was afterwards transferred to the Montauk, and participated in all the principal operations before Charleston. He was commissioned as rear-admiral July 11, 1880, and in the following year was placed on the retired list, having been forty years in active service, twenty years of which were spent at sea. He died at Hagerstown, Md., January 10, 1894.

The Fifty-third Congress granted Mrs. Fairfax a pension of $30 a month, and the present bill proposes to raise this sum to $50 per month. There can not be a more worthy case for a pension of $50, in accordance with so many precedents.

In an affidavit filed with the committee by Mrs. Fairfax she states that "her husband died on the 10th day of January, 1894, leaving no estate or support for her. She has herself and three unmarried daughters to maintain, and is without means to do so, having but a small income of her own, entirely inadequate for her support."

These facts are also testified to by several citizens of Hagerstown, Md., where Mrs. Fairfax resides, and by the county clerk.

In consideration of the high character of her husband and her father, and of her limited resources, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. TALBERT. This bill was also reported by the gentleman from Maryland, who is absent. I ask that this also be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. PICKLER. I think this bill ought to pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. PICKLER. I object.

This bill passed the Senate since the report by the House committee was ordered; and therefore I move now to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this bill identical with the House bill?

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know whether it is identical in language or not. It is the same amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has some doubt whether it is proper to entertain the motion.

Mr. TALBERT. I submit that it is out of order in Committee of the Whole. It must be done in the House if it is done at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know why it would be out of order to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill, the committee having authorized it to be done. The bills are identical, and the committee recommend that the Senate bill pass as a substitute.

The Senate bill has been before the committee, and the House committee has ordered the bill substituted, which I did not state in the first place,

The CHAIRMAN. Is the bill on the Calendar?

Mr. PICKLER. I suppose so; it ought to be.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is on the Calendar it can be taken up out of its order and the substitution made.

Mr. PICKLER. That was the action of the committee when the House bill was reported from the committee. This bill came from the Senate, and Mr. MILES, a member of the committee, was directed to substitute that for the House bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from South Dakota. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill under consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. TALBERT. I object.

Mr. PICKLER. Then I move that it be substituted for the House bill.

Mr. TALBERT. I make the point of order against that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the bill is not on the Calendar, and is of opinion that it is not competent to entertain the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. PICKLER. Then I join in the request of the gentleman from South Carolina that the bill be passed over without losing its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WOODMAN. I object.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the committee in this case approves the bill with an amendment to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty"; so as to make it read "$50 a month."

I wish the Committee on Invalid Pensions, or some member of the committee, would explain why the widow of Rear-Admiral Fairfax should have a pension of $50 a month and the widow of Gen. Abner Doubleday have $100 a month; and pending that explanation, I yield the floor for the purpose of hearing it.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, there is no such record, in my opinion, in this country, and I doubt whether there ever will be again, as that made by the widow of Gen. Abner Doubleday during the late war. Not only was her husband a soldier throughout his life, and not only did he render very gallant and meritorious services, but his widow was with him in the Florida war, with him at Fort Sumter, with him for years and years in the active service; and I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the report shows that at Fort Sumter she took her place with the other soldiers and stood guard. She herself was a soldier, Mr.

Chairman, and the committee thought she was entitled to some consideration on that account.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, while I am on my feet, that I am not so much in favor of these large pensions for the widows of generals as some other members of this House are. I believe that rank should be respected; it always is respected in law; but I do not believe in as great a difference as appears occasionally between what a general's widow should receive and what the widow of a private should receive. There are some of these bills reported at a higher figure than I individually should have recommended; but the majority of the committee recommend these bills and we present them to the House. Now, as far as the comparison made by the gentleman is concerned, I have only to say that I think $50 is a large pension, as a general thing, for the widow of anybody, and I think that $50 is ample in this case before us, of the widow of Admiral Fairfax. While I would not detract from the service of Admiral Fairfax one iota, I do say that there is no other case like that of Mrs. Doubleday and her husband. That is the difference, and that is the view taken by the committee.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, it is not my disposition to detract or attempt to detract in the slightest degree from the well-earned reputation of Major-General Doubleday. He was as worthy an officer as one could expect any country to have in its service, and I did not oppose pensioning his widow at the unusual rate of $100 a month; but it seems to me that there should be some rule of practice, some rule of procedure in the matter of these pensions. If one widow is entitled to $100 a month, I know no reason why the widow of an officer having equal rank should not receive the same.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It certainly is not competent for the chairman of the committee, or for any member of the committee, to undervalue the services of Rear-Admiral Fairfax. He served his country away back in the twenties, in the suppression of the African slave trade. He was very instrumental in the capture and holding of California, that grand territory, in behalf of the Government which he represented.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Wait one moment. He was the man who first raised the flag in Southern California at Monterey, and when the time came for him to serve his country in the war of the rebellion he served it as faithfully as his opportunity and capacity would permit. I had no personal acquaintance with him and have none with his widow, but I honor the record which he made as a naval officer, and I stand here to ask that this House shall give to his widow like consideration with that which it gives to other widows.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. One moment. The gentleman from South Carolina asked me to yield to him, and I will yield to him first and then to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. TALBERT. I only wanted to get information from the gentleman that I could not get from the Chair. What are you talking about? What is the motion? [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I am talking about the general propriety of passing this bill, and I presume the gentleman from South Carolina recognizes that as a sufficient subject for discussion here to-night.

Mr. TALBERT. Which bill?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The bill in favor of the widow of Rear-Admiral Fairfax.

Mr. TALBERT. We had agreed to pass that over.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It has not been agreed to do that. That is where you are mistaken.

Mr. TALBERT. Then I am mistaken, and I stand corrected.

Mr. PICKLER. Let us find out who is objecting to laying this bill aside. I thought it was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The gentleman sitting immediately in front of me [Mr. WOODMAN] objected.

Mr. TALBERT. I myself asked that the bill be laid aside. I should not object to my own motion.

Mr. PICKLER. What I want to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire is whether he wants to give this widow more than $50 a month?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I am not in favor of any of these large pensions——

Mr. PICKLER. The committee have cut this amount down.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But when the committee have cut down one and approved the other, I want the committee to find some level ground upon which it can stand in all cases and then let us determine whether this House will stand by and sustain the committee upon that grading of pensions which they may recommend.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. I have tried to give the gentleman the reason which actuated the committee. Mrs. Doubleday was a soldier herself, in the thick of the danger with her husband, and the committee thought that any woman who displayed such bravery as that was entitled to the pension which her husband would have been entitled to, and he would have had this under the law. [Applause.] That is the reason we did it. If the gentleman thinks that a woman who withstands the shock of battle and is in the thick of the conflict is not entitled to any credit for that, then he disagrees with the committee; but he ought to have made his objection when that bill was before the House.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from South Dakota will assert that Mrs. Fairfax was not with her husband in California and that she did not bear some of the rigors of that campaign when that grand territory was annexed to the United States I shall be glad to have him say so.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not want to try to prove a negative. I do not know anything about that. The only thing I do know is that Mrs. Doubleday did what we have alleged.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But it is unfair to institute a comparison like this, and not be willing to assert the facts that make the comparison.

In order to test this matter, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "fifty" and insert the words "one hundred" in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire to the amendment recommended by the committee, by striking out "fifty" and inserting "one hundred."

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the committee that had this question under consideration, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES] who had charge of this bill agreed to $50 per month, stating that the widow was satisfied, surrounded as she was, that she could be made comfortable with a pension of $50 a month. It was considered, I believe, the same day as the other case which has been spoken of. It was satisfactory to the widow and satisfactory to the members of the committee that we should report the bill. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WOODARD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. The gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah is recognized.

Mr. WOODARD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I think there is only one gentleman from Utah.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah was recognized.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. The gentleman from New Hampshire, with his usual desire to consume the time of this committee, has overlooked the fact that in the case of the widow of General Doubleday there was poverty, according to the report, and that in this case the report states that Mrs. Fairfax has some property of her own. That is one difference, which is a vital one, in the two cases. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I should not have claimed the attention of the committee again had it not been for the gratuitous assertion of my friend from Utah. I have never yet attempted to consume the time of this committee or of this House. I have endeavored sometimes to enforce upon this committee as best I might convictions which I honestly entertain in regard to legislation pending before the committee. Now, I wish this committee to fully understand the question as submitted by the gentleman from Utah. It is that if a family of a high officer in the Army or Navy of this country shall, through their personal extravagance, when he has received a salary greater than the salary of a member of Congress, and expended it from day to day, so when death comes penury enters their household, at the same time this Government shall pay a large pension to keep that widow and that family in affluence.

If that is the proposition of the gentleman from Utah, I am happy to say I am not with him; and I do not believe that the people of this country will justify such legislation upon our part here or upon the part of our successors. These high officers of the Army or Navy receive salaries ranging from $4,000 to $6,000 a year, about four or six times that which the average citizen of the United States receives. Of course I grant that their condition in life, the position which they are compelled to maintain, requires of them greater expenditures than the ordinary citizen; but for that very reason the Government has given them an increased salary; and it is as much their duty to save something out of that salary for old age, for sickness, and distress as any other citizen of the United States; and it is a bad practice and an extremely bad precedent, in my opinion, for this House of Representatives to pass pensions here for $50, $75, or $100 per month to the widows of these officers and leave the widows of the veterans who carried the musket and preserved this country in want and suffering for $8 a month. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Gentlemen, if you are willing to go on record bestowing the gratuities of this Government at the rate of $100 a month, or $50 a month even, in these cases and leave the poor soldier and the soldier's widow, who is debarred by some technicality from receiving any gratuity or pension at all, you are willing to do that which I am not. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I think that the assertion which I made has been proven by the gentleman from New Hampshire himself. The gentleman says that Mrs. Doubleday's husband lived in affluence. That "affluence" consisted in a life of economy, and he invested his savings in a life-insurance policy and the company failed, and now the gentleman from New Hampshire implies that he squandered what the Government paid him for his services. The gentleman from New Hampshire, in discussing this subject, has the air of that class of men who, because they have bank stocks or because they own houses from which they derive income or because they are wealthy though the railroad stocks or bonds which they hold, look with intolerance upon those who in a different line of life have not been able to accumulate wealth to provide for their families; so when a man gives a lifetime of faithful service to his country, and when his widow comes here to ask for a pension because of the services of her husband, that husband is held up to reproach before the people of this country for not having accumulated a competence for the support of his family.

Mr. Chairman, I have not consumed the time of this committee upon these questions, but it seems to me that the time has come when gentlemen who do so ought to be asked to cease.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. May I ask the gentleman a question? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, for the same reason that I was opposed to increasing the pension of the widow of General Carroll, I oppose increasing the pension of the widow of Admiral Fairfax. The only reason given is that he was an officer, and I submit that that is not a sufficient reason. I agree with the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] that we ought to have some common ground upon which we can stand in pensioning the widows of soldiers, and I suggest that that common ground is $30 a month which the law gives them, and I would like to have the gentlemen come upon that ground with me and let us all stand there. I am opposed to increasing the pension of this widow above $30 a month. I shall oppose it to the last ditch in every honorable way that I can. I hope the bill will not be laid aside with a favorable recommendation, but if you are determined to recommend its passage, I shall demand that you do it by the vote of a quorum.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. But, Mr. Chairman, the motion, with which the gentleman from South Carolina agreed, was the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire, that the pension should be increased in this case to $100 a month, and then the gentleman from New Hampshire gave very good reasons why we should agree with the report of the committee and keep it at $50 a month, and we are all in favor of that.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman is only talking through his hat. [Laughter.] I favored no such amendment. I am opposed to increasing it over $30.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. Oh, no. The gentleman mistakes a member from the State of Iowa for a Representative from the State of South Carolina. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman persists in talking "through his hat" although it is in the cloakroom. [Laughter.]

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I again ask unanimous consent that, in the absence of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES], this bill be laid aside until his return without losing its place on the Calendar.

Mr. POOLE. I object.

The question being taken on the amendments recommended by the committee, the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes none; so the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman—— [Laughter and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from South Carolina has already spoken twice upon this question, while he has no right to speak more than once.

Mr. TALBERT. I have not spoken upon this bill at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, if the gentleman from New York will just be quiet and sit down and let his hair grow [laughter] I will occupy only a very short space of the time of the committee. [Cries of "Good!" "Good!" and laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen may laugh, gentlemen may hiss, but I for one propose to stand here in my place in this House and speak out, sir, against what I consider to be an outrage upon the people of this country. I claim the right to advocate that which I think is right and just and proper, and no groaning, or hissing, or laughing, or "pints" of order, or quarts of order will prevent me doing that which I claim is my right. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen stand up here and plead the poverty of this widow and the poverty of that widow, the poverty of this man and the poverty of that man, when that is not at all the question that is before us for consideration in these pension claims. The question in each case is the justice of the claim as it is presented here. Why, sir, all over this broad land, from one ocean to the other, from the Gulf to the Lakes, we have poor people, some of whom have hardly clothes to wear or food to eat; so if we intend to use this body as a board of charity for all those people we shall have our hands full. Truly this is a great, a rich, a magnificent country; and some one has suggested that it is a small business, in view of the greatness and magnificence of this country of ours, to object to small pension claims.

Sir, I know this is a great and grand country, the richest upon the face of God's green earth. This is a country with 150,000 or 160,000 miles of railroad, with great towns and cities springing up like mushrooms, with factories and great marts of trade and other evidences of growth and prosperity. But, sir, go out into the interior among the masses of the people and you hear nothing but the harrowing song of hard times. There is a cry of distress among the people who pay a large percentage of the money we are appropriating here in this Hall. It is that class of people that I stand here to represent.

Truly this is a great country, with all its wealth and power; but, Mr. Chairman, beneath all this greatness and grandeur is the canker of a distressed and downtrodden and poverty-stricken people who are crying to Congress for relief. You turn a deaf ear to them. You pass your resolutions about Cuba and Venezuela; you pass a bill to stop prize fighting; you appropriate money for various objects; but you do nothing for that class of people who are the bone and sinew of this land and upon whose shoulders rests the support of this mighty Government of ours.

When I think of the condition of these people I think it right to oppose the increase of the pension of a widow of a general from $30 to $50 a month for no other reason than that she is the widow of a general. I raise my voice against such a proposition; I enter my protest. I say that when gentlemen in the majority here pass such bills as these they do wrong, they outrage justice. And, sir, I want to see the day come when this looting of the Treasury for political purposes will be stopped—this electioneering with the Treasury of the United States for votes, by voting away the money of the people here to undeserving pensioners. It is a hypocritical pretense of patriotism and love of the soldier, because many of you turn your backs upon the private soldier who smelt powder, who withstood the shot and the shell, and who bore the heat and burden of the day. This is done in the interest of the officers, many of whom were in bombproofs. Here is an effort to pension the widow of an officer. His life as an officer was a short one. For only a few days or months he was an officer.

Now, you want to raise the pension of his widow from $30 to $50 a month. I say to gentlemen on the other side who are in the majority here, do this thing if you will. I can only protest; and you will find me steadily protesting against such proceedings. In passing such a bill, you do that which is wrong; you outrage justice; you insult the widows of the gallant private soldiers who bore the brunt of the battle, who bore the heat and burden of the day; and this wrong you are doing in the interests of the officers. You discriminate against the widows of men who endured toil and privation. If you want to do this, do it; but you shall do it after I have protested, after I have exhausted every honorable means to prevent your doing it. If you will do it, the responsibility rests on you, but I will take no part in such infamous plundering of the public purse. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 97, noes 1.

Mr. TALBERT. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN (having counted the committee). There are 123 members present—more than a quorum. The bill is laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MRS. ELIZABETH RICHARDSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3932) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Richardson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause to be placed upon the pension rolls of the United States the name of Elizabeth Richardson, mother of Robert F. Richardson, late a private in Company A, in the Eighth Regiment of Missouri State Militia Cavalry, and who was killed during the war, and pay to her a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

The amendment reported by the committee, to strike out "$20" and insert "$12," was read.

The report (by Mr. CROWTHER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3932) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Richardson, submit the following report:

Mrs. Elizabeth Richardson, an old lady of 77 years, is the dependent mother of Robert F. Richardson, who was a private in Company A, Missouri State Militia Cavalry, a company which afterwards became Company A of the Eighth Missouri State Militia Cavalry. He enlisted in December, 1861, to serve during the war in Missouri. He was admitted to the post hospital at Jefferson City, Mo., January 4, 1862, with measles, and returned to duty February 23, 1862. February 28 he was reported on the company roll as absent on furlough, and on the muster-out roll of the company, January 25, 1865, the remark was made, "was killed near Osceola, Mo., February 8, 1862, by guerrillas."

There is an apparent discrepancy in the dates, but the testimony shows conclusively that the soldier was killed by guerrillas near Osceola while absent from the command on furlough.

The case appeals strongly to the sense of right in almost every human breast. This soldier gave his life for his country, not in battle, it is true, but in a desperate encounter with those roving enemies of all government who infested that section of Missouri at the time. In consequence of that loss, the mother is now on the verge of the grave and in want.

Your committee, in view of the facts, beg to report favorably and recommend that the bill do pass, with the following amendment:

Strike out "twenty" in the last line and substitute "twelve."

Mr. McCLELLAN. I wish to ask the gentleman who made this report whether this was one of the militia organizations of Missouri coming under paragraph 3, section 4693 of the Revised Statutes. Was it called out by the President, and did it act under the orders of the United States?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I wish to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the point made in this report on the subject of line of duty. As the bill stands, I have no objection to voting this pension to this dependent mother if it is done on the ground (which I assume was the fact) that this man was a gallant and brave soldier. But the report states that he was killed while in the line of duty—on an individual furlough, presumably—by guerrillas.

Mr. CROWTHER. He was not on an individual furlough. He was on a furlough by order of the post commander and the officer in charge of the post hospital at the time.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Still it was a furlough.

Mr. CROWTHER. It was not an "individual furlough."

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then I correct my statement as to its being an individual furlough.

Mr. CROWTHER. The soldier was in the line of duty.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, every Secretary of the Interior from the period of the war until 1889 held that a man was in the line of duty when he came under the terms of the opinion of Attorney-General Cushing, delivered May 17, 1855, that opinion holding that "while in the performance of those things which the law requires of him as a military duty, the soldier is in the line of duty."

When the new Administration came in in 1889 the Assistant Secretary of the Interior made a number of decisions overruling the previous practice of the Department and the decisions of the Secretaries who had gone before him. He held in one case that a man who had been hurt by the collapse of some seats in a circus was hurt in the line of duty. He held in another case that a man who was thrown from a horse which he was riding against the orders of his captain was in the line of duty. He held in another case that a man who, while returning to his command, stopped—against the orders of his captain—had supper, took some drinks, and then fell downstairs into a cellar and was injured—the Assistant Secretary held that this happened in the line of duty. When the present Administration came in various decisions of the last Administration were overruled; and in the case of James E. Harrison (7 Pension Decisions, 97, the decision being rendered December 22, 1893) the following was laid down as "line of duty":

While in performance of those things which the law requires of him as a military duty, the soldier is in the line of duty. [Attorney-General Cushing's decision, May, 1895.]

In cases involving the line of duty, the vital question is, Was it, the cause of disability, appurtenant to, dependent upon, or otherwise eventually connected with the claimant's duty as a soldier; or was the disability incurred while the soldier was acting in a personal matter independent of, or adverse to, his military duty? If the disability was incurred under the latter circumstances the soldier would not be pensionable as one in line of duty.

Now, according to this report, assuming that the purpose of this bill is to pension this lady because her son was killed in the line of duty, it is proposed in this case to revert back to the rule laid down by Assistant Secretary Busey, a rule which established not only a ridiculous but a dangerous precedent. The rule of the present Administration, on the contrary, has worked well and has been adopted by every Secretary, as I have shown, except in the last Administration, by Secretary Noble.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this report and this bill, let me say that this is one of the most meritorious cases that has been considered by the committee during this session, and I care not what rules have been laid down by the Department to the contrary.

I care not what decisions have been laid down by the officials connected with the Bureau, this is the last court of resort for a case of this character. This is the place for the final adjudication of the question. This unfortunate soldier was in the line of duty. His father—and this fact does not appear in the record, but the evidence is before the committee to sustain it—his father went to Jefferson City, obtained a furlough not only from the post commandant, but from the hospital authorities, and while taking his son home, who was sick with the measles and unable to perform military services at the time, both the father and son were murdered by the guerrillas who infested Missouri at that time in large numbers, and every support this poor woman had was completely wiped out and destroyed. These are the facts.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, this is an exceedingly brief report, and I would like to have the gentleman who made it further explain the matter as to whether this mother was dependent on the son for support at that time.

Mr. CROWTHER. Let me answer by stating that this remarkable administration of the Pension Office has decided that she was not dependent on the son because the son was murdered first, when the Department has no authority for any such decision.

Mr. ERDMAN. Now, I will have a word to say about this "remarkable administration" of which the gentleman speaks.

Then, the gentleman has concealed the fact in the report that his claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau.

Mr. CROWTHER. Of course; the bill could not have been here otherwise.

Mr. ERDMAN. The report is flagrantly defective in failing to contain the facts which should be set forth, in order that the House may act intelligently. It is about on a par with what occurred in a coordinate branch of the Government on yesterday, where seventy-odd cases in a very brief time—by the titles alone, I judge from the RECORD—were passed.

Mr. PICKLER. They are in favor of pensions over there. That is the difference between them and the gentleman.

Mr. ERDMAN. Yes, sir; they are, and the gentleman from South Dakota is. He is in favor of all kinds of pensions, with or without merit——

Mr. PICKLER. And you are not in favor of any.

Mr. ERDMAN (continuing). And I say probably for votes, as the gentleman from South Carolina states. I can not conceive of any other purpose than probably for the same reason that Indiana, Ohio, and Kansas are to-day full of pensioners, while my State, New York, and other States have had to stand back until doubtful States were properly taken care of.

Mr. HARDY. Your State is not doubtful, and has had its proportion.

Mr. ERDMAN. No, sir; not for the number of men she sent into the war.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Your State is only doubtful for the Democracy.

Mr. ERDMAN. When we get through with Ohio and Kansas and Indiana, when they give them their "share" and pension all of these people, then perhaps we may expect something at this end of the line.

Now, I was saying that in the coordinate branch of the Government on yesterday, probably——

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. ERDMAN. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Do not you know it to be true that there are thousands of old soldiers in Kansas not drawing pensions? If the gentleman does not know it and will examine the records he will find it to be true.

Let me say to him, further, that Kansas furnished more soldiers according to her population than any other State in the Union. [Applause.]

Mr. ERDMAN. And the three States I have named have more pensioners on the roll in proportion to the soldiers furnished than any other State in the Union.

Mr. CROWTHER. And so it would have been with the State of Pennsylvania if certain gentlemen who are now opposing pensions had gone to the war, as they ought to.

Mr. ERDMAN. The statement has been made before, in the Halls of Congress, and it was not contradicted, that it was done for political purposes.

Mr. HULICK. I understood the gentleman to say that in Ohio and some other States so many soldiers were placed upon the pension rolls for political purposes. Do you mean to assert that again as true?

Mr. ERDMAN. I mean to say the three States I have named have more soldiers on the rolls, as I have stated, and that I verily believe it was brought about for political purposes.

Mr. HULICK. My question is, do you say that the roll has been increased and the soldiers of Ohio pensioned for political purposes? Do you assert that?

Mr. HARDY. And the soldiers of Indiana?

Mr. ERDMAN. I have said, and I say again, that the rolls show in the past for the three States that I have named such a proportion that I verily believe it was brought about for political purposes.

Mr. PICKLER. That is old straw that has been thrashed out before.

Mr. LEWIS. How many soldiers have been put on the rolls for political purposes by this Administration?

Mr. ERDMAN. This Administration is not engaged in that——

Mr. HARDY. I want to ask how many soldiers has this Administration cut off the pension rolls? [Applause.]

Mr. ERDMAN. Well, if the gentleman had stayed longer in the Pension Bureau, he might perhaps have answered the question himself. [Laughter.] Now, gentlemen, a coordinate branch of the Government yesterday passed some seventy-odd bills, putting upon the rolls pensioners at $20 a month, $100 a month, $75, $50, $30, $17, $25, $50, $40——

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman answer a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. ERDMAN. Yes, certainly.

Mr. CROWTHER. What has that got to do with the present bill?

Mr. ERDMAN. I will tell the gentleman before I get through what it has to do with it. Pensions were granted at $25 a month, $30 a month, $8 a month, $16 a month, $50 a month, $8 a month, $17, $12, $12, $50, $75, $30, $100, $75, $40, $8, $25, $17, $50, $75, $20, $12, $8, $50, $30, $50, $30, $12, $50, $50, $15, $12, $30——

Mr. ELLIS. Is this an auction?

Mr. ERDMAN (continuing). Seventy-two dollars, $30, $12, $12, $30, $12——

Mr. HARDY. And a half. [Laughter.]

Mr. ERDMAN (continuing). Twelve dollars, $50, $20, $17, $15, $40, $12, $12, $12, $50, $8——

A MEMBER. Going, going, gone. [Laughter.]

Mr. ERDMAN. Twenty dollars, $17, $8, and six more cases where the dollars are not stated.

A MEMBER. Last call.

Mr. ERDMAN. Now, gentlemen, is not that a record that we are likely to follow now? How do the soldiers who get $6, $8, $10, and $12 a month like that? What do they say to you? Do they say it is right? They tell me not. Do you say it is right?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. ERDMAN. They are not saying that it is right.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman votes for the highest general's pensions of any man on our committee, always?

Mr. ERDMAN. I did; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who introduced the bill, promised to tell the House why I reported that bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Because I could not vote you down, for one.

Mr. ERDMAN. And the gentleman, if he is in the House, I presume, will tell you why I reported that bill favorably. It is known to almost all, but I want to call your attention——

Mr. PICKLER. I was not talking about any particular bill. Now, if the gentleman will yield, is it not a fact, as the gentleman has gone into that subject——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. ERDMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. Is it not a fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania insists on large pensions being given for rank in our committee, and against my objection, too? Is it not a fact that the gentleman, who so frequently criticises this House, does that?

Mr. ERDMAN. I want to say this——

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. You have not answered the question yet.

Mr. ERDMAN. I am in favor of doing justice to the officer as well as to the soldier, and I am in favor of doing justice to the widow as well as to the soldier, and to the orphan, too; and as to the large pensions that we have reported, a number of bills for officers above the rank of lieutenant-colonel, I say it is legitimate that we should report them, because the general law makes no distinction over and above the grade of lieutenant-colonel, and it is right and proper that we should, by private bills, take care of the rank and services of officers.

Now, gentlemen, what I complain of is that this report does not set forth sufficient facts for you to act intelligently on; and I say to you that it is the purpose of the committee of which I am a member to make these reports briefer and briefer—I want to call the attention of the House to it—and you demand more information, so that you may act intelligently and with reason upon these bills as they come up before you. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLOTTE WEIRER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2689) granting a pension to Charlotte Weirer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charlotte Weirer, widow of Antonio Weirer, late of Company E, Second Regiment United States Artillery, and pay her a pension of $24 per month.

The report (by Mr. CROWTHER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2689) to pension Charlotte Weirer, having considered the same, respectfully submit the following report:

The evidence before the committee demonstrates that the claimant, Charlotte Weirer, is the widow of Antonio Weirer, late a sergeant of Company E, Second Regiment United States Artillery, who served in the Army for a period of fifteen years; that his widow is now drawing a pension of $8 per month; that her physician's affidavit on file with the committee shows that the claimant is now over 70 years of age; that by reason of her extreme age her physical condition has degenerated into senile debility, she being wholly unable to attend to her personal necessities; that she is wholly dependent, and has neither kith nor kin upon whom she can rely for assistance, and that she is required to have assistance most of the time.

In view of these unfortunate surroundings and conditions, your committee are of the opinion that the bill should pass, with the following amendment:

Strike out the word "twenty" and insert the word "twelve" and insert after the word "month" the words "in lieu of all pension granted."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill as amended, be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, you will observe that this is a bill where we propose to take care of a necessitous widow. She is getting $8 a month, the same as all other widows get, but you intend to give her $12 because she is old, because she is dependent, and because she is suffering from senility. Does it not strike you as fair that you should take care of all and not single out one of them? Shall we adopt it as a rule that anyone who can get up here and establish her claim in this way shall be given $12 a month? If she is of a class that is entitled to more than $8 a month, she ought to have it.

Mr. PICKLER. Are you objecting to this old woman, who is 70 years of age, getting $12 a month?

Mr. ERDMAN. I am opposed to any——

Mr. PICKLER. Are you opposed to a helpless old woman of 70 getting $12 a month?

Mr. ERDMAN (continuing). I am opposed to any woman who does not prove that she is entitled to more than all the others are paid getting any more. My judgment is they are not entitled to it. And does the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions say that we will lay down that as a rule hereafter?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir; I would be willing to give every woman who has attained the age of 70 years, and who is the mother or widow of a good soldier and has nothing to live on, $12 a month. [Applause.]

Mr. ERDMAN. Why do you not introduce a bill to that effect?

Mr. HARDY. Will you vote for it?

Mr. PICKLER. Why do you not introduce a bill to that effect yourself?

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a question?

Mr. ERDMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. We have passed two bills for major-generals' widows, one at $75 and one at $100 a month.

Mr. ERDMAN. One at $100 and one at $50.

Mr. HULL. One rear-admiral's widow at $50, or a rear-admiral's daughter also at $50. Now, the ranks there were the same. I did not hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania raise any particular objection to them on the ground that they were different degrees of pension. Why does he not make a uniform pension for the widows of major-generals?

Mr. ERDMAN. If I thought I could get a majority of this House to support it I would.

Mr. HULL. There is no doubt you could if you did not make it too high.

Mr. ERDMAN. I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa that had the gentleman from Pennsylvania who introduced the bill for General Doubleday's widow explained that bill, as he said he would, it would not be brought up in judgment against me every time I rise upon this floor. That lady was pensioned in her own right, and in the right of the memory of her husband.

Mr. HULL. I would like to ask the gentleman if it was necessary to have it explained, why did he not explain it. He had the floor.

Mr. ERDMAN. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] was going to explain it, or else I should have done so. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. H. J. KIERNAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 468) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. H. J. Kiernan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. H. J. Kiernan, widow of the late Gen. James L. Kiernan, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of a pension which she is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. MCCLELLAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 468) granting an increase of pension to $50 per month to Mrs. H. J. Kiernan, widow of the late Gen. James L. Kiernan, in lieu of her present pension, beg leave to submit the following:

Gen. James L. Kiernan was born in New York City in 1837, and graduated from the medical department of the University of New York in 1857.

He entered the service as assistant surgeon of the Sixty-ninth New York Infantry. A few months subsequently he was transferred to the Fifth Kentucky. He was a volunteer in the First Missouri Cavalry, and was in the lead in pursuit of Price into Arkansas. For brave conduct during the Pea Ridge campaign he was promoted to major of Sixth Missouri Cavalry.

In one of the skirmishes in which he was engaged he was wounded in the shoulder. Suffering from wound and injuries he was borne to a hospital in the town, which was entered by a detachment of the enemy's cavalry. He laid in bed, disabled and in pain, but declined to be paroled. While in bed he overheard a conversation between a Confederate officer and a friend, the substance of which was that a large force of cavalry and artillery was about to concentrate in the town and make a sudden attack upon a large supply train which was about to leave Grand Gulf the following night for Grant's army. Major Kiernan dressed as quickly as possible, and by the help of a negro made his way through the pickets and reached Bayou Pierre, where, launching a log, he paddled across to Grand Gulf, a distance of 8 miles. The timely information saved the train.

On August 1, 1863, he was appointed brigadier-general by President Lincoln, upon the written request of Generals Grant, Logan, Schofield, McPherson, and 14 other generals, and also colonels and 4 governors of States. He served with distinction until the close of the war. He was wounded six times, once through the lungs, and from that he suffered continually, and his death on November 27, 1869, was directly attributable to this wound.

The following is a copy of his recommendation for promotion as brigadier-general:

"MILLIKENS BEND, LA., April 13, 1863.

"The undersigned officers of the United States Army would most respectfully recommend Maj. James L. Kiernan to His Excellency the President of the United States for promotion. After having been surgeon in the Army for two years, performed the most varied and active service, and did his duty with activity and zeal, he is about to retire from the medical department in order to enter the line. We respectfully trust that the President, taking into consideration his services and our recommendation, will consider his case favorably.

"U. S. Grant, major-general; Frank P. Blair, major-general of volunteers; John A. McClernand, major-general, commanding; Alvin P. Hovey, brigadier-general, commanding Twelfth Division; S. A. Hurlbut, major-general; J. M. Schofield, major-general; Maj. John F Hartranft; John C. Sullivan, brigadier-general; P. Jos. Osterhaus, brigadier-general, United States Volunteers; John A. Logan, major-general; Jas. B. McPherson, major-general; A. J. Smith, brigadier-general; S. G. Burbridge, brigadier-general; W. P. Benton, brigadier-general of volunteers; T. F. Quimby, brigadier-general; E. B. Brown, brigadier-general; David Shunk, colonel Eighth Indiana Infantry; H. D. Washburn, colonel Eighteenth Indiana Volunteers; Richd. Owen, colonel Sixtieth Indiana Volunteers; Wm. S. Hillyer, colonel and provost-marshal-general, Department of the Tennessee; Wm. T. Hall, colonel Eleventh Iowa, commanding Third Brigade, Sixth Division; Clark Wright, colonel Sixth Cavalry Missouri Volunteers; W. J. Landrum, colonel Nineteenth Kentucky, commanding Second Brigade, Tenth Division, Third Army Corps; Grantham I. Taggart, lieutenant-colonel and C. P.; Davis W. Cheek, captain Thirteenth Regiment Infantry."

In view of the meritorious services of this gallant officer, we earnestly recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I make the same objection to this bill that I did to the two other bills we took action on before. I see no reason why the pension of this officer's widow should be raised to $30 by this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. HEMENWAY. One question I would like to ask is, what property has this lady?

Mr. FISCHER. She has none. She has to depend upon her own resources to earn a livelihood.

The question was taken on ordering the bill to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 2.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum. [After counting.] One hundred and eleven gentlemen are in the Hall. On this question the ayes are 86, the noes are 2; the motion is agreed to, and the bill is laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. CATHERINE GAFFNEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4475) granting a pension to Mrs. Catherine Gaffney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll of the United States the name of Catherine Gaffney, widow of Michael Gaffney, formerly of Company I, Second Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month during her life.

The report (by Mr. KERR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4475) granting a pension to Mrs. Catherine Gaffney, would respectfully report:

Your committee have examined the facts in connection with this claim, and report in favor of the passage of the bill. The facts disclosed are somewhat remarkable. The claimant, while yet a minor, about the year 1846 married one Thomas Madigan. He was intemperate in his habits, and occasionally left home, always returning, however, after a brief interval. They were married near Buffalo, N. Y. In the year 1852 he left for Cleveland. Soon afterwards she heard from relatives at Cleveland that he had been accidentally killed while loading a vessel. Madigan has never returned to her since that time, and neither she nor any of her kindred have ever heard from him. A diligent search of the city directories of Cleveland and Buffalo fails to disclose his presence in either of those cities after the year when the report of his death was received. Later, about the year 1858, she married one Cornelius Sullivan, who enlisted in the Army at the beginning of the war and was killed in battle in the year 1862. As the widow of Sullivan she applied for and obtained a pension, and also a pension as guardian of each of two minor children who have since died.

On November 4, 1864, she married Michael Gaffney, at Buffalo, N. Y., a soldier in the war, who lived with her until October, 1885, when he died at Cleveland. The evidence discloses that his death was caused by a hemorrhage, which, according to the evidence, was contracted in the service. Her marriage to Gaffney, his military service, his death from a cause resulting from his military service, all appear to be clearly proven by the evidence, but her claim has been rejected at the Pension Office on the ground that there is no adequate proof that her first husband, Thomas Madigan, who disappeared in 1852, is dead.

Other circumstances are brought to our attention, namely, that she is now nearly 70 years of age, lives in two rooms scantily furnished, with one child, who is a cripple, supports herself as a washerwoman, and notwithstanding the difficulties of her situation bears a most excellent reputation among her neighbors for industry and moral character.

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who is unavoidably absent this evening, and through courtesy to him as well as justice to the beneficiary of this bill, I cheerfully assume the burden of stating the facts. The case is a very plain one, a very simple one, and a very just one. This lady married a man by the name of Madigan in 1846 or thereabouts. He was an intemperate, worthless sort of fellow——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Is there any reason why this lady can not get a pension at the Pension Office under the law as it now stands?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. What is it, please?

Mr. LAYTON. Her claim was rejected there because there was no satisfactory proof of the death of her first husband.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Is not the gentleman aware that Congress has passed a law which provides for the presumption of death in such cases, so that that objection can no longer be raised?

A MEMBER. That does not apply to the case of a previous husband.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. She is now eligible for pension by renewing her application at the Pension Office, and I suggest to the gentleman that it may be to her advantage to pursue that course, because the application being renewed now, the pension when granted, will date back and she will get a higher pension. Therefore, in the interest of the very person whom he is trying to serve, I suggest to the gentleman that he give that point some consideration, and let this bill go over at least for one week.

Mr. LAYTON. I will say to the gentleman that I have no personal interest in this case. It is not my case; it is the case of my colleague from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ERDMAN. If the gentleman from Ohio has information on the subject, I would like him to explain how it came that this claimant filed her original claim July 14, 1886, alleging that the soldier died in October, 1885, from rheumatism contracted in the service?

Mr. LAYTON. I presume that is all correct.

Mr. ERDMAN. The soldier was killed, was he not?

Mr. LAYTON. She married three times, and two of the husbands were soldiers. The first one, Sullivan, enlisted at the beginning of the war, and was killed in battle in 1862. She married the second soldier, Gaffney, in 1864. He died some time in 1885 from disease contracted in the service, and her claim for pension as his widow was rejected by the Pension Office, as I was about to state when interrupted, by reason of the fact that no satisfactory proof was furnished of the death of her first husband, to whom she was married about 1846, and who deserted her in 1852 and was never heard of afterwards.

Mr. ERDMAN. Can the gentleman explain this? She alleged a prior marriage to one Sullivan, a soldier in Company E, One hundred and sixteenth Regiment New York Infantry, and was pensioned as Sullivan's widow in her own right, and also (after remarriage, October 30, 1864, to Gaffney, alias Kelly) as the guardian of the minor children of Sullivan.

Mr. LAYTON. Yes, sir; she had two children by Mr. Sullivan who have since died.

Mr. ERDMAN. The claim was submitted to a special examination to ascertain if possible the identity of the soldier, alias Kelly, as the husband of claimant, Gaffney, and this fact is fairly established. Is that true?

Mr. LAYTON. I am not familiar with the facts except so far as they are set out in the report.

Mr. ERDMAN. This woman married a second time without waiting seven years for the presumption of the death of her first husband to arise.

Mr. LAYTON. That is true. It was only about six years after the death of her first husband when she married again.

Mr. ERDMAN. And you are now asking this House to say that six years is good enough?

Mr. LAYTON. No, sir. I am asking this House to say that about forty-four years are good enough. Her first husband disappeared in 1852, and has never been heard of since.

Mr. ERDMAN. Yes; but she remarried in less than seven years after his disappearance.

Mr. LAYTON. Yes; in about six years. I see that my colleague from Ohio [Mr. KERR] who made the report is present. If I had noticed his presence sooner, I would have asked him to explain the case more fully than I can do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. EMILY M. VAN DERVEER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2143) granting a pension to Mrs. Emily M. Van Derveer, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Ferdinand Van Derveer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll of the United States the name of Mrs. Emily M. Van Derveer, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Ferdinand Van Derveer, at the rate of $100 per month.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out "one hundred" in the seventh line of the bill and insert "seventy-five," so as to make the pension $75 a month.

The report (by Mr. LAYTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2143) granting a pension to Mrs. Emily M. Van Derveer, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Ferdinand Van Derveer, having carefully considered the same, submit the following report:

It is shown by the report of the Record and Pension Office that Ferdinand Van Derveer (the deceased husband of the beneficiary of this bill) was enrolled May 21, 1846, and mustered into service June 26, 1846, as first sergeant, Company I, First Ohio Volunteers, Mexican war, to serve one year. He is reported on the muster rolls of the company, present; elected first lieutenant September 2, 1846, and captain October 5, 1846. He was mustered out with the company as captain June 12, 1847.

Ferdinand Van Derveer was mustered into service September 24, 1861, as colonel of the Thirty-fifth Ohio Infantry Volunteers, to serve three years. He is reported as present with the regiment on January 28, 1863; from that date to August 31, 1863, in command of the Third Brigade, Third Division, Fourteenth Army Corps; and thereafter, on June 28, 1864, in command of the Second Brigade, Third Division, Fourteenth Army Corps. After June 28, 1864, he is reported absent in Ohio on sick leave. He was mustered out of service, as colonel of the above-named regiment, August 26, 1864.

Ferdinand Van Derveer was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers October 4, 1864, with rank from the same date, and accepted the appointment November 29, 1864. He was assigned to the Department of the Cumberland January 13, 1865; was ordered on duty in the Fourth Army Corps, January 21, 1865; was assigned to the Second Brigade, Second Division, Fourth Army Corps, February 8, 1865; and continued on duty in command of said brigade until June 14, 1865, when he was ordered to Hamilton, Ohio, to await action on his resignation. His resignation was accepted and he honorably discharged the service to date June 15, 1865, in special orders from this Department dated June 16, 1865.

The report from the Bureau of Pensions shows that General Van Derveer died November 5, 1892; that he drew $8 per month for services in the Mexican war (service pension), but never received or applied for any pension during his lifetime for service in the war of the rebellion; that he was married to the beneficiary December 14, 1848; that she, as his widow, is now receiving a pension of but $8 per month under the act of January 29, 1887, dating from November 6, 1892.

The sworn testimony of a reputable physician, who was intimately acquainted with General Van Derveer during the last forty-five years of his life, shows "that his disease and death was the direct result of his army service."

Other testimony presented to your committee shows that Mrs. Van Derveer is now about 67 years of age; that she has no income whatever except the pension she is now receiving; that she has no property whatever except an old homestead in the city of Hamilton, Ohio, which is encumbered and will soon be sold at forfeited-land sale for delinquent taxes unless this relief is afforded her by Congress.

The military services of General Van Derveer in both the Mexican war and the war of the rebellion were exceptionally gallant, meritorious, and valuable. In Gen. George H. Thomas's report of the battle of Chickamauga (the battle in which General Van Derveer won his star) he very highly commends the courage, valor, and the distinguished services of General Van Derveer during that long and bloody battle.

History of Ohio in the War furnishes many other instances of his courage and valor during the war.

For the foregoing reasons, and in accordance with many precedents, your committee recommend the passage of this bill with the following amendment:

Strike out "one hundred," in the seventh line thereof, and insert "seventy-five"; so as to allow her $75 per month.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have been coming to these meetings with a considerable degree of regularity for the purpose of aiding in making a quorum to enact legislation pensioning Federal soldiers and their widows who have been unable to obtain pensions at the Department under the general laws. I have sat here to-night, Mr. Chairman, and have found that two-thirds of these bills which have been passed have been to increase the pensions of officers of the recent war all the way from fifty to one hundred dollars a month. I have observed that but two or three bills for the relief of private soldiers or their widows have been presented to the Committee of the Whole; and I have observed that each time when such a bill carried a larger sum than $12 a month, the rate allowed by law, the Committee on Invalid Pensions has with remarkable regularity reduced the pension to the $12 limit; but in each case where the beneficiary was an officer or an officer's widow there has been an increase of from twenty to seventy dollars a month above the amount allowed by law.

Now, I yield to no man on this floor, or off of it, in my conviction that this Government ought to take care of those that are entitled to pensions; that it ought to take care of the old soldier and his widow and his children, where they are dependent. I will go as far as any gentleman for the purpose of attaining that object; but in justice to myself, and in justice to the constituency I represent—and there are a great number of private soldiers and their widows and children in my district—I can not sit here longer without entering my protest against the course we are pursuing in our pension legislation at these Friday night sessions.

I have no doubt that the beneficiary named in this bill is an excellent lady. I have no doubt that the widow of General Doubleday is an excellent lady. I have no doubt that she went with her gallant husband through the late war; that she stood guard; that she did picket duty; that she was brave and loyal; but, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we must not forget the many thousands of soldiers' widows all over this broad land who stayed at their homes through long and dreary days, maintaining their children and themselves, while their husbands were away, and doing this with a degree of courage and fortitude that was unexcelled by the wife of any general who may have taken part in the conflict.

Mr. PICKLER. I suppose the gentleman does not intend to misrepresent the facts or the committee.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. No, sir; and I want to say——

Mr. PICKLER Let me show you where you have done so.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. One moment right here.

Mr. PICKLER. You have stated what is untrue. That is what you have done.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I say I have not stated an untruth on this floor.

Mr. PICKLER. I say you have.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I say to you that every bill brought here to-night except one or two has been to increase the pensions of the widows of officers.

Mr. PICKLER. That is not true. No such bill has been brought here. The statement shows the gentleman's ignorance of the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is out of order.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I shall not call upon my friend from South Dakota for information, since I can find it in the reports.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman had better inform himself from some source.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is not in order.

Mr. PICKLER. So I understand the Chair to say.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, and I do not offer this as an apology to the gentleman from South Dakota——

Mr. PICKLER. I do not want any apology.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. But I want to explain this matter for my own satisfaction, so that the House may understand what I intended to say. It was not my purpose to criticise unjustly the Invalid Pensions Committee, nor do I do so now. But I have called the attention of this Committee of the Whole to the peculiar condition of facts presented by this Calendar. I do not attempt to say, nor do I wish to be so understood, that the committee has purposely arranged this condition of affairs. I would not be so unjust as to say that. But I was only pointing out the peculiar condition of affairs presenting themselves here. And for one, representing my constituents, whom I said were among those that fought in the ranks, I must protest against giving the widow of every colonel or general from $50 to $100 a month, while the widow of the private soldier can not be allowed to have more than $12 a month.

Mr. PICKLER. In that position I agree with you.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. That is all I have attempted to say. That is all I say now. If the gentleman thinks I have made any reflections upon his committee it has been because my remarks have been misunderstood, not because I intended to do so, because I agree with the gentleman at the head of the Invalid Pensions Committee. I believe in taking care of the widows of private soldiers and also of the officers; but I do not believe in giving to the widows of colonels and generals whatever they may ask—pensions of from $50 to $100 a month—while the widow of the private soldier is compelled to receive the pittance of $12 a month, without regard to her pitiable condition and her surroundings.

Mr. PICKLER. What I complain of the gentleman from Tennessee about is what the gentleman claims to give as the facts in connection with the action of the committee. He says that the Committee on Invalid Pensions, with equal regularity, have cut down the pension of every soldier's widow to the lowest possible notch, when the record shows to-night that the three pensions granted to widows of soldiers are fixed by the committee at sums that they could not possibly have received from the Department, because there was no law by which they could receive any amount there. The gentleman, therefore, I claim is unfair to the committee, and it is not right to make a statement of that kind which the facts do not warrant.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to keep myself entirely within the facts. If I have made a statement which is not correct, the RECORD will show it. What I was trying to show was that this committee—not the Committee on Invalid Pensions, but the Committee of the Whole House—has agreed to each amendment offered to-night to reduce the pension of a private soldier, or of the widow of the private soldier, from twenty, or twenty-four dollars in one case, to twelve dollars a month, while each of the bills presented to give to the widow of an officer a pension of from $45 to $60 per month more than they are entitled to receive, with a surprising degree of regularity has been acted upon and agreed to. It is this committee, not the committee over which the gentleman from South Dakota presides, to which I was referring.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I would like, with the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions this question——

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know whether I can answer the gentleman's question in the time of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I will yield in a few moments.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I would like to ask it just in this connection.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Very well; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I notice here that the pension recommended for Catherine Gaffney is $12 a month. That is the pension she would get under the law if her case were proven in the Pension Office. I notice also that all of the claims presented of this class are recommended at just the amount the law would allow. Now, I ask the gentleman in charge of the Pension Committee, with reference to Calendar number 159, which is reported at $75 a month, is that the pension that she would be granted if she could make out her case at the office?

Mr. PICKLER. Whose claim is that?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The claim of Mrs. Helen Morrell Carroll, which is reported from the committee at $75.

Mr. PICKLER. I will answer in my own time.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from South Dakota can answer in my time. The gentleman from Tennessee has yielded to me. I ask him if that would be the pension to which she would be entitled?

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that there is no pension of that rank.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then, again, is $75 the amount of the pension that the widow of General Doubleday would receive if her case were allowed in the office?

Mr. PICKLER. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then take the next case, reported at $50, the case of Mrs. Fairfax. Is that the pension that she would be entitled to receive under the law if her case were allowed in the office? And the other two cases—Calendar numbers 165 and 167—what about them?

Mr. PICKLER. I suppose the gentleman understands the pension laws——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Because I want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman intimated that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McCALL] lied when he spoke about the way pensions were reported from this committee. The gentleman from South Dakota said he was not informed as to the pension laws. But the gentleman himself demonstrates the fact that he is not informed, because in these five cases he recommends a larger amount than the law would allow in the case of officers' widows, when in the only case of a widow of a private soldier the committee recommends exactly what the law allows and no more.

Mr. PICKLER. No, sir; the law does not allow anything. The gentleman does not understand this question.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And we are asked here to indorse the action of this committee.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I must decline to yield any further.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, the gentleman does not want his question answered, I suppose.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. The gentleman can answer any question he pleases after I conclude.

I wish to say that it was not my purpose to misrepresent facts; but when you get to the bottom and examine this Calendar you will see that I was somewhere in the neighborhood of being correct in my statement as to what we are doing here.

Now, what are we doing? I have sat here Friday night after Friday night for the purpose of aiding pension legislation, keeping as quiet as I could, and endeavoring to secure the passage of these bills by my presence. When the last case reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN], the bill H. R. 468, was considered, if that had been the last one of this kind I would have kept quiet. But I find the second bill from that, the one that is now under consideration, grants an increase of pension to Mrs. Van Derveer, and if you take this Calendar that condition exists in connection with these claims right through I do not know in how many cases.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we are to come here Friday night after Friday night to increase the pensions of these ladies who are already getting $30 a month, to give them fifty, seventy-five, or a hundred dollars a month, I for one propose not to come again. But if you come here to pension the widows of the poor soldiers, those who went to the front, those who fought in the ranks, and to pension their widows who stayed at home and nursed the baby, took care of the minors in their poverty and distress, and whose condition of want is augmented now by the approach of old age, I am ready to come here every Friday night and give my aid to procure relief for them, the relief that they are entitled to under these bills and so much need.

That is all I have to say upon this question.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, this is the same old straw we have to thrash over every evening. Now, when gentlemen complain of the widows of generals having consideration in this committee they simply complain of themselves. Those bills come before the Committee on Invalid Pensions for action, and we take action thereon. I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McCALL] to a large extent. I believe that there is growing up an impression that too much difference is made between generals' widows and the widows of private soldiers, and I say for myself individually that there are few generals' widows for whom I would go above $30, and there is only an exceptional one—one out of a hundred—for whom I would go beyond $50 for any general's widow. I am speaking now of my own individual impressions and belief.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. So was I a little while ago.

Mr. PICKLER. These bills come from the committee and come before the House for action. Now, the gentleman from Tennessee, when I complained of his being unfair to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, had said he observed that the Committee on Invalid Pensions cut down the bills for the widows of private soldiers to the lowest possible amount. Now, does the gentleman realize the fact that we take these bills for the widows of privates in the same way that we take these other bills? You introduce the bills. Each member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is a subcommittee; and they take up the bills which you urge them to take up. You bring these bills before the committee. The committee do not introduce the bills. We take the bills which individual members introduce.

Now, these bills for the benefit of the widows of privates that we have passed to-night are bills for the relief of widows who are entitled to nothing under the pension laws. Contrary to the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McCALL] and contrary to the statement of the gentleman on my left [Mr. HEMENWAY], these widows of privates, for whom these bills were passed, are entitled to nothing under the general law. They can get nothing in the Pension Office.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. PICKLER. No; I will not.
Mr. HEMENWAY. You dare not.
Mr. PICKLER. You purposely misrepresented facts. You do not want any explanation.
Mr. HEMENWAY. You dare not permit a question.
Mr. PICKLER. You do not want any information. You want to try to make the RECORD misrepresent the facts.
Mr. HEMENWAY. You let me have a minute and I will make a record that will represent the facts.
Mr. PICKLER. There is one thing I want to say, and that is, while I am in favor of some difference on account of rank, and while the law has always made some difference in rank, yet for my individual self I am opposed to as much difference as appears on some of these bills. It is against my personal objection, but the majority of the committee say otherwise, and we always bow to the majority.

Mr. Chairman, there is one thing to be said, however, in favor of these widows of officers and in favor of these officers' pensions. When the law was passed making the total pension of a private soldier $8 a month, a lieutenant-colonel was given $30 a month. Above the grade of lieutenant-colonel there was no higher amount. Everything above that was put in at the same figure, and we never have had a grade, in direct terms, for colonel, or brigadier-general, or major-general, under the law. There is nothing there yet.

Now, while the pension of the private has been increased from $8 to $18 and $30, while a private who is totally incapacitated to perform manual labor can draw $30 instead of $8, as formerly, under the general statute, a lieutenant-colonel's widow or a general's widow has never had her pension increased one dollar under general law. There is the difference. Whereas the private soldier's pension has been increased nearly fourfold—four times $8 would be $32—if you were to multiply the $30 that a general's widow gets, four times $30 would be $120. That would be the amount to which she would be entitled if an increase had been made in the same ratio as that which we have given to the private. So I say it is not fair to come here and say that such great things are being done for the generals and such small things for the privates. I do not believe in that kind of an advance. I believe that $30 a month is a good pension, and, as I say, there is not one case in a thousand in which I would go over $50 as far as I individually am concerned.

I agree with much that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCCALL] has said. I do not want to see this pension roll increased by large pensions for generals' widows. I want to see the pension roll kept within bounds, in order that the thousands of old soldiers and their widows who are not yet drawing a dollar of pensions may be placed on the rolls.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.
The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. PAYNE having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HEPBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bills H. R. 2602, 3007, 3112, 3932, and 2689, and had instructed him to report the same with amendments and with the recommendation that as amended they do pass; also that the committee had had under consideration the bills H. R. 483, S. 1203, H. R. 486 and 4475, and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that they do pass.

MARY DOUBLEDAY.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (S. 1230) granting an increase of pension to Mary Doubleday, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Abner Doubleday.
The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPHINE FOOTE FAIRFAX.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 3112) granting a pension to Josephine Foote Fairfax, with an amendment.
The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.
The question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.
Mr. TALBERT. Division, Mr. Speaker.
The House divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 1.
Mr. TALBERT. No quorum.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point that there is no quorum. The hour of 10.30 o'clock having arrived, under the rule the Chair declares the House stands adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 11, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, on page 3833, in my remarks on the filled-cheese bill, when I was discussing the question of the penalty of $500, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] I understood asked me, "Who paid the penalty?" and asked if the consumer paid it. I replied that the man who violated the law paid it. In the RECORD it is, "Who pays the tax under this bill?" I simply want to state that I thought he said, "Who pays the penalty?" If I had understood his question to be "Who paid the tax?" my answer would have been, "The consumer."

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is hardly a correction of the RECORD.

Mr. OTEY. It is in the RECORD that he said "tax." I thought he said "penalty." Certainly my answer to his question, "Who paid the tax?" would have been "The consumer."

IMPROVEMENT OF NEBRASKA SIDE OF MISSOURI RIVER AT SIOUX CITY.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate joint resolution 123, directing the Secretary of War to submit a plan and estimate for the improvement of the Nebraska side of the Missouri River opposite Sioux City, Iowa.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause to be prepared and submit a plan and estimate for the improvement of the Nebraska side of the Missouri River opposite Sioux City, Iowa, in accordance with the report of Capt. H. F. Hodges, Corps of Engineers, dated November 16, 1894, and printed in House Executive Document No. 48, Fifty-third Congress, third session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MEIKLEJOHN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

SURVEY OF WATERWAY CONNECTING WATERS OF PUGET SOUND AND SALMON BAY WITH LAKES UNION AND WASHINGTON.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to ask consideration of a Senate joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S. R. 104) directing the Secretary of War to transmit to Congress a report on survey of the waterway connecting the waters of Puget Sound, at Salmon Bay, with Lakes Union and Washington, and to submit an estimate of the cost of constructing said waterway.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to Congress the report of Capt. Thomas W. Symons, Corps of Engineers, dated August 29, 1895, together with the accompanying report of the assistant engineer, upon the survey of the waterway connecting the waters of Puget Sound, at Salmon Bay, with Lakes Union and Washington; also to submit an estimate of the cost of constructing the said waterway on the route described and laid down in the aforesaid report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. CANNON. I would like to know what it means. I would like some little explanation. That does not convey any information to me.

Mr. HERMANN. The information which is now in the hands of the Secretary of War recently reached him from the regular engineer. Previous to the consideration of the river and harbor bill by the House and the committee that information was not at that time in the hands of the Secretary of War. It is now there. The Senate committee has to consider this matter. It is unable to obtain the information, because of a rule or statute which we have prohibiting the Secretary of War to furnish any information of this character to Congress unless Congress shall demand it through a joint resolution.

Mr. CANNON. Where is this waterway?

Mr. HERMANN. It is in the State of Washington.

Mr. CANNON. It has not been received in time to get in the river and harbor bill this time?

Mr. HERMANN. It did not reach the Secretary of War in time to be considered.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me something ought to be left for the next session of Congress. I object.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8008) defining cheese, and also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of filled cheese.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HULL in the chair.

Mr. CANNON. I want to submit a suggestion to the gentleman from Ohio. I think we can pass the fortifications bill inside of an hour and a half, and several of us have thought that the best way would be for the gentleman from Ohio to yield and let the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] who has charge of the bill call it up and have it disposed of by the House, and I appeal to my friend from Ohio to let us do that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The trouble is, Mr. Speaker, that I shall not be here at all next week. I think we can pass the pending bill in an hour's time. Now, let us try it and see.

Mr. CANNON. The point is, that a proposition to tax a product which will not yield a great amount of revenue seems to be not so important as a proposition to defend the country in these times of rumors of war.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let us try and see whether we can not dispose of the pending bill in a short time.

Mr. CANNON. Well, if the gentleman will not accept my suggestion now I will appeal to him later.

FILLED CHEESE.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the bill (H. R. 8008) defining cheese, and also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of "filled cheese." The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw that amendment and offer another. I move to strike out the word "four," in line 2, and insert the word "one." I offer this amendment with modesty and hesitation, and I want to ask my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], as he and I do not disagree about what it is desirable to do by legislation in the premises, if he does not see his way clear to accept the amendment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that there may seem to be a strong reason in the mind of any person who takes a casual view of this question why this amendment should be adopted, but we carefully considered the whole subject in committee. There was present a very able and distinguished member of the committee who favored, I think, the exact provision which the gentleman from Illinois now proposes, and the committee felt, and further consideration of the subject has strengthened my own opinion, that the manufacturer of this article and the wholesale dealer are taxed low enough in the bill as it stands. We have reduced the tax upon the oleomargarine manufacture 33⅓ per cent, and we have made a greater reduction in the tax upon the wholesale dealer. When we come to the retailer there may be some concession agreed to by the committee; but the manufacture of this product naturally concentrates and gets into fewer hands as improved processes covered by patents developed the perfection (if that term may be applied to it) of this manufacture. We are told that already there are 30 factories held and controlled by a single proprietor—a corporation, I suppose; I do not know—and we believe that the business can be better regulated by a tax of not less than $400 upon the manufacturer and $250 on the wholesale dealer than by any reduced rates. If you put this tax at $100 you will find that the revenue department will run in debt rather than derive any revenue from the business, and while I know that the gentleman from Illinois is sincere, I think his amendment had better be voted down.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman now to yield me five minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the committee for five minutes. This is a revenue bill; revenue, however, not being the primary object of the bill. It is necessary, in order that Congress may regulate the making of filled cheese and prevent its being passed off as genuine cheese, that it should exercise the revenue power. I have no quarrel with that. I do not believe in counterfeits anywhere—counterfeit men, counterfeit money, or counterfeit products. I think that each entity upon the Lord's footstool should stand upon its own merits. And when I say that I say it in defense of the principle of this bill, and I say it also as the basis of an attack upon extreme provisions in the bill.

Now, what is the trouble? We have an industry in this country—the dairy industry—which makes cheese. It is a laudable industry. It is supported by the people of this country. But there is another industry which makes so-called filled cheese. That product is made, as they tell us, by using neutral lard and milk that has the butter element taken out of it. It is not claimed that this is not a laudable industry. It, also, is one that the people of this country have a right to engage in—just as much right as the dairyman has to engage in his industry. But it is claimed that filled cheese is made to look like real cheese and is sold and imposed upon the public as such, thus unduly discriminating against the makers of cheese proper. They are both laudable and legitimate industries. The object of this proposed taxation is primarily to make certain that the consumer shall know what he gets and that one industry shall not be dishonestly competed with by the other. That is the whole matter, as I understand it, in a nutshell. I am for it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to make him a suggestion in the line of his discussion at this point?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the gentleman will find on examination that the dealer in oleomargarine will pay a certain tax, and then that the same dealer will be compelled to pay this tax in addition, so that there will be a double tax on him for the two articles in which he deals.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to state another thing. I am not in harmony with any suggestion from anybody about anything that, within our borders, will tax any citizen engaged in a lawful industry for the benefit of some other citizen engaged in a competing industry. I am a protectionist, but I am a protectionist of our own people against the balance of the world. I am a protectionist for the benefit of our own people. I am not such a protectionist that I would tax my colleague from Illinois for the benefit of my colleague from Iowa. So I am not in harmony with the doctrine of protection as it is brought in here, improperly and illogically, in favor of this proposed tax.

Now, what are the facts? Take the twin product of oleomargarine. We taxed that 2 cents a pound some years ago; and we provided considerable license fees for the manufacturers and dealers. What is the result? The result is that revenue to the amount of ten million and a half of dollars has been collected from oleomargarine. Last year there were 57,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine made in this country. What is it made from? Tallow, leaf lard, and a small quantity of cotton-seed oil, churned through milk. It is a good product, a healthful product, economically a cheap product to the consumer. Who furnishes the raw materials? The men on the Iowa and Illinois prairies who raise the cattle and the hogs.

"But," it is said, "this product is sold for butter." If the dealers sell it for butter, strip off the mask. But would not a tax of one-tenth of a cent a pound and a license fee of $100 for the manufacturer mark the oleomargarine as well as it is marked now?

"But," says somebody, "we ought to raise tax enough to pay the cost of administration." How much is that? I went this morning to the Internal-Revenue Office, and I said, "Last year you collected a million and a half dollars from oleomargarine. How much did the collection cost?" "Why," was the reply, "it cost so little that the expense can hardly be estimated." "Well, how much?" "Twenty thousand dollars, at the outside, would be a liberal allowance." That is the estimated cost of collecting one million and a half of dollars on oleomargarine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to occupy five minutes more.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. "But," say those who favor this tax, "the manufacturers can well afford to pay the tax; we do not much like the making of oleomargarine anyhow." Ah, gentlemen, within our own borders no tax can be levied upon any article that is consumed without the producer of the raw material, the manufacturer of the finished product, or the consumer paying that tax; and it is generally divided among all three.

Now, I would not vote for a law (if we had the power to enact it) that would prohibit the making of oleomargarine. Why, sir, it is a legitimate industry, and the product is a cheap—economically cheap, I mean—and valuable food. The farmer and the consumer strike hands, and the manufacturer is a mere incident.

So I would be glad to see legislation that would strike off this million and a half dollars of tax on oleomargarine and place upon the industry a tax which would yield, we will say, $25,000, which would be ample to police the business just as well as it is policed now, and would relieve large numbers of our citizens from a tax which they ought not to pay.

But the question here is filled cheese. I listened yesterday to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], to whom I always listen with great interest. I enjoyed his clear, cogent, poetical, oratorical effort; it was splendid—magnificent; and the appeal he made in behalf of the cow coming home early was irresistible. But I would say to my friend from Iowa that down in central Illinois we have the "American cow"—perhaps not to larger extent than the people over in Iowa, but quite as many. And a great multitude of people there are interested in the price they get for their beef, and for the hog when it is driven to market. We would not interfere with the dairy interest; let that interest stand; its merits entitle it to stand. But I do not want you to tax the multiplied thousands of farmers throughout the length and breadth of this country who market their cattle and their hogs, a portion of the product going into oleomargarine and a portion into filled cheese. Those people are your peers and the peers of your constituents. They have a right to engage in those agricultural industries.

I say again, tax this industry so far as may be necessary to police it, and there stop. Any other tax than that which will truthfully brand filled cheese as such is oppression, and shall not have my support if I can get a modification of it. That is all my contention.

Why should a man who makes filled cheese pay $400 a year license? Do you say that this tax is necessary in connection with the system by which Government officers shall see what he is doing, that this tax is necessary by way of policing the industry for revenue purposes, making it absolutely certain that the manufacturer shall not palm off his filled cheese as cream cheese? If that is your purpose, I strike hands with you. But when I say to you that a license fee of $100 a year, instead of $400, and a tax of a tenth of a cent a pound upon the product would ten times over pay the cost of collection and prevent counterfeiting just as well as a license fee of $10,000 and a tax of even 10 cents a pound, I say to you that in my judgment the case is made out. I ask gentlemen of the House to look at this matter coolly, without prejudice. "Let every tub stand on its own bottom;" do not tax one class for the benefit of another.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to make a statement——

Mr. TERRY. I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and have it pending. It is rather hurriedly written and I will read it myself:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:
"That every manufacturer or dealer in any manufactured article intended for interstate commerce who shall manufacture, sell, ship, or offer for sale any inferior or low grade or class of such article purporting, claiming, or pretending by brand, label, circular, advertisement, or otherwise, that it is of a superior quality or higher grade or better class than it really is, shall be deemed guilty of a fraud and misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that proposition is not germane to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order to offer it at this time, at all events, as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the ostensible object of the pending measure is to prevent fraudulent practices in regard to the manufacture of cheese. The claim is made that an inferior grade of cheese, or that which is not cheese at all, is manufactured and palmed off upon the general public under the name of cheese. Now, if you be in earnest, if you wish to prevent frauds on the public, why not prevent them from being defrauded in various other kinds of manufactures, by shoddy or inferior merchandise of all kinds, which are palmed of on the public as first-class goods? Complaints come from all over the country that such practices are constantly resorted to with regard to sales of merchandise; and you are now attempting to drive from competition one class of goods by putting a tax upon it and insisting that it shall be branded a fraud, under the ostensible claim that you are trying to prevent frauds on commerce. Let us go a little further, if that is your real object.

Now, sir, what you are really after—those who are persistently pressing this bill—is, under the guise of taxation, to stamp out one industry at the expense of another.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I understood the question of order had been raised upon the proposed amendment or substitute.

Mr. TERRY. I am addressing myself to the point of order. I am showing that this proposition is perfectly in line with what you proposed to adopt here. This is precisely the same proposition, but going a little further than the bill we are now considering.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman from Ohio made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio stated that it was not in order, and the Chair so held, at this time. The Chair understood the gentleman from Arkansas to read the proposition as the basis of his remarks.

Mr. DINGLEY. The point of order was raised, however.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is aware of that.

Mr. TERRY. I will send up the substitute and have it pending, to be offered at the proper time. I know it can not be presented now for action.

Mr. McMILLIN. It can be offered now, but not acted upon, until the original proposition is perfected.

Mr. TERRY. I send it up at this time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is not in order and can not be offered at this time, I submit, Mr. Chairman. I understood it to be read merely as the foundation of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. TERRY. It is offered as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then it can not be done at this time.

Mr. TERRY. It can be pending at this time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The pending amendment is a single proposition, suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. This is a proposition that embraces the whole bill, and could not possibly be in order now.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman from Ohio will permit me to interrupt him, I will say the pendency of an amendment does not prevent the introduction of a substitute, for the rule expressly provides that there may be pending at the same time the original proposition and amendment thereto, and an amendment to the amendment, also a substitute for the proposition, and an amendment to the substitute. Of course the substitute can not be disposed of until the original proposition is perfected.

Mr. TERRY. I so understand the rule.

Now, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will not prevail. It proposes to reduce the tax carried by the bill from $400 to $100.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me a moment; I do not care to occupy time in discussing the matter. I would simply state that there are about 100 of these factories or places of business in the United States. The proposition to reduce the tax, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, would result in a collection of only about $10,000, which would not be half enough to pay the expense of enforcing the law.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Ohio will permit me—I do not wish to occupy his time, but I am sure it will be extended—$20,000 collects the oleomargarine tax and more than collects it, and there are three or four times as many of them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If you reduce the tax it will not produce enough to secure the enforcement of the law.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have my time begin now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. NORTHWAY. As I have said, Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail.

I have not time, of course, within the five minutes allotted to me to discuss the general features of this bill. I do not agree to the proposition laid down by the gentleman from Illinois and others during this discussion on this floor, that the manufacture of filled cheese is such a business that we ought to encourage it by legislation. It is said to be a healthy food product. I do not know, and do not care, whether that is true or not. I do not believe that we ought to encourage the business in any form. Rats are said to be healthy as an article of food; Chinamen eat them, and claim that they are healthy and not deleterious, but I doubt very much whether the American Congress would be willing or ought to encourage the canning of rats, because they are healthful, for sale to Chinamen. [Laughter.] I would object to it, and I doubt whether anybody in this country would propose to can and sell them to Chinamen or anybody else because they are said to be healthy.

I do not know that filled cheese is a product that is healthy or otherwise, but it is a business that ought not to be encouraged. It may not be unhealthy, but in whatever light you look at it it is a swindle upon the public. It proposes to make use of the name of cheese for the purpose of covering up a fraud on the people. That great business industry—the manufacture of cheese—was built up in this country by the honest farmers of the land during years and years of hard toil until all the civilized world knows the meaning of the word "cheese." We know—all civilized beings know—that the word "cheese" means the product of the pure milk of the cow——

A MEMBER. Or the goat.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But we propose now to allow manufacturers to make a product with lard, trash, soap grease, skimmed milk, and other commodities, mix them together, label them "cheese," and sell them to the world, and all that we shall require them to do under this law is to affix to it the adjective "filled." It is not cheese in any sense of the word, and ought not to be allowed to go under the name. We ought not to encourage this manufacture, but, on the contrary, ought to discourage it by every means at our disposal.

The cheese business has conquered its way in the world. The making of cheese from the pure milk of the cow has been a matter of slow growth. Men have sacrificed their lives and their money to clear away the farm, to build up the industry, and have gone out into the markets of the world and conquered those markets by honorable dealing until those markets understand the meaning of the word "cheese"; but here are men now proposing to take hog grease, soap grease, and skimmed milk and to steal the word "cheese" and to go into a market which has been already conquered by the honest yeomanry of this country and to sell their product in the place of cheese. I submit that they ought to pay for that. It is worth something. The farmers of my district, many of whom are cheese makers, have helped to conquer the markets of the world, until the world understands the meaning of the word cheese.

Now, these men from Chicago and other places propose to take soap grease and skimmed milk and manufacture something they call cheese, and go into the markets of the world with it and sell their product. It ought to be worth thousands of dollars to them. They find the market already made. It would be a different thing if they started out and conquered a market, but they find a trade-mark built up by the honest yeomanry of this country, and they propose to steal that trade-mark. You may brand this product "filled cheese," but the word "cheese," nevertheless, is there.

Mr. OTEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I have not time in five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They ought not to be allowed to use the word "cheese" at all.

Mr. NORTHWAY. No; they ought not to be allowed to use the word "cheese" at all, and the use of that word ought to be worth more than $400 apiece to the manufacturers. The world understands what that word means, and now to undertake to allow these manufacturers to invade a market which has been created by the farmers of this country, to allow them to do that for $100 as a manufacturer's license, is an outrage. Already the farmers feel that they are being burdened, and they are asking Congress to protect them, and if Congress will not protect them by imposing a tax, where in heaven's name shall they appeal for protection? I protest in the name of decency, in the name of manhood, in the name of the honest yeomanry of this country, that a tax of $400 is not too large. It is too small, if anything. I submit that to engage in the manufacture of soap grease and skimmed milk, and send it out to the world stamped as "cheese" and to sell it as such, is an outrage on honest industry, and I would prohibit it if I had my way. At all events, I would tax it more than $400 if I had my way. [Applause.] So I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to striking out this $400 and inserting $100. In the name of God, if you can not do something for the protection of the farmer, let us adjourn and go home. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. Do you not know that protection is for manufacturers and bankers, not for farmers and miners? That is the way it seems to be understood in this House.

Mr. BRUMM. If you want to help the farmer, why do you not introduce the wool schedule of the McKinley bill, and give them some substantial relief?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order at this time to offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HOPKINS. I have the floor, I believe, and if I can get order, I should like to occupy the floor a minute or two.

Mr. RAY. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOPKINS. The parliamentary inquiry can come later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] is recognized. The committee will be in order.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have known my esteemed friend from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] for a numbers of years, and I confess that I am greatly surprised at the intemperate speech that he has just made to the members of this committee. I can not understand it.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I will explain it to you, if you will come around.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not believe you could explain it, except upon the theory that you are possessed of a distempered mind. Now, the idea of comparing the manufacture of filled cheese to canning rats is a comparison that nobody but my friend from Ohio would make.

Mr. NORTHWAY. You see the point, do you?

Mr. HOPKINS. And if the gentleman had read the testimony that was taken before our committee, and had exercised his usual honesty, he never would have indulged in such an intemperate speech or such an unsavory comparison.

Now, what is filled cheese? It is the result of the new method of separating the fatty substance from new milk. By the centrifugal force that is used milk can have the fatty substance taken from it and made into butter, and that milk thus relieved of its fatty substance, which is perfectly fresh and wholesome, is, under this new method, manufactured into cheese. How? By taking leaf lard and subjecting it to certain heat, so that it becomes oil, and mixing a certain number of pounds of that with a hundred pounds of this milk, and then the process of manufacture is the same as the manufacture of other cheese. The leaf lard is as pure and clean a product as the fatty substance in the milk itself. The only difference between a full-cream cheese and this filled cheese is the fact, as I have just indicated, that in the one case it is the fatty substance that comes from the cow and in the filled cheese it is the fatty substance that is taken from the leaf lard of the hog.

The testimony before our committee was that the farmer receives 25 per cent more for his milk by reason of the manufacture of filled cheese than he would without. Unless you permit the use of this milk in the manner that is indicated here in the manufacture of filled cheese it is of little value to the farmer; but by permitting its manufacture to go on, as was stated by one gentleman living in my district, the farmers of my section get 25 per cent more for their milk than they would without this.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he thinks there would be this increased price for milk provided the manufacturers of filled cheese did not sell their filled cheese for full cream cheese?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will reach that point, and I propose to do that before I get through; and I will state to the gentleman right here that I voted for this bill in committee, and I propose to vote for it here and vote for it in the House, but the fraud does not——

Mr. RAY. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. HOPKINS. One at a time. Let me answer this gentleman and then I will yield to you. There is no manufacturer that has ever manufactured these cheeses that has sold them for other than they are—that is, filled cheese; and when full cream cheese is bringing 10 cents, 12 cents, and 13 cents per pound in the market the manufacturer is selling filled cheese for 5 and 6 cents per pound. Now, where the trouble comes——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HOPKINS. Let me get through, and then I will. Where the trouble comes in is here, that when filled cheeses leave the hand of the manufacturer and go into the hand of the dealer——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. If I can be recognized I will yield my time to my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no time to yield.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will ask unanimous consent that his time be extended, and that he may have so much time as he desires.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. Where the trouble comes in, as I was about to observe when interrupted, is here—that after the cheeses leave the hands of the manufacturer and go into the hands of the dealer the retail dealers frequently sell them for full cream cheese. I am opposed to that, as every other honest man ought to be. I favor a system of legislation that will cause these cheeses to be marked for just what they are.

Mr. RAY. Will you submit to a question right there?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. RAY. I understand you to state that you are in favor of the bill, and you voted for it in committee. May I be permitted to ask if you assented to the report of the committee?

Mr. HOPKINS. I have not read the report. I only committed myself to such parts as I voted for. What has been stated in the report I may or may not subscribe to.

Mr. RAY. Let me call your attention to a statement and ask if you assented to that. The report says:

> Large quantities of this cheese for shipment to the South have been discovered in the city of New York, branded "New York State full cream cheese," "Fine cream cheese," "Badger State full cream cheese"; and other brands representing fancy brands of cheese are borne upon the article known as "filled cheese."

Now, is that true or not? That is in the report of the committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. That was the testimony before the committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. That was the testimony of one of the parties there. And another party testified that the great object in getting this bill through was to drive out the filled cheese in the South and allow the skimmed-m lk cheese of New York to go there to be sold as full cream cheese.

Mr. RAY. You do not dispute the proposition that in the great Southern seaport towns that this filled cheese is sold in large quantities under false pretense as full cream cheese?

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, now, if the gentleman understood my remarks, I stated that I am in favor of legislation that will prohibit the selling of this cheese for other than it is, and if it is sold for Wisconsin full cream cheese, New York full cream cheese, or Illinois full cream cheese, I am opposed to it, and you will find as we go on in the consideration of this bill that ample provision is made to absolutely prohibit such an imposition upon the public as you mention. The amendment which we are now considering is not that. The question is as to whether the manufacturer who, as the testimony shows, has never sold his product for other than it is shall be taxed $400 per annum for manufacturing or only $100 per annum.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does not the evidence show that the entire manufacture of this article is shipped unmarked and unprinted, and is not that the highest evidence possible that the manufacturers are parties to the proposed fraud on the wholesale dealers?

Mr. TAWNEY. The evidence also shows that this article is made in the semblance of cheese.

Mr. HOPKINS. Made in the semblance of cheese? It is a kind of cheese.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, it is; and the evidence is that it is better cheese than much of the skimmed-milk cheese that we find in the market.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Illinois made that statement, but nobody else did.

Mr. HOPKINS. The evidence that is reliable and that people can be guided by is that this article is a better cheese for consumption than much of the skimmed-milk cheese that is sold by the manufacturers of New York.

Now, the gentleman in charge of the bill has said that this article is shipped unmarked. I agree to that. But the bill which we are about to enact proposes to provide for having it marked. But when you require it to be marked, there is no reason why we should compel the manufacturer to pay a license fee of $400 a year when $100 will meet the requirements of the Government. The point that I make is, that we should legislate so that filled cheese can not be sold for full cream cheese, but that in our legislation we should do no injury to any man, and as long as the evidence before our committee is that no filled cheese has been sold by the manufacturer as full cream cheese, I hold that we should not tax this manufacturer out of existence. Put your tax upon the party that commits the fraud. Fix it there, and then you will do no injustice.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does not the gentleman admit that selling an article of this character unbranded and unmarked, with full knowledge of the use that it is to be put to, is the highest evidence of a contemplated fraud on the part of the manufacturer?

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman ought to remember the evidence given before our committee, which was that the manufacturers never sell this for anything different from what it is; that it goes to the dealer, and that if any fraud is perpetrated it is by the individual dealer. The manufacturers have never sought to put this article upon the market for other than it is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why do not they mark it, as other people mark their products?

Mr. HOPKINS. Anybody who is familiar with cheese can easily distinguish this from full cream cheese.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He can by cutting it and eating it.

Mr. HOPKINS. The men that the manufacturers deal with can tell by inspecting the cheese that it is not full cream cheese, and as long as you have subsequent provisions in the bill which will take care of the marking, so that no fraud can be perpetrated, it seems to me that a tax of $100 is as good as a tax of $400 for the protection of the public and the prevention of fraud. But, Mr. Chairman, I simply rose not to discuss the full provisions of the bill, but to meet the argument that was made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY], who undertook to say that this filled cheese was not a wholesome product and that it was to be compared with rat meat. Now, the Agricultural Department has said——

Mr. NORTHWAY. You do not desire to misrepresent me, I suppose?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I did not compare it to rat meat. I said that rats were said to be healthy, and I asked would the gentleman therefore encourage the sale of rat meat.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, you sought to put filled cheese in the same category with rat meat. You made that reference or comparison to prejudice the minds of members against filled cheese. Now, the Agricultural Department has decided that there is nothing unwholesome in this product. Mr. Adams, of Wisconsin, who is as competent to speak upon the subject as any man in America, did not attack the manufacture upon the ground that it was an unwholesome product, but for the reasons set forth yesterday by my colleague on the committee, Mr. EVANS. Mr. Sherwin, of Elgin, also testified that from a long experience in the business he was prepared to say to the committee and the country that there was absolutely nothing unwholesome in this filled-cheese product.

The whole contention here is largely between the skimmed milk cheese makers of the country, represented by New York and Ohio, and the filled-cheese makers, who are competing for the Southern market. The testimony is that the filled cheese has driven out of that market, not the full cream cheese, but the skimmed-milk cheese, and as long as it is a contention between those two interests I think the one product ought not to be taxed out of existence while the other passes without any tax at all. I do not wish to have my position misunderstood. I favor legislation which compels the manufacturer and dealer to sell this product for just what it is; but I have no sympathy with the spirit that would utterly destroy it. I have always favored legislation that is in the interest of the farmer, and believe that in saying what I have here to-day I better represent him than my friend from Ohio who has just addressed the committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a question of order. Under what rule is this debate proceeding? Has the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] the right to proceed without limitation of time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole gave the gentleman from Illinois unlimited time. The Chair stated the proposition to the committee, and there was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was not present, then, when that was done. I supposed that the gentleman from Illinois, who represents the only filled-cheese industry in the United States, was, in his zeal for his constituents, exceeding the time allowed him under the rules.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, not having participated in the general debate, I desire, before stating my views on this question, unanimous consent to occupy ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to occupy ten minutes?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope that request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I sustained the oleomargarine law when it was before the House several years ago, as I have voted in Committee on Ways and Means for the present bill. Yet I do not desire to be understood as sustaining this bill on some of the grounds which have been urged before this committee.

This is exceptional legislation. It is an appeal to the taxing power of the General Government for the purpose of accomplishing indirectly an end that is in the nature of the exercise of the police power which belongs to the States. That, I think, must be conceded. While the measure is constitutional, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, as an exercise of the taxing power of the General Government, yet I am frank to concede that the purpose had in view beyond the raising of revenue involves indirectly the exercise of a police power which, in general, should be exercised by the States.

Now, what are the circumstances which justify, from the point of view I have suggested, such legislation as the oleomargarine law and such legislation as is proposed in this bill? It seems to me that the circumstances to be considered are these: A great and overshadowing interest in this country, the most important interest in the country, has been seriously interfered with illegitimately by the discovery of certain methods of imitating products which have belonged to the farm. In my judgment, the name "butter" and the name "cheese," though not legally trade-marks, are, to all intents and purposes, from the point of equity, trade-marks that belong to the farmers of this and other countries; and any attempt on the part of anyone to palm off on the community imitations of these products and to sell them as the genuine products is contrary to the public interest, and so contrary to the public interest that if this illegitimate interference can not be reached efficiently and effectively by the States there is a justification in an appeal to the General Government to exercise its taxing power for the purpose of saving to the farmers of this nation the rights which properly and equitably belong to them in the trade-marks "butter" and "cheese."

Now, if it were possible for State legislation to accomplish all the ends proposed to be accomplished by this legislation, then this subject should be left to State legislation. But experience has shown that it is not possible for legislation by the States to reach the evil which is complained of; and it is an evil of gigantic importance, affecting the most important interests in this country.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] has suggested an amendment which, if it were within the jurisdiction of Congress to enact such a law, might reach the end. But the gentleman very well understands that Congress could not take jurisdiction of such legislation as he proposes with reference to the exercise of the police power, a power which as such belongs to the States and which can not be exercised in the direction suggested by Congress. Therefore——

Mr. TERRY rose.

Mr. DINGLEY. I can not be interrupted now.

Therefore there has come an appeal to Congress from this great and overshadowing interest to exercise the taxing power to accomplish an end which thus far the States have been unable to accomplish on account of the impossibility of securing concurrent and uniform laws of all the different States on this subject.

Hence this legislation, I am frank to say, is here because of this overshadowing necessity. Under the guise of an exercise of the taxing power of Congress we are endeavoring to correct the great evils which have come upon the farming interests in connection with this subject. I sustained under that guise the oleomargarine law when it was enacted by Congress. I sustain this bill because, it seems to me, the farmers of this country have an equitable right to the use of the trade-marks, so to speak, of "butter" and "cheese" for their dairy products. It appears to me that it is the duty of Congress to secure the protection of that great interest, if it can be accomplished, even in this indirect way.

I would not use this power under ordinary conditions. It is a power that must be exercised cautiously. But under the extraordinary conditions existing, the exercise of the power seems to me justifiable; and on this ground I justify the vote which I gave in 1886 on the oleomargarine law and the vote which I propose to give in favor of this bill.

Now, from another point of view, the bill proposes to so mark this imitation product that whenever the purchaser comes to buy it he may know what he is buying. The bill does not propose to destroy the manufacture of this imitation cheese. The bill does not propose that the tax on the manufacturer or the wholesale dealer or the retail dealer (and I think the tax on the retail dealer should be less than that proposed in the bill) shall be such as to interfere unduly with the manufacture or sale of this article. There may be some difference of judgment as to the extent of such a tax; but experience has shown that it has not interfered with the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine and that in the form proposed in this bill it will not unduly interfere with the manufacture and sale of this imitation cheese. I confess that if the tax were such as to prohibit the manufacture there would be very serious doubt about this legislation—not only serious doubt, but to my mind there would be an objection which could not be overcome as against such legislation. But to my mind, Mr. Chairman, the taxation proposed here does not go to the extent of improperly interfering with or suppressing the manufacture.

I remember very well when the oleomargarine law was discussed before the House it was objected to the enactment that it would break down the manufacture in this country. But the result of it was simply to secure the marking of the article that was sold in the markets of the country for just what it really is. Now, have the people, the public, reaped any advantage from the enactment of that law? It seems to me that they have. I remember before the passage of that act that this product, oleomargarine, was everywhere sold as butter, and sold, too, at the same price as butter, but to-day under the oleomargarine law—and the product is branded for what it is—you can hardly go into a store in this country where it is sold at all that you can not find it under its proper name, and sold at a much less price than the genuine butter. Those who desire to buy pure butter are enabled to do so, and those who want to buy oleomargarine on the ground that it is a cheaper product can get what they want at a less price. So it will be with this "filled cheese," as it is called. To-day it is being sold not as filled cheese, not as a substitute for cheese, but as genuine cheese, being sold as if it were genuine cream cheese, and at the full price.

Now, when you enact this law and require it to be branded for what it is, instead of being sold at 10 or 12 cents, the full price of genuine cream cheese, it will be sold for 5 or 6 cents, and that is the inevitable result. In other words, the purchaser who desires to use filled cheese will be able to buy it every time and for about one-half the price that he has to pay to-day.

So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that two great public interests are accomplished by the enactment of this legislation. First, that the dairy interests—the farming interests of the country—which have the right, it seems to me, to all the benefits that can be gained from the trade-marks of butter and cheese, will be enabled to have those rights preserved to them without the menace that exists from the sale of an imitation article. Second, that all persons who want to buy cream cheese—the pure dairy product of milk—will have the opportunity to do so. That all persons who want the cheaper product—the imitation product of cheese—will have the opportunity, so far as Congress legislates, to purchase that for what it is, and at the lowest possible price, and hence the dealer can sell either, as he sees fit, and the consumer can purchase either, as he sees fit. If any State finds it desirable, in its opinion, to prohibit the sale of any article whose use it believes to be harmful, it possesses the police power under which it can so legislate.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Maine be permitted to proceed. He is giving us very interesting information.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Maine wants additional time——

Mr. DINGLEY. I have stated the reasons, briefly, on which I support the bill. I do not desire to commit myself to the idea that the taxing power of the Government ought to be invoked in simple and ordinary business transactions, even to prevent fraud. That is a matter within the power of the State to control, and should not come here. But the question presented by the pending bill is so exceptional, and the evils resulting from it are so exceptional, that properly, in my judgment, we can exercise a power which the Supreme Court of the United States has decided we possess; and yet I admit it is a power that we ought to exercise only on those occasions where the interest to be protected is of great moment, and where the State legislation is powerless to effect the desired result. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. STEELE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, agreed to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. PETTIGREW, and Mr. BLACKBURN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 116) authorizing the Public Printer to print the Annual Report of the Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in quarto form, and to bind it in one volume, for the purpose of correcting errors in the text.

FILLED CHEESE.

The committee again resumed its session, Mr. HULL in the chair.

Mr. MCMILLIN was recognized.

Mr. OTEY. I hope the gentleman from Maine will permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to move to limit the debate on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has been recognized.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with no little interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]. He has spoken with his usual clearness, but not with his usual consistency. He confesses, with that candor which ordinarily characterizes him, that this is the invocation of the taxing power for other purposes than for raising revenue. That much at least has been gained by the debate. That much we have settled after a whole day of denial. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, which reports this bill, confesses the object to be police regulation. He says that you may invoke the taxing power for this particular purpose, but draws a distinction, which I am a little unable to follow him in, by saying that you may invoke it in part, but you can not invoke it to destroy.

It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that there is only one true dividing line on a question of this character: The Government of the United States has power to regulate commerce between this and other nations and between the States by commercial regulations, but its taxing power can not be invoked for the purpose of destroying anything without violating the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution. I want to warn the gentleman, and I know he is a thoughtful student of political affairs, that when he enters on this wide field of regulating all of the industries of foreign countries and their imports by tariff laws, and enters upon the broad field of undertaking to control all the industries of this country by internal taxation, he has a job on his hands which even Solomon, if here in all of his glory, could not discharge acceptably.

How simple government is when left to its proper and legitimate functions. How complex it is when the legislator, puffed up with a little brief authority, his head expanded by temporary triumph, thinks he is wiser than the people at home and greater, and that he can control everything by statute. He can make prosperity and regulate all industries by his legislative wisdom.

It is utterly futile if you desired to do it, and you ought not to attempt it, even if you could by perverted or usurped power do it. Now, I am in favor of the amendment offered by my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. It is right. It is in the line of the recommendations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. He came before the Committee on Ways and Means; he said that the taxes on retail dealers in oleomargarine were higher than they should be, and that the law could be better enforced with lower taxes than with the rates that were already imposed, and yet this committee recommends that the House adopt a tax upon filled cheese that is almost as high as that which the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has admitted was too high for practical purposes on oleomargarine. I will read to the committee his statement:

Commissioner MILLER. One great objection to the oleomargarine law as it stands, and which makes it difficult of enforcement, is the high rate of the special tax. I think it is worse than if the tax were lower, because the incentive to go crooked is great. The law starts with a special tax of $600, and a man selling at wholesale $480, and at retail $48. Most of these small dealers, rather than pay the $48, will run the chances of violating the law. We would get better enforcement if the tax were not so high.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you suggest it is too high?

Commissioner MILLER. All the rates are too high. I think you would find that you would have much better observance of the law if the rates were lower.

Mr. TAWNEY. If an oleomargarine manufacturer wanted to engage in the "filled cheese" business, would he have to pay this license also?

Commissioner MILLER. Yes. If he were in the oleomargarine business he would have to pay another in this business.

So that, so far from adopting the Commissioner's recommendation to reduce the rate of taxation, you have left on the retail dealer within a few dollars of what he said was too high on retail dealers in oleomargarine. Now, one word more and I will suspend.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is undertaking to state what was said in the committee room.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am undertaking to state what is published in the hearings.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand that.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am not undertaking to say it, but I have said it, word for word.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Have you said another thing, my friend? Have you said that after hearing that statement by the Commissioner we reduced the rate of tax upon the manufacturer from $600 to $400? And one further word, have you stated that after that recommendation we reduced the wholesale tax from $300 to $250?

Mr. MCMILLIN. You did reduce a part of them, but the Commissioner told you that $48 tax on a retail dealer in oleomargarine was too high. Disregarding that admonition, you put a high tax on the retail dealer in filled cheese.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; not at all. Forty dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Information and knowledge are incidental to intelligent debate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then, if they will give it I will ask my friend to follow the example of Solomon, and get wisdom.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You get your bill and read it, and you will find you are arguing on a wrong basis.

Mr. MCMILLIN. All right. In what I quoted I did not vary a word from the printed report of what the Commissioner said. I did not vary a word from his examination in the printed report. If you will read my remarks in the RECORD you will find that I did not interpolate one word or comma.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate upon this section and the amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What paragraph of the bill are we considering?

The CHAIRMAN. Beginning on line 2, page 2.

The motion of Mr. GROSVENOR was agreed to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield the time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment under consideration comes very appropriately from the State of Illinois. It is in the interest of the filled-cheese manufacturers, and that State in 1895 produced 14,000,000 pounds of filled cheese, and has within it almost all the filled-cheese factories in the United States, a fact that I want the members of the House to understand before they vote upon the pending proposition.

Mr. Chairman, in reply to the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] against the proposed manufacturers' license, I will say that they have not stated a single fact concerning the relative market value of filled cheese and pure cream cheese, which should be the only basis upon which the tax or license should be fixed. Aside from the fact that the manufacturers of filled cheese in branding and designating their product "cheese" are infringing upon the trade-mark of the farmer and the manufacturer of genuine cheese, the relative difference between the cost of production of the two articles is of itself sufficient to sustain this license.

We impose a tax of 1 cent a pound on the product, and then, in addition to that, we impose a license upon the manufacturer, the wholesaler, and the retailer. Now, when you come to ascertain the aggregate tax per pound upon the product, it is less than one cent and a quarter a pound, including all the licenses and the special tax of 1 cent a pound. Filled cheese is manufactured at a cost of 4 cents a pound, and can be manufactured for 3 cents a pound; and, in my opinion, if we pass this bill it can be manufactured for 2 cents a pound.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, let me interrupt you there.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I have not the time.

Mr. HOPKINS. The object is not to cause the consumer to pay as much for filled cheese as cream cheese.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota declines to yield.

Mr. HOPKINS. He yields to me. But only to require them to sell it for what it is, and give it to the consumer for half of what full cream cheese costs.

Mr. TAWNEY. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the cost of producing filled cheese is from 3 to 4 cents a pound, so that an increase in the cost of production resulting from this tax will not exceed 1¼ or 1½ cents; and the aggregate cost, with the tax, will not be more than 4¼ to 5½ cents a pound.

Now, to produce full cream cheese it costs from 11½ to 12¼ cents a pound. These two products have heretofore been sold in the market for the same price, or nearly so. If this bill results in reducing the price of filled cheese to those who desire to eat it, there will still be a wide margin for profit after paying these licenses and the special tax. Men talk about the poor man having the benefit of cheaper cheese! He has not had that benefit in the past, and one of the results of the oleomargarine tax, which is higher than the tax imposed by this bill, was to reduce the price of oleomargarine to consumers. How, then, can gentlemen say, in the face of that fact, that this tax, this license, will destroy the manufacture of filled cheese, or that it will increase the cost of the filled cheese to the consumer? It will simply be compelling them to sell their product for what it is, and when that is done they will still have a fair profit on their product.

There has been a great deal said by the gentlemen from Illinois concerning the purity and value of this article as a food product. A great deal has been said about the evidence taken before the committee on that subject, but it is unnecessary for me to allude to that now. That branch of the subject was fully covered in the remarks I submitted yesterday. I will repeat, however, that the evidence referred to does not show that filled cheese is a wholesome product.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, to strike out "four" and insert "one."

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRUMM. Division.

Mr. CANNON. Well, we will have a stand up upon that.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes, 38; noes, 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. I want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at this point. I will offer an amendment to the retail dealers.

Mr. CANNON. All right. In line 6, page 2, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "two hundred and." Is debate exhausted on this paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. CANNON. Then let the Clerk read "so that it will read," etc.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wholesale dealers in filled cheese shall pay $50 per annum.

Mr. CANNON. That is right.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TRACEY. Division.

The CHAIRMAN. The call for a division came too late.

The Clerk read as follows:

Retail dealers in filled cheese shall pay $40 per annum——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the balance of that paragraph relates only to the application of certain sections of the Revised Statutes, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to make a motion to amend the sentence that was read by the Clerk. By direction of the committee, I move to strike out the word "forty" and insert the word "twenty-four."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, let the amendment be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 17, after the word "pay," strike out "forty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-four"; so as to read: "Retail dealers in filled cheese shall pay $24 per annum."

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if he can not see his way to make it $10.

Mr. BRUMM. Say $5.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do not ask the earth.

Mr. CANNON. That is not asking the earth.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let this be voted on. I think I can not consent to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, and the question is on striking out "forty" and inserting "twenty-four."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out "twenty-four" and inserting "ten." Now, if I can have the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], I wish to say that no man on the Ways and Means Committee, nor, in my judgment, any member of this House, including the gentleman in charge of this bill, will say that $10 will not meet every requirement, police or otherwise, except the bare amount of revenue, that $24 will. I pause to see if any gentleman will deny that proposition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, we want to do nothing but what is just in this matter. The other two licenses are the important features of the bill, and I am willing, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], to fix this one at $12 per annum.

Mr. CANNON. I will accept that if I find that after I have made one more statement the gentleman will not agree to make the amount less.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; a dollar a month is low enough.

Mr. CANNON. In my little city of 20,000 people there are 70 grocery and provision establishments that supply in a small way groceries and provisions to the population of the city and of the surrounding country. They deal in what goes in the market, and this is a legitimate object of dealing. Now, from those 70 establishments, at $12, there will be a revenue of $840 a year; and what is true of my city is true of like places all over the country. I appreciate the willingness of the gentleman in charge of this bill to reduce the amount of this license to $12, but I appeal to him to say whether it can not be further reduced.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We can divide 12 by 12 and that will be a dollar a month. I think that is low enough.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; I will not insist further.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to the amendment. I propose to reduce this license to $5, and on that I want to be heard for a minute.

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order, because there is an amendment to the amendment pending.

Mr. BRUMM. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That amendment has been accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Ohio to modify his amendment so as to make it a motion to strike out "forty" and insert "twelve"?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. BRUMM. Therefore my amendment is in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope my friend will allow a vote to be taken. We all understand the matter.

Mr. BRUMM. I am not so sure that we all do understand it. If revenue is what you are after, you will get more revenue by making this license $5 than by making it $12. The majority of the stores in which this article will be sold are not stores that sell only one particular article or class of articles. They are, for the most part, what are known as country stores, and are to be found in all the country towns and in cities having a population of 20,000, and if you put this tax at $5 a year there will not be a storekeeper who will not pay it; so that by putting it at this low figure you will really collect more revenue than you will if you fix the license at $12. These small, promiscuous stores, as they are called, can not afford to pay a tax of $12 for the purpose of selling one kind of cheese alone, and the result of fixing the license fee so high will be not only to give you less revenue, but to concentrate the sale of this article in the hands of a few storekeepers instead of having it sold everywhere. Therefore, if you are honest in the purpose which you avow in enacting this bill, you ought to permit this amendment to be adopted putting the tax at $5 a year, and I shall insist on a vote upon it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to say a word, Mr. Chairman, and only a word. When we come to the definition of a retail dealer it will be seen that the provision of the bill is made so broad and liberal that the retailer may sell 10, 15, or 100 cheeses at a time; so that we give the retail dealer the advantage of position so far as the definition is concerned.

Mr. BRUMM. But how does that help the storekeeper who perhaps buys only one or two cheeses at a time and sells the article by the pound?

Mr. GROSVENOR. My friend will bear witness to the fact that this article is sold largely in the companies' stores at the mines and factories, where they sell thousands and thousands of cheeses at retail every year; and to put the tax at $5 a year would not pay for the inspection and care which the Government would have to exercise.

Mr. BRUMM. Why, your revenue collectors will attend to it. You have them already in every district—your liquor and tobacco tax collectors. It is all nonsense to say that this tax can not be collected.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to speak to this particular amendment. I intend to occupy only two or three moments, and in that time to state a few reasons why I propose to vote for this bill as it comes from the committee and to vote against all amendments that will impair the bill. For one I do not wish to butter my bread with soap grease or to eat cheese made out of soap grease, if it has been chemically treated. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] said just now that this filled cheese was a healthful product, that it was healthful food. I deny that proposition; and in doing so I speak advisedly. If I am rightly informed in regard to the manufacture of filled cheese and the treatment of lard to which the gentleman refers, neither the manufacturer of oleomargarine nor the manufacturer of filled cheese heats this pork grease to such a point as to destroy the globules or microbes. They heat the pork oil only to such temperature as will make it run.

When this matter was under consideration before the Massachusetts legislature the State board of health of our Commonwealth was appealed to for information in regard to the healthfulness of this product; and that distinguished body, second to none in this country, said that in the manufacture of these products the door was wide open for implanting the seeds of disease into the human system. They said and clearly showed that there was danger in this uncooked hog oil that trichinæ and other hog diseases might be communicated to the consumers.

Now, in regard to the protection supposed to be obtained from branding filled cheese or oleomargarine, I claim that the branding affords no protection whatever to the consumer. It is the man who butters his bread in the hotel or private residence or boarding house that I am solicitous about. He does not have any brand on the plate showing that the article placed before him is filled cheese. In my State, if oleomargarine or the products of hog oil are used as butter, the boarding house or hotel keeper is required to hang up a sign "Imitation butter (or imitation cheese) served here." That is what we want in every State of the Union. That is what we want in this capital city. I venture to say that most of the members of this House to-day are, at their hotels or boarding houses, buttering their bread with imitation butter manufactured from hog oil or soap grease or something else than the product of the cow. We want a wholesome, decent enforcement of the law in the District of Columbia for our own protection.

Now, I submit to members of the House one proposition which I have learned from eminent medical authorities: The oldest medical books do not record a single instance of a Jew, living strictly as a Jew and not eating pork in any shape, who ever died of cancer. I submit that this uncooked hog oil is dangerous; that it contains the germs of trichinæ, cancer, and other hog diseases. I am first, last, and all the time for this bill as it came from the committee, and am opposed to any amendments which may impair the efficacy of its provisions.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire for a moment the attention of the Committee of the Whole and also of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE]. I have great respect for that gentleman. His great business ability has brought him a liberal fortune, a fact in which I rejoice. We all understand what his product is. [Laughter.] Now, in my part of the country there is an establishment which sets itself up as a rival in his branch of business; there is a gentleman there engaged in making a similar product to that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and that gentleman claims—I am inclined to think it is a slander—that the product of the gentleman from Massachusetts, a product used in the polishing of iron [laughter], contains arsenic, strychnine, injurious acids, and other chemicals that make its use absolutely dangerous to life. That gentleman out in my region of country urges this as the reason why the product of the gentleman from Massachusetts should not be used, and fears the gentleman from Massachusetts will sell his product in packages similar to those used by the Illinois factory, and I am expecting every day to receive a letter demanding that I introduce a bill here to tax the product of the gentleman from Massachusetts because it is dangerous to the health of the community. [Laughter.] But I am going to stand out against it [laughter] until I have further evidence that the product of the gentleman from Massachusetts is really deleterious to health. If the gentleman from Massachusetts, however, should, in the fullness of time, find out that my constituent is competing successfully with him by selling an article that is about to drive him out of the market, and should the gentleman from Massachusetts, while proclaiming that his product is a healthy article, seek to counterfeit the product of my constituent, then I rather think I would favor legislation which would require the gentleman from Massachusetts to truly brand the article of his manufacture. [Laughter.] But when I had made him truly brand it I would stop there. I would not put a cent or a mill of tax upon the product of the gentleman from Massachusetts in the interest of my constituent. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORSE rose. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I think I am entitled to reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has seen fit to introduce the subject of blacking here.

Mr. Chairman, there is no question but that we make good blacking in New England; there is no doubt about that; but I have never seen or known of any person recommending that anyone should eat that article or butter his bread with it. If the gentleman from Illinois will find any person who is trying to have the article consumed in that way the analogy between the product the gentleman has introduced here and that now under consideration, namely, cheese made of hog oil, may appear.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that we make good blacking in New England, but I have never seen any so good but that it would make a white mark on any man who would stand on this floor and defend imitation butter or imitation cheese, or would advocate the continuance of this fraud on the consumers and farmers of the country. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to strike out "twelve" and insert "five."

Mr. CANNON. I will only say, Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken, that this is another good advertisement for the gentleman's stove polish, if he needs any. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I just wanted to ask the gentleman from Illinois if there was any agreement between him and the gentleman from Massachusetts to aid in advertising his product here? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I do not think the gentleman ought to be too inquisitive about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the motion to strike out "forty" and insert "twelve."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read the fourth section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That every person, firm, or corporation who carries on the business of a manufacturer of filled cheese without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law, shall, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not less than $400 and not more than $3,000; and every person, firm, or corporation who carries on the business of a wholesale dealer in filled cheese without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law, shall, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not less than $250 nor more than $1,000; and every person, firm, or corporation who carries on the business of a retail dealer in filled cheese without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law, shall, besides being liable for the payment of the tax, be fined not less than $40 nor more than $500 for each and every offense.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out section 4.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio in charge of the bill to allow me ten minutes at this point.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no objection.

I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the amendment be limited to ten minutes, and that the gentleman from New York may be permitted to occupy the time.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from New York is entitled to five minutes. I think there will be no disposition to prolong the debate; and I ask unanimous consent that he have ten minutes. It may be that others would like to be heard.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to limit the debate to fifteen minutes, and ask unanimous consent that ten minutes be given to the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BROMWELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 2426) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the care of dependent children in the District of Columbia and to create a board of children's guardians," approved July 26, 1892;

A bill (S. 1306) to authorize and encourage the holding of a transmississippi and international exposition at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1898;

A bill (S. 1468) extending the time allowed the Blue Mountain Irrigation and Improvement Company for the construction of its reservoirs and canal in and through the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in the State or Oregon; and Joint resolution (S. R. 126) requiring the roof of the new city post-office building, Washington, D. C., to be fireproof.

FILLED CHEESE.

The committee again resumed its session, Mr. HULL in the chair.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when I first read the bill that is now under consideration I was in some doubt as to the vote I should cast in regard to it. It was not until after I had read the report submitted by the Committee on Ways and Means that my mind was made up against the bill; and that impression, adverse to the proposed legislation, was strengthened by the frank avowal of the leader of the majority on the floor, the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], who said this morning in reference to this bill that it was an attempt on the part of the Congress of the United States to exercise the police powers of the Government or to enforce police regulations within the States.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], also of the committee, said he favored the bill because it was in the nature of a police regulation. That was in substance his statement—I do not pretend to give his exact words—and if I mistake not every gentleman who has spoken in favor of the bill has urged its passage, for what reason? Because it would stop fraud. In other words, because it would be, in its natural outcome, a police regulation for the enforcement of the protection of the health of the people.

What do the Committee on Ways and Means say in their report? They tell us they think the bill ought to pass—

So as to prevent fraud and furnish complete protection to the purchasers against the purchase of an inferior article sold to them by unscrupulous or ignorant dealers.

So it is not a bill to collect revenue; not a bill to tax—and I for one am not opposed to the indirect method of taxation known as excise. I believe that to be a proper method of taxation; but here is a frank avowal that this is not a measure of taxation; nor is it claimed for a moment that it is a measure to be adopted to regulate interstate commerce. It is in no sense of the word a regulation of commerce. What is it? It is an act to prevent fraud, to protect public health, and to have what is claimed to be a deleterious article of food sold in the open market for what it really is.

Mr. RAY. Will my colleague allow a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I will yield for a question.

Mr. RAY. Right there let me ask are you opposed to all laws that will prevent fraud, or any law that will prevent it?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I should be perfectly willing to leave that question to be answered by the gentleman from New York himself. He knows me——

Mr. RAY. But really, is that the basis of your objection—because this law will prevent fraud—or are you against it on the ground that we have no right, under the Constitution, to pass the bill at all?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. In answer to the gentleman from New York, the basis of my objection is that this sort of legislation is unconstitutional; that it has been so declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, and I will call attention to three decisions—one in 1869, by the then Chief Justice, Salmon P. Chase; one in 1890, if I mistake not, by the present Chief Justice, Fuller; and one in 1894, by Mr. Justice Harlan.

Now, what is the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in these decisions? That each State has plenary power in all matters of police regulations; that is, that the police power of the States can only be exercised by the States themselves, and not by the central authority. The Supreme Court of the United States goes further, and it says that the fourteenth amendment has not changed that rule; that the rule has always existed, and if there be any power which should remain in the State it is the exercise of the police power.

Now, the question came up, I think, in the case of The United States vs. De Witt, which was decided in 1869, in 9 Wallace. It was there held by the Supreme Court of the United States that a section of a statute which was manifestly not enacted in the aid of the power to collect a tax, but in reality was a police regulation, was unconstitutional, and that any such provision of law had no force whatever beyond the District of Columbia. So I say pass this act if you will, but it will have no force or effect beyond the limits of this District or outside the Territories of the United States.

Mr. RAY rose.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I will answer the gentleman in a minute. The distinguished gentleman from New York is so good a lawyer——

Mr. RAY. I do not want to interfere with you at all.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I will answer the gentleman's former question now, while it is fresh in my mind. I am opposed to every fraud in the production or sale of any article of food or drink, but I say the State of New York, the State of New Jersey, the State of Massachusetts, the State of Minnesota, should take care of the food within their own limits; and the gentleman is well aware that it was decided in reference to the State of Massachusetts that the State itself could control the sale of all articles of food deleterious in their nature coming within the borders of the State.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? Can the State of Massachusetts prevent the manufacture of adulterated food products in the State of New York? And if it can not do it, then can not those adulterated products be brought into the State of Massachusetts and sold there?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. No, sir. The State of New York and the State of Massachusetts and any State of the Federal Union can control the manufacture or sale of the articles manufactured within its own borders; and one step further, each State can control the sale of articles of food coming within its borders, although manufactured in another State. That answers the question of the gentleman from Minnesota. I do not speak without authority. Now, take the first case, of The United States vs. De Witt. There Chief Justice Chase said what?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman a question? Has not Congress regulated the sale and manufacture of oleomargarine, and has not the Supreme Court held that it had the power to do that?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. The only instances where the exercise of this power by the Congress of the United States has been held good have been in cases where it was manifest or apparent, or could be urged with some degree of plausibility at least, that it was an exercise in aid of the power to collect a tax, but where it is apparent from the report of the committee, where it is apparent from the debate, where it is apparent from the admissions of the gentlemen who are urging the passage of this measure, that it is only an invocation of the police power, then I say the act is manifestly unconstitutional and beyond our power to enact.

Now, let me call the attention of the committee to what was said by Chief Justice Chase in the case of The United States vs. De Witt, the old case reported in 9 Wallace, in the year 1869. There the question before the court was whether the twenty-ninth section of the internal-revenue act of March 2, 1867, in reference to selling naphtha mixed with other oils or inflammable petroleum and making it a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to have an extension of time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not consent to a removal of the limit of debate, but the gentleman from New York may have the whole of the time in which to combat the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I believe the Supreme Court will get the better of him. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. I ask unanimous consent that I may print in the RECORD with these remarks, but as a part of my own, some extracts from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Plumley vs. Massachusetts, reported in 155 United States, page 461.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Oh, certainly; print the whole book.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to print certain extracts in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[For the decision referred to by Mr. RAY, see below.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to printing that decision in its entirety.

Mr. RAY. I would not ask to do that.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Of course I propose to call the attention of the committee to that decision. Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] attempts to ridicule the decisions of our court of last resort, and it may well be, because unless we take a position in contravention of the justices of the Supreme Court we can not pass this act.

What was said by Chief Justice Chase? Owing to the numerous interruptions from the other side, it is somewhat difficult to reach the words of the Chief Justice. He said, in reference to the provision of the act to which I called attention—it being plainly an evasion, not an effort to collect the internal-revenue tax on petroleum and naphtha—as follows:

As a police regulation, relating exclusively to the internal trade of the States, it can only have effect where the legislative authority of Congress excludes, territorially, all State legislation, as, for example, in the District of Columbia.

Now, that decision applies directly to the question under consideration. The other two cases to which I call attention are the matter of Rahrer (140 U. S.), where the opinion was rendered by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, and where he says:

The power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in conservation and promotion of the public health, good order, and prosperity is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive.

And this court has uniformly recognized State legislation, legitimately for police purposes, as not in the sense of the Constitution necessarily infringing upon any right which has been confided expressly or by implication to the National Government.

And the last case to which I shall call the attention of the committee is the case to which reference was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY]. That is Plumley against Massachusetts. There Mr. Justice Harlan said:

If there be any subject over which it would seem the States ought to have plenary control, and the power to legislate in respect to which it ought not to be supposed was intended to be surrendered to the General Government, it is the protection of the people against fraud and deception in the sale of food products. Such legislation may, indeed, indirectly or incidentally affect trade in such products transported from one State to another State. But that circumstance does not show that laws of the character alluded to are inconsistent with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman read where Justice Harlan speaks of the right of Congress under the Constitution to legislate on the subject.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. It was held in that case by the Supreme Court of the United States that the statute of Massachusetts which forbade the sale of the article claimed to be injurious, oleomargarine, although coming from another State, was a proper exercise of the police power of the State.

You can find no authority of the Supreme Court of the United States which will sustain the constitutionality of the measure under consideration. While I am opposed to any frauds and shall not vote for any measure that will sustain them, we certainly ought not to pass an unconstitutional law merely because gentlemen think that some filled cheese will be sold within the borders of some particular State.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, the extracts from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Plumley vs. Massachusetts (155 U. S., 461), which I obtained the leave of the House to print in connection with the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] are as follows:

Now, the real object of coloring oleomargarine so as to make it look like genuine butter is that it may appear to be what it is not, and thus induce unwary purchasers, who do not closely scrutinize the label upon the package in which it is contained, to buy it as and for butter produced from unadulterated milk or cream from such milk. The suggestion that oleomargarine is artificially colored so as to render it more palatable and attractive can only mean that customers are deluded, by such coloration, into believing that they are getting genuine butter. If anyone thinks that oleomargarine, not artificially colored so as to cause it to look like butter, is as palatable or as wholesome for purposes of food as pure butter, he is, as already observed, at liberty under the statute of Massachusetts to manufacture it in that State or to sell it there in such manner as to inform the customer of its real character. He is only forbidden to practice, in such matters, a fraud upon the general public. The statute seeks to suppress false pretenses and to promote fair dealing in the sale of an article of food. It compels the sale of oleomargarine for what it really is by preventing its sale for what it is not. Can it be that the Constitution of the United States secures to anyone the privilege of manufacturing and selling an article of food in such manner as to induce the mass of people to believe that they are buying something which, in fact, is wholly different from that which is offered for sale?

* * * * * * *

If there be any subject over which it would seem the States ought to have plenary control, and the power to legislate in respect to which it ought not to be supposed was intended to be surrendered to the General Government, it is the protection of the people against fraud and deception in the sale of food products. Such legislation may, indeed, indirectly or incidentally affect trade in such products transported from one State to another State. But that circumstance does not show that laws of the character alluded to are inconsistent with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States.

In People vs. Arenburg (105 N. Y., 123, 129, 130), the precise question now before us came before the court of appeals of New York. That court, after referring to its decision in People vs. Marx (99 N. Y., 377, 385), adjudging a statute of New York relating to the manufacture of oleomargarine to be in violation of the fundamental right and privilege of every American citizen to adopt and follow such lawful industrial pursuit, not injurious to the community, as he may see fit, said: "Assuming, as is claimed, that butter made from animal fat or oil is as wholesome, nutritious, and suitable for food as dairy butter; that it is composed of the same elements and is substantially the same article, except as regards its origin, and that it is cheaper, and that it would be a violation of the constitutional rights and liberties of the people to prohibit them from manufacturing or dealing in it, for the mere purpose of protecting the producers of dairy butter against competition, yet it can not be claimed that the producers of butter, made from animal fat or oils, have any constitutional right to resort to devices for the purpose of making their product resemble in appearance the more expensive article known as dairy butter, or that it is beyond the power of the legislature to enact such laws as they may deem necessary to prevent the simulated article being put upon the market in such a form and manner as to be calculated to deceive."

"If it possesses," continued the court, "the merits which are claimed for it and is innocuous, those making and dealing in it should be protected in the enjoyment of liberty in those respects, but they may legally be required to sell it for and as what it actually is and upon its own merits, and are not entitled to the benefit of any additional market value which may be imparted to it by resorting to artificial means to make it resemble dairy butter in appearance. It may be butter, but it is not butter made from cream, and the difference in cost or market value, if no other, would make it a fraud to pass off one article for the other."

Again: "The statutory prohibition is aimed at a designed and intentional imitation of dairy butter, in manufacturing the new product, and not at a resemblance in qualities inherent in the articles themselves and common to both." The court, therefore, held that artificial coloring of oleomargarine for the mere purpose of making it resemble dairy butter came within the statutory prohibition against imitation, and "that such prohibition is within the power of the legislature and rests upon the same principle which would sustain a prohibition of coloring winter dairy butter for the purpose of enhancing its market price by making it resemble summer dairy butter, should the legislature deem such a prohibition necessary or expedient."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to strike out section 4.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That every manufacturer of filled cheese shall file with the collector of internal revenue of the district in which his manufactory is located such notices, inventories, and bonds, shall keep such books and render such returns of materials and products, shall put up such signs and affix such number to his factory, and conduct his business under such surveillance of officers and agents as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation require. But the bond required of such manufacturer shall be with sureties satisfactory to the collector of internal revenue, and in a penal sum of not less than $5,000; and the amount of said bond may be increased from time to time and additional sureties required, at the discretion of the collector or under instructions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have an amendment to which the attention of the chairman of the committee has been called, and I desire to offer it, after which I will make an explanation.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 17, after the word "revenue," insert the following:

"Any manufacturer of filled cheese who fails to comply with the provisions of this section or with the regulations herein authorized shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, in explanation of that amendment, that the section is an exact copy of section 5 of the oleomargarine law, and that under that section the Commissioner of Internal Revenue made certain regulations governing the manufacture of oleomargarine, and also requiring the specific kind of books they should be required to keep. There was a violation of that section, and the Government attempted to prosecute for such violation. And in that case, which went to the Supreme Court, the court held that the violation of that section could not be punished, for the reason that the section itself did not specify any penalty. The prosecution was commenced under section 10 of the oleomargarine act, which was a general penalty; hence the Supreme Court, in the opinion in the case of United States vs. Eaton (144 U. S.), held it could not be done; and I offer that amendment simply in order to perfect that section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 5. In reply to the suggestion made by the distinguished chairman [Mr. DINGLEY] of the Ways and Means Committee, that the substitute offered by me is unconstitutional, I desire to state that if the bill itself is constitutional then my substitute certainly is. If we take the report of the committee, what they aim at is the suppression of fraudulent practices. I quote from their report:

The claim is made, and we sustain it, that it is a fraud upon the purchaser to sell him a manufactured article branded falsely or unbranded, and the principle upon which we have proceeded is to regulate the manufacture and sale by wholesale and retail, and also for export of the commodity known as "filled cheese," so as to prevent fraud and furnish complete protection to the purchaser.

Now, in regard to the constitutionality of the bill I will not undertake to give my judgment or opinion, but will simply quote from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the original-package case (135 U. S., p. 110), simply premising that the amendment which I offer applies only to manufactured articles intended for interstate commerce. The Supreme Court says that—

As to the power to regulate commerce, none of the evils which proceeded from the feebleness of the Federal Government contributed more to the great revolution which introduced the present system than the deep and general conviction that commerce ought to be regulated by Congress, and that the grant should be as extensive as the mischief, and should comprehend all foreign commerce and all commerce among the States.

Further on, page 111, referring to a former decision (125 U. S., 465), the court says:

It is there shown that the transportation of freight or of the subjects of commerce, for the purpose of exchange or sale, is beyond all question a constituent of commerce itself.

Further on they say:

The transportation of passengers or of merchandise from one State to another is, in its nature, national, admitting of but one regulating power, and it was to guard against the possibility of commercial embarrassments which would result if one State could directly or indirectly tax persons or property passing through it or prohibit particular property from entrance into the State that the power regulating commerce among the States was conferred upon the Federal Government.

Again they say, page 116:

And Congress, under its general power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, may prescribe what articles of merchandise shall be admitted and what excluded, and may therefore admit or not, as it shall deem best, etc.

Still further on in the same opinion, page 119, the court says:

Where the subject is national in its character and admits and requires uniformity of regulation affecting alike all the States, such as transportation between the States, including the importation of goods from one State into another, Congress can alone act upon it and provide the needed regulation.

Now, here is a proposed regulation which its advocates claim is intended to prevent fraud in a matter which is the subject of interstate commerce, and yet the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] claims that an amendment to extend this bill to all fraudulent impositions and practices in articles of interstate commerce is unconstitutional. I submit that if this bill is constitutional the substitute which I have offered certainly is.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me ask the gentleman a question. In all of the cases before the Supreme Court involving the oleomargarine act, or any of its provisions, has there ever been a lawyer who has questioned the right of Congress under the Constitution to pass that act?

Mr. TERRY. The right was doubted, but the Supreme Court having settled that the oleomargarine act was constitutional, that question is res adjudicata. So in this case, the Supreme Court having given its decision in the original-package case, the gentleman from Maine is estopped from saying that the amendment offered by me is unconstitutional, because that question was settled by the Supreme Court in the original-package case so far as it relates to interstate commerce; and it is a novel contention to argue that the Constitution can be invoked to prevent fraudulent impositions in the matter of cheese, but not in the matter of shoddy goods and spurious articles of other kinds.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That filled cheese shall be packed by the manufacturers in wooden packages only, not before used for that purpose, and marked, stamped, and branded with the words "filled cheese" in black-faced letters not less than 2 inches in length, in a circle in the center of the top and bottom of the cheese; and in black-faced letters of not less than 2 inches in length in line from the top to the bottom of the cheese, on the side in four places equidistant from each other; and the package containing such cheese shall be marked in the same manner, and in the same number of places, and in the same description of letters as above provided for the marking of the cheese; and all sales or consignments made by manufacturers of filled cheese to wholesale dealers in filled cheese or to exporters of filled cheese shall be in original stamped packages. Retail dealers in filled cheese shall sell only from original stamped packages, and shall pack the filled cheese when sold in suitable wooden or paper packages, which shall be marked and branded in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Every person who knowingly sells or offers to sell, or delivers or offers to deliver, filled cheese in any other form than in new wooden or paper packages, marked and branded as hereinbefore provided and as above described, or who packs in any package or packages filled cheese in any manner contrary to law, or who falsely brands any package or affixes a stamp on any package denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall upon conviction thereof be fined for each and every offense not more than $500 or be imprisoned not more than one year.

Mr. CHICKERING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 22, page 5, after the word "offense," insert "not less than $100 and."

Mr. CHICKERING. This amendment simply fixes the minimum penalty in cases of violation of the law and provides that it shall be not less than $100. Under the present provision of the bill a man could be brought into court for a violation of this act and be fined $1 and the requirements of the law would be met. I wish to say, in regard to this amendment, that such of the members of the committee that reported the bill as I have spoken to seem to be in favor of the amendment.

Mr. RAY. Will not the gentleman modify that amendment so as to make the amount $50 instead of $100? My experience as a lawyer is that if you make the minimum penalty too large you never get a conviction.

Mr. CHICKERING. I have no objection to accepting that suggestion, and I will modify the amendment accordingly.

Mr. CANNON. With all due respect to the gentleman, I trust that he will further modify it by withdrawing it entirely.

Mr. CHICKERING. That the gentleman declines to do.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; then I have only to say a single word. This section 6 is a very severe section. It provides that—

Retail dealers in filled cheese shall sell only from original stamped packages, and shall pack the filled cheese when sold in suitable wooden or paper packages, which shall be marked and branded in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Under this bill there is imposed upon hundreds of thousands of dealers in the country the duty of literally and strictly complying with these provisions. If any retail dealer, by accident, mistake, or otherwise, should wrap a piece of this cheese in any other than the specified covering he is subjected to what penalty? A fine of not more than $500 and imprisonment not more than one year. If you propose to make your penalties severe, that is a wise provision.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? These penalties are imposed only upon men who knowingly violate the law; who falsely brand these commodities. Now, is there any equity or pity to be invoked in behalf of a man who will falsely brand a food product?

Mr. CANNON. But I am speaking of the retailer.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So am I.

Mr. CANNON. Every man is charged with a knowledge of the law; the gentleman will not dispute that.

Mr. CHICKERING. But in the provision defining this offense the word "knowingly" is used.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; he must "knowingly" put the article in the package. It is not necessary of course to provide that he shall know the law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He must know that he has falsely branded the article, or he can not be convicted.

Mr. CANNON. That is presumed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all; it must be proved.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman deny that the presumption of knowledge of the law runs against the man, and can not be contradicted?

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is a question of fact; and the presumption of fact runs in favor of the man's innocence, not in favor of his guilt. The Government must prove the offense beyond reasonable doubt.

Mr. CANNON. That he knows the law?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is not a question of knowing the law. This is a question of doing a thing. The offense is in doing it knowingly and doing it falsely.

Mr. CANNON. Let us see. An ignorant man engaged as a retailer is presumed to know the law. Although he may be unable to read or write, he is not allowed to dispute the presumption that he knows the law. Now, when a customer comes in, this cheese may be on the counter. The wooden packages or other coverings prescribed by the law may be exhausted. The customer says, "I want a pound of that cheese." The dealer passes out a pound, without putting it in the required package. I suppose he "knowingly" does that. Now, the bill as reported provides that each case shall stand upon its own merits; that the judge may grade the fine down to a dollar or up to $500; that he may send the person to prison for a day or for a year. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHICKERING] now comes in and proposes to amend by providing that the judge shall fine the accused not less than $50. This is all I desire to say about the question. If the House wants to vote for such an amendment, let it do so.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the gentleman in charge of this bill will insist on the provision as reported by the committee rather than that just offered by way of amendment. I will give very briefly my reasons for this suggestion. I speak in the presence of men of experience in the conduct of legal affairs, some of whom have acted in the capacity of judges, others of whom have exercised the pardoning power as chief magistrates of their States, and many others of whom, without having occupied such official positions, have had experience as lawyers.

Now, I think it will be conceded by all the legal fraternity that, so far as may be, minimum penalties ought to be abolished, and, a maximum penalty being provided, the question of the extent of the penalty within the maximum should be left to the court trying the case: It is the experience of those who have participated in legal proceedings that where penalties are made excessive there will inevitably be acquittals in minor cases, the costs of which must fall on the Government. Thus there will often happen a failure of what seems to be a proper prosecution because of the unwillingness to inflict what is deemed too heavy a penalty.

While it is true, as has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio, that the law presumes every person innocent until he is proved guilty, there are certain presumptions arising from the surroundings of the accused. For instance, the possession of goods in a certain condition suggesting a violation of the law devolves upon the person in possession of those goods the necessity of showing affirmatively that there has been no violation of law in the transaction. I believe that the ends of justice will be best subserved and the administration of the law most effectually secured by leaving this provision in the form proposed by the committee, naming simply the maximum penalty, but allowing the court the discretion of fixing any penalty below that maximum which may seem to be proper.

This is no new doctrine with me, nor does it apply to this case alone. In many cases arising under the internal-revenue laws we have already, by acts of Congress since I have been here, abolished minimum penalties and left the maximum standing, thereby confiding the extent of the penalty to the discretion of the court. Others have been recommended to the House, and the tendency of wise legislation, of wise administration in these modern times, has been in the direction indicated, rather than in that which is suggested by the proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCMILLIN) there were—ayes 62, noes 37.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. CHICKERING. I offer a further amendment, Mr. Chairman, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 23, page 5, after the word "not," the following: "less than thirty days, nor."

Mr. CHICKERING. It is the same principle involved in the other amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in section 6, in line 10, page 5, after the word "packages," the following:

"Which shall be marked and branded in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury,"

And insert the following:

"And shall pack the filled cheese sold by them in suitable wooden or paper packages, which shall be marked and branded with the words 'filled cheese' in black-faced letters not less than one-half inch square, in three places equidistant from each other, upon the outside of each package, and in such a manner that at least one of said marks shall be plainly visible on the outside of said package when sold and delivered to the purchaser thereof."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, the bill of the committee in the particular part proposed to be amended here seems to be defective. Suppose, for instance, that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue does not prescribe any regulation for the branding of this commodity. It is simply permissive, and not mandatory. The amendment makes it absolutely obligatory to brand the product for what it really is.

These gentlemen tell us that there is protection in branding soap grease called "filled cheese." This amendment, if adopted, allows the purchaser anywhere in this country, if he chooses to purchase this article, to do so, and he knows exactly what he is getting. There is no mistake about it. There is nothing covered up in the transaction.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this proposition was considered very carefully by the committee, and in view of the fact that it will be an inflexible regulation which the retailer may successfully evade, and that it will be impossible in the future to overcome that evasion except by an amendment of the law, which may be difficult to do, the committee adopted the provision which has been successfully administered with reference to the sale of oleomargarine. As the provision now stands in the bill the matter will be left with the Internal Revenue Department of the Government, where it properly belongs, and where suitable regulations may be made for stamping the retailers' packages. No advantage can be gained by the adoption of the proposed amendment. The matter can be better regulated by a rule of the Department. Then, if the regulations are evaded by the dealers, they can be changed.

Mr. WILBER. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the rules prescribed by the Internal Revenue Bureau with regard to the oleomargarine business, I wish to state that these rules and regulations as made by the Department are not enforced by their own officers. Packages of oleomargarine have been purchased within the past four weeks in open market—in fact, I made a purchase myself in the market here—and the rules and regulations of the Department for branding such oleomargarine, which regulations require that the word "oleomargarine," in letters of a half inch or a quarter of an inch in length, shall be placed on the outside of the package, in a position conspicuous and plainly visible on the package, were not observed; but as a matter of fact the package I purchased was not so branded at all, because from the outside it could not have been determined what it was, for the brand was on the inside of the paper which wrapped the article.

Now, we have agreed to this section, prescribing the branding by the manufacturer, explicitly, and I see no reason for leaving it to the Internal Revenue Department to determine how this branding shall be done, so far as the retailer is concerned. It is right that the public, the people, the consumers, shall be protected, and that the necessary rules and regulations shall be prescribed in every statute governing such matters whereby they may be properly protected, and not be left to the Internal Revenue Department.

I think it is the invariable case that where such specific regulations are laid down in the law they are far more liable to be carried out and followed by the dealers than regulations which may be framed by a Department of the Government.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAWNEY) there were—ayes 52, noes not counted.

Mr. CANNON. There is some misunderstanding, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, there is evidently a misapprehension as to the vote being taken.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the Chair cause the amendment to be again read?

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the question anew, as there seems to have been some misapprehension before.

Mr. DINGLEY. This amendment is to make the marks, as I understand it, as large on a pound of this cheese as on the whole package. It seems to me that the regulation ought to be left to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. We ought not to go into legislation on a little matter like this.

Mr. MORSE. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that debate is not in order. Certainly it is not in order to carry debate on when a vote is being taken.

Mr. DINGLEY. I was showing that the amendment was misunderstood.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the question again.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 55, noes 62.

Mr. MORSE, Mr. SHERMAN, and others demanded tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That all retail and wholesale dealers in filled cheese shall display in a conspicuous place in his or their sales room a sign bearing the words "Filled cheese sold here" in black-faced letters not less than 6 inches in length, upon a white ground, with the name and number of the revenue district in which his or their business is conducted; and any wholesale or retail dealer in filled cheese who fails or neglects to comply with the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction thereof be fined for each and every offense not more than $200.

Mr. CHICKERING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Insert in section 7, line 8, page 6, after the word "offense," the words "not less than $100 and."

Mr. CHICKERING. To make it conform to the other amendment, I will make that $50; so that it will read: "For each and every offense not less than $50."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman modifies his amendment so as to make it read $50 instead of $100.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHICKERING. I move to strike out the last word. I did not hear the Chair make the announcement. I demand a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman should have made the demand before the announcement was made.

Mr. CHICKERING. I did not hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman says he did not hear it, and the Chair will recognize the demand.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to a point of order. It is entirely too late to call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from New York says that he did not hear the announcement, the Chair will now recognize the demand for a division.

Mr. BRUMM. It was made a long time after the Chair announced the result.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had announced the decision, but the gentleman stated that he did not hear.

Mr. BRUMM. Well, a month after he might say he did not hear the result of the division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 33.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHICKERING. Mr. Chairman, the measure now under consideration is of vital importance to the people that I have the honor to represent in this body, as it directly affects every dairyman in three of the leading agricultural counties in the greatest cheese-producing State of the Union. At the last annual meeting of the New York State Grange, held in the city of Binghamton, represented by progressive farmers from every county in the State, a resolution was unanimously passed urging upon Congress to take some action in this important matter. The resolution was sent to me at Washington, containing a request to do all in my power to look after such legislation in connection with this subject as would best conserve the interests of the farmers of the State of New York. Since that time I have received, as doubtless other members of the New York delegation have received, numerous petitions from the various agricultural organizations throughout the State in favor of immediate action by Congress.

The article known as "filled cheese," which has not been manufactured in the United States to any great extent until recently, is produced by a process which has arrived at such a state of perfection as to deceive the public. There are now about 100 factories for the manufacture of this article in the United States, 90 of which are in the State of Illinois, and nearly all in the vicinity of what is known as the Elgin or butter district, in the northern part of the State. The amount produced in the year 1895 was 12,000,000 pounds. The cost per pound is from 3½ to 4 cents. This year, however, the manufacture has increased to such an extent that it is estimated that from the 1st of January to the 1st of April, 1896, 18,000,000 pounds have already been manufactured. According to the report of those best informed, this article is sold on an average of from 1 to 2 cents per pound less than the price of full cream cheese. This being the case, the net profit on last year's production would aggregate $500,000, which goes into the hands of a few manufacturers, jobbers, and retailers who own all the factories, do all the business, and control the entire market.

I do not wonder, Mr. Chairman, that these men oppose the passage of this bill; but I ask, who are better able to pay the tax imposed by the Government than the men who are engaged in destroying the great cheese industry in this country, and thereby adding annually a million dollars to their bank account? The method of manufacturing this article briefly is as follows. This is given that the members of this House may know what they eat when filled or lard cheese is placed before them. This statement is substantially from a gentleman who owns 30 out of the 90 factories in the State of Illinois. He states that in connection with his creameries he buys the milk from the farmers, and by a a process of separation, and by the use of the latest and most improved machinery for that purpose, separates every particle of fat from the milk, leaving what is called skimmed milk. The cream is made into butter and sold as such. The skimmed milk is then taken and there is added to it sufficient uncooked lard to replace the butter fat taken from the milk. Remember, the lard is not cooked, but raised to a temperature of about 130° and the oil pressed out of it. Thirty per cent of that oil is mixed with 70 per cent of skimmed milk, and after adding coloring matter the mixture is manufactured into fancy full cream cheese.

In many cases the article is not branded until the seller gets an order with a request to put such a brand upon it as will please the people of the locality where it is to be sold, and in other cases the retailer puts his own brand upon it. In no case, however, is the cheese sold to the consumer for what it really is, and here is where the greatest fraud is perpetrated. Experts who have examined this article tell us that when first made it is with great difficulty that the fraud can be detected; but after a short time the real quality of the article becomes discovered, and the consumer becomes an enemy of all kinds of cheese, and the whole cheese-making industry is brought into disrepute on account of the fact that the consumer has been made to believe that he has purchased the best quality of the genuine article. There is no question that the reputation of American full cream cheese has been greatly injured by the sale of this article not only in this country but also abroad.

Secretary Morton, in his annual report of 1895, states the case clearly when he says:

> Throughout the year United States cheese has commanded the minimum figure upon the English market. Our cheese has suffered disproportionately to other makes, by the depressed condition of the English cheese market, and reached in 1895 the lowest price ever quoted for American cheese in that country. Our correspondent reports in explanation that the United States cheese is not in favor with the British public, because so much in the past has been adulterated. During the first eight months of last year Canada and the United States stood side by side supplying the English market with cheese; but whereas Canada has this year not only held its own but made a small gain, shipments from the United States have fallen off 117,000 hundredweight, an amount corresponding to the increased shipments of Australasia and Canada and to the falling off in the whole shipments to Great Britain. In fact, every country shipping cheese to Great Britain has this year enlarged its trade with that country except the United States, which has lost over 21 per cent of its last year's business.

While it is hardly fair to attribute this entire loss to the flooding of the European markets with filled cheese, there is no doubt that the shipments of these adulterated goods have had a very unfavorable influence. But the largest damage to our manufacturers of pure cheese comes from the flooding of the manufacturing and mining centers of our own country, especially in Southern sections, with these spurious goods, where thousands upon thousands of boxes are shipped every fall and winter to take the place of genuine cheese. This article goes to Southern markets with the most elegant brands upon it, such as "Extra New York cream," "Added cream," "Double-extra cream cheese," or "Extra Wisconsin cream cheese." It will be observed that while manufacturers may sell it for what it really is and the jobbers may sell it to the retailers in like manner, yet the retailer perpetrates a fraud upon the consumer.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the statement can be safely made that not a pound of the 12,000,000 sold during the year 1895 has been given to the public for what it really was, and that a very large proportion of this worthless article would to-day be decaying on the counters of the dealers if the unsuspecting public had any conception of its real character. The great loss that our American dairymen have suffered in consequence of the prejudice that has arisen by reason of the sale of filled cheese is best illustrated by the great decline in the exports of American cheese from 118,813,685 pounds in 1885 to only 60,448,420 pounds in 1895, while Canada, where the manufacture of filled cheese is prohibited by a law which is strictly enforced, has increased her exports from 61,502,949 pounds in 1885 to 146,004,650 pounds in 1895, and the very best cheese from the United States now sells more readily in London bearing the Canadian brand than under the names which but a few years ago were accepted as a guaranty of all that was honest and best in cheese. Since 1860 the increase in quantity exported by Canada is a thousandfold. Then she exported less than one-hundredth part of the quantity sent from the United States. Now the cheese exports of the former are more than double that of the latter in quantity and nearly 10 per cent greater in value per pound.

Mr. Chairman, in view of these startling facts the question comes to us as the representatives of the people, What can we do to place the American dairymen upon a par with the rest of mankind when his goods reach the markets of the world? I insist that this bill does not go far enough. We should follow the States in our own country and our neighbors across the border, and absolutely prohibit the manufacture and sale of this fraud within the limits of the United States. There is no more reason why the people of Illinois should conduct a business injurious to the great masses of the country than the people of any other State. But let us pass this bill that proposes to tax the manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers, and compels all to brand the article, so that no one can be deceived by it under heavy penalties for violations, with the hope that in this way some good will be accomplished along the line that I have indicated.

Why should any member of this House vote against this proposition, which proposes to make every man who engages in this business honest in his transactions, which treats all alike and makes no discrimination? The benefit of the manufacture and sale of this article without these restrictions does not come to the men whose business, as I have shown, is being ruined by it, and who in these days of financial depression are struggling in many cases under the burden of debt, hoping for relief from the products of their daily toil; nor to the majority of business men who believe in square dealing and honest business methods, but only to a few manufacturers, jobbers, and retail dealers, who are disgracing the great mass of honest producers of a wholesome and necessary article of food and making their pure product a byword wherever this American fraud enters into competition with them in the markets of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have the honor in behalf of the farmers of the State of New York to make a final appeal to the members of this House for favorable action upon this important matter. Statistics tell us that more than nine-tenths of all the cheese produced in this country comes from the States of New York, Wisconsin, Ohio, Illinois, Vermont, Iowa, Pennsylvania, and Michigan, ranking in the order named; but the State of New York, for whose interests I especially plead in this connection, produces alone about one-half of the total product of the United States, and the reputation of the Empire State gives character to the entire cheese output of the Union. It requires the milk of 1,000,000 cows to produce the $25,000,000 worth of cheese made annually in this country; and the State of New York maintains one-half of that number, and adds one-half of that fabulous sum to the material wealth of the country by the manufacture of this one article of food.

Do you wonder, Mr. Chairman, that the people of New York are demanding this legislation? The farmers of New York are passing through the greatest crisis in their history. They have recently seen the prices of all the products of the farm reduced by the action of Congress in breaking down the wall of protection between them and Canada, under the operation of the infamous Wilson bill, which placed upon the free list many articles which they produced and greatly reduced the duty upon all the rest. They have seen the products of a foreign country coming over into their own splendid home markets, which have been built up by the protective policy of the last thirty years, only to destroy and break them down. They have seen the only measure of relief which has thus far been offered, and which passed this House in the early part of the session, expiring in the Senate of the United States at the hands of those who profess to be their friends. And now they come asking Congress to give them relief from this filled-cheese fraud, which, as I have said, is destroying the industry upon which they now depend and which is making their great food product a byword wherever it goes, at home or abroad.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that when the vote is taken upon this question, and the result of our action to-day is flashed from one end of the country to the other and through the public press finds its way to the homes of the farmers of the United States, they will have reason to rejoice that we, as their representatives, have been true to the trust reposed in us, not only by restricting the manufacture and sale of this great fraud, but also in taking a step in the direction of the final overthrow of one of the worst evils that to-day curses the American dairymen. [Great applause.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is not surprising that New York manifests great interest in the pending measure; it is not strange that her Representatives on this floor take unusual interest in its consideration. It would indeed be surprising did they not use their utmost exertion to perfect it, to incorporate into it every possible provision to protect the honest producer of good wholesome milk cheese from unfair competition with the spurious article; manufactured not from pure milk, the combined product of the effort of the farmer, the growth on his beautiful fields, and the natural gift of the docile bovine quadruped, but from a combination or conglomeration of skimmed milk and animal fats with artificial coloring, and having thus, as nearly as may be within their power, perfected the measure, earnestly advocate its passage. And the closer this bill resembles the Wilber bill, the nearer perfection, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, will it be. I would like that bill, but if I can not get it, I will take what most nearly resembles it.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that our special interest should surprise no one, for New York State, the Empire State, first in population, in wealth, in education, in charities, first in commerce, is also first in the dairy industry. Not only first in comparison with any other State, but she lacks but little of being so as compared with all others. Her dairy products nearly equal those of all the other States combined. New York farmers ask no protection from honest competition with their fellows of their own or other States. They do ask—aye, demand—that that competition shall be honest, shall be fair, shall be in the open. They will compete in kind at all times and in all places. They shall not longer be subjected, if their Representatives can prevent it, to an unjust, and to some extent, at least, fraudulent competition with a cheap and inferior article, which hides its real interior beneath a cover which deceives the purchaser and consumer. This bill does not contemplate preventing the manufacture of "filled cheese." It does tear from it the mask behind which it has been parading as full cream cheese; it does deny to its manufacturers the right to reap unreasonable profits at the expense of the dairymen and everyday consumer, and makes the article face the world for what it is, and pay a moderate tax for the privilege of being here at all. The principle involved in the bill is not new. A decade ago a like deception upon butter in the form of oleomargarine, which had increased upon the market to enormous proportions, was regulated by Federal action. That action met, as does this bill, the very earnest opposition of the producers of the substitute, both before and after the passage of the oleomargarine law, but the highest judicial tribunal of the land declared the law constitutional.

I do not know that it is strange to encounter this opposition. The millennium is not here, and few men are satisfied with a moderate profit when it is possible to obtain a large one. You know—

They used to sing some time ago
A rather plaintive song—
Man wants but little here below,
Nor wants that little long.
But nowadays the song is set
To a different rhyme—
Man wants as much as he can get
And wants it all the time.

[Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, while it is in our power to prevent that profit becoming abnormal through deception, and by this measure it is possible, we should exercise that power and the House will to-day do so.

This filled-cheese industry, Mr. Chairman—for I must so denominate a business that last year aggregated 12,000,000 pounds, and if continued unchecked during this year would treble that amount—if unrestricted will absolutely ruin the American cheese industry. But a few years ago the United States cheese led in the markets of the world. Why, Mr. Chairman, but a few years since when wandering through the market of San Francisco, filled as it was with the bounteous products of the beautiful and fertile Pacific Coast, coming to the cheese market I asked from whence came the best cheese, and was answered, "Herkimer County, N. Y." That is within my Congressional district, and the other county in that district, Oneida County, makes just as good. The statement was true then. It is true to-day. The same answer would then have been given at Liverpool. Not so to-day. The answer now at Liverpool would be "Canada." Why? Not because we do not make the same high grade now as then, but because so much of this spurious cheese has crept into the market from the United States that it prejudices the buyer against all.

Meantime Canada has shown the greatest wisdom in furnishing every protection to her farmers that is possible. She has amply protected them from the spurious articles of oleomargarine and filled cheese, and as the result has given to them larger and better markets, and withal a reputation everywhere for pure products that have carried into the farmers' pockets a large increase in money. The very fact that under her wise laws her exports have doubled in ten years while ours have decreased is a most eloquent argument why we should follow her example in this kind of legislation. It is a curious fact that American cheese in the Liverpool market bearing a Canadian brand will bring a higher price than the same cheese bearing an American brand. Pass this bill and the prestige of the American cheese will be restored. The price will return to its former plane. The American farmer will be materially aided. The profit that now goes into the hands of the few manufacturers of filled cheese will be distributed among the thousands of farmers all over the land. A slight remedy will be afforded the farmer for the ugly competition of the Canadian farmer, which has worked so disastrously to our citizens upon the frontier.

This bill is a wise one, moreover, because it furnishes a protection to the purchaser. It is a travesty upon our national honor that we allow a spurious article to pass current with a false brand. To label lard cheese as full cream cheese is a crime and is unjust to the innocent purchaser. If it is to be manufactured at all, let it be sold in the open for just what it is. Let the customer know without equivocation just what he is purchasing. If the manufacturers and retailers do not care to be honest in their transactions in this article, let the American Congress compel them to be. [Applause.]

This bill compels honest dealing. Do we want it, or shall the American market be a perpetual masquerade ball? It provides additional revenue. Do we need it? Let the $262,000,000 of bonds issued in time of peace give answer. It furnishes a measure of protection to the American farmer. Does he need it? Let the price of farm products, the condition of the farming communities throughout the land, during the past year or more give answer. The New York farmer, the American farmer, wants protection from fraud within and protection from cheap wages and poor homes without, and after he has had an opportunity to speak at the ballot box he will have it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CANNON. I call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to section 9, where I propose to offer an amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, so far as I was concerned, I had consented to a change in the amount of the tax in that section; but there is now brought back to my mind the fact that the representatives of this filled-cheese industry asked us to strike out of the bill as it was originally prepared the 2-cent tax, the oleomargarine tax, and agreed that if this product was to be taxed at all the rate should be 1 cent per pound. Therefore I think the gentleman from Illinois ought not to try to do that which the parties directly interested did not ask to have done.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, on page 7, line 2, before the word "one," I move to insert the words "one-half of," so that it will read, "one-half of 1 cent," etc.

The gentleman from Ohio says that the manufacturers asked that this tax should be reduced from 2 cents to 1 cent a pound. I am in no sense representing the manufacturers of filled cheese. We can afford to be honest with each other, whether we are honest with the balance of the world or not. [Laughter.] I represent in part the men who furnish the milk that goes into this product, and in part those who raise the hogs from which the neutral lard is obtained; and those two classes are a majority of the people of this country. Gentlemen agonize here about protecting "the farmer," but when you scratch them you find that what they are after is not protecting the farmer, but protecting the dairyman who is engaged exclusively in that branch of agriculture and who is seeking not to raise revenue by this bill, but to wipe out competition.

Mr. TAWNEY. Fraudulent competition.

Mr. CANNON. I am perfectly willing to join hands with my friend to prevent the counterfeiting of any food product in this country, and I have no reason to say that he has at heart any desire to go beyond that; but I do say that there are gentlemen here who have avowed within the last fifteen minutes that this bill is but one step toward preventing competition, toward prohibiting the making of this article at all.

Mr. CHICKERING. That is just what I said and just what I meant.

Mr. CANNON. That is just what the gentleman said and just what he meant. Now, then, we have the issue sharply and squarely drawn. I would not, if I had the power, prevent any citizen of the United States from making this or any other food product. I will prohibit him from coming with a falsehood in his mouth and in his hand, representing that his product is something which it is not. But, Mr. Chairman, I have yet to learn that we are to establish a system of economy in this country that is to tax one citizen who is engaged in an industry for the benefit of another citizen. I was never instructed in that school of economy, and, when the purpose is openly avowed, it shall not be carried out here without my protest being uttered against it. When it goes to the extent of proposing to wipe out competition by a law enacted for that purpose, and when it is avowed that the suppression of a counterfeit is a mere pretext, if that is "the size of it," I will have none of it by my vote. Other gentlemen may if they want to. Now, I want to say, after inquiry, that a tax of one-half a cent a pound, with the license fees, will pay all the expense of collecting this tax twenty times over.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But will you get any revenue?

Mr. CANNON. Revenue! We do not want to get any revenue in this way. God forbid that we should get revenue by any form of internal taxation any longer than it is necessary. Correct principle forbids that in the name of revenue we should come in here and tax the man who has skimmed milk to sell or the man who has hogs or neutral lard to sell because he makes a product that competes with some other citizen's product.

Mr. CHICKERING. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHICKERING. Why does the gentleman propose a tax of one-half a cent a pound, then?

Mr. CANNON. Because I believe in branding this article truly, and I am willing to use the agency of the Government for that purpose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The cost of this product is shown by the figures, about which there is no controversy, to be not greater than 4½ cents a pound. A tax of 1 cent, which is half of the original tax upon oleomargarine imposed by the law for which, I rejoice to say, my friend from Illinois voted as a member of the House——

Mr. TAWNEY. He made a speech for it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; he made a very eloquent speech on behalf of that bill; a better one, if possible, than the one he has made just now. [Laughter.] But I say, Mr. Chairman, that a tax of 1 cent per pound has been fixed upon at the suggestion of the manufacturers themselves. They came to the committee and said, "We are entirely willing, if you are going to pass this bill at all, that you shall lay a tax of 1 cent a pound instead of 2 cents, as was the original proposition."

Just a word further. Something has been said about standing by the poor man—the man who eats poor cheese, as I understood the illustration. Let me tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] something that he will probably value more in the future than he does in the present. These manufacturers and wholesale dealers and retailers of filled cheese have been selling this cheese, as the record here abundantly shows, as high as 11 and 12 cents a pound. How were they able to do that? By suppressing the fact that it was filled cheese—not the genuine New York, Wisconsin, or Ohio full cream cheese.

Mr. BRUMM. Now, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Wait a moment. If it is wise to legislate so that some people can get "cheap cheese," let us force these manufacturers and dealers to tell the truth to the man to whom they offer this article, and he will very soon learn that the actual value of this filled cheese does not exceed one-half the value of what they are trying to sell it for.

Mr. BRUMM. Permit me right there. You contend, then, that by the passage of this bill you will prevent the maker of filled cheese from asking an exorbitant price for it; that, in other words, you will bring him down to a fair profit?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am arguing that by the passage of this bill we will compel the filled-cheese man to "tell the truth."

Mr. BRUMM. But the object is to bring down the price.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I knew a man once to get elected President of the United States by using just that form of expression. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. I hope you will not shirk the question. You say, do you not, that the object of this bill is to cheapen the price? If not, why do you assert that the manufacturers or dealers now get 10 or 12 cents a pound?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not say that the object is to cheapen the price.

Mr. BRUMM. What is the purpose, then?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Just what I have repeated over and over again. But when the gentleman says that we are going to enhance the price——

Mr. BRUMM. Oh, I did not say that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That he wants his constituents to get "cheap cheese," we say the way to get cheap cheese is to put a brand on this filled cheese which will indicate the cost, and thus we cheapen the production beyond all reasonable doubt.

Mr. BRUMM. Will you not cheapen the article still more by reducing the tax to half a cent a pound?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Nobody who is in favor of this bill wants the tax reduced.

Mr. BRUMM. That is no answer to my question. Now, permit me to ask one more question, and I will not trouble you further.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield to the gentleman with very great pleasure.

Mr. BRUMM. You are always very kind. The tax on oleomargarine, as I understand, is 2 cents a pound?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is right.

Mr. BRUMM. And you want to put a tax of 1 cent a pound on filled cheese?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is just what we are going to do.

Mr. BRUMM. Now, what is the retail price of oleomargarine on an average?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not say.

Mr. BRUMM. What is the cost price?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Seven or eight cents a pound. We have tried to put all these figures at about the relative proportion there is between filled cheese and oleomargarine.

Mr. BRUMM. Then I have only to say that if the cost of oleomargarine is only 7 cents a pound your oleomargarine law did not reduce the price of oleomargarine at all, because the article is selling as high as butter to-day, and the tax you now propose on filled cheese is much higher in proportion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not working here for filled cheese or for low-priced cheese; but I am determined that the people of this country, so far as my humble efforts may avail, shall have the opportunity to know when they are buying filled cheese that they are buying an article which has not cost as much as the full milk cheese.

Mr. OTEY. Will the gentleman please tell me how much revenue this bill is expected to yield? What is the estimate?

Mr. GROSVENOR. We expect to get enough to pay expenses and to do something to help out the Democratic Administration. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OTEY. I should like the gentleman to answer my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has expired.

Mr. OTEY. Does the gentleman decline to answer my question? I want to know what is the estimate of the committee as to the amount of revenue which will be derived from this tax of 1 cent a pound.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We have never made any estimate.

Mr. OTEY. Then, this is a tax bill without an estimate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is right. But there is one estimate——

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Chairman, is a substitute in order?

The CHAIRMAN. A substitute for what?

Mr. OTEY. For the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. OTEY. Can I offer a substitute for the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can move to amend the amendment.

Mr. OTEY. Very well. I move to amend the amendment so as to strike out "half a cent" and insert "1 mill."

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is thinking about "millimeters" now. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on Mr. OTEY'S amendment to the amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. OTEY. Can I not have time to answer the gentleman from Ohio? He asked me a question, as I understood.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CANNON, it was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill and read section 14, as follows:

SEC. 14. That whenever any stamped package containing filled cheese is emptied it shall be the duty of the person in whose hands the same is to destroy the stamps thereon; and any person who willfully neglects or refuses so to do shall, for each such offense, be fined not exceeding $50 or imprisoned not less than ten days nor more than six months.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 14.

This brings up, sir, the question of imprisonment for what is really not a crime, again.

I understood the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TAWNEY] on yesterday to ask me a question——

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to correct the gentleman—Minnesota.

Mr. OTEY. I accept the correction, and beg your pardon. A much greater State, I expect, in minerals than Michigan.

The gentleman from Minnesota asked me a question on yesterday as to who paid this tax. I understood him to ask who paid the penalty, and answered, "The man who violated the law." Of course if I had known that he asked the question, "Who paid the tax?" I would have stated the consumer. I wanted the correction made this morning, but as it was not then in order, I desire to put it in here.

But now you propose to imprison a man because he does not destroy some little package that had a 1-cent stamp on it. The stamp has been already canceled, and there is no reason to subject the citizens of this country to punishment of this character by revenue officers coming up and arresting them for not doing a trifling act of that kind that may have been forgotten, and I hope very much that the section will be stricken out of the bill. It ought not to be there at all.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. OTEY, it was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read section 18, as follows:

SEC. 18. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make all needful regulations for the carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new section, to be known as section 19, between sections 18 and 19 of the printed bill as follows:

"SEC. 19. That no existing law or part of law which authorizes or allows compromises or settlements with offenders shall apply to any offenders under this act after the first violation of any of the provisions hereof."

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Under the general provisions of law relating to the Internal Revenue Bureau, we find section 3229, which provides in terms for compromises in cases of violation of the internal-revenue law, and in such cases there shall be filed in the office of the Commissioner the opinion of the solicitor of internal revenue, with his reasons therefor, including a statement of the amount of tax assessed, and the additional tax or penalty imposed by law because of the neglect or delinquency of the person against whom the tax is assessed, as well as the amount actually paid under the compromise.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to extending the provisions of any law which authorizes a minor officer of the Government to compromise cases against violators of law. As a matter of fact, it places the pardoning power in the hands of an officer connected with the Internal Revenue Bureau. This should not be done.

The amendment I have offered relates only to subsequent violations. It is a violation of the law, which must be presumed to be a willful violation, that we propose in this wise to bring to sure punishment. There is a real need for an exhibition of the "strong hand" on the part of the Government.

I have in my hand, for instance, the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means upon this bill, and find, from the testimony presented, that it has been the general practice to compromise cases of this character; and certain parties make a business of compromising. They find it cheaper to compromise than to comply with the law; and on page 78 of the hearings I find that a single firm in Washington has paid some $3,000 in the past few years in the way of compromises. That ought not to be allowed. When a person has once violated the law and been convicted of the violation, there should be no further compromise in his case, but he should be compelled to bear the penalties of the law, be brought into court and branded by the proper judgment as a willful violator of the law.

I repeat we ought not to place in the hands of the internal-revenue officers the power to pardon such crimes as this.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will allow me, I would like to have this amendment again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman will see the purpose of this amendment——

Mr. DINGLEY. You propose to apply that simply to this law?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not know exactly, of course, what effect that provision may have or to what extent the compromises may be authorized by existing law. But the proposition here would establish the principle that the administration of this particular law should be different from the administration of all other internal-revenue laws. Now, I think we ought not to enter upon such a course of legislation as that. I think we ought to know exactly the result before we undertake to adopt this amendment.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the statute. Let me read the entire section to which I have referred in brief. I read section 3229, which is in the following terms:

SEC. 3229. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the advice and consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, may compromise any civil or criminal case arising under the internal-revenue laws instead of commencing suit thereon; and, with the advice and consent of the said Secretary and the recommendation of the Attorney-General, he may compromise any such case after a suit thereon has been commenced. Whenever a compromise is made in any case there shall be placed on file in the office of the Commissioner the opinion of the Solicitor of Internal Revenue, or of the officer acting as such, with his reasons therefor, with a statement of the amount of tax assessed, the amount of additional tax or penalty imposed by law in consequence of the neglect or delinquency of the person against whom the tax is assessed, and the amount actually paid in accordance with the terms of the compromise.

Now, under that provision there have been compromises in this city, with a single firm, as much as $3,500. It is made profitable for them to compromise rather than comply with the law, and I propose that on subsequent violations there shall be no such thing as compromise.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The law requires—and I have no doubt it has been complied with—that the reasons for the compromise shall be filed of record. Has the gentleman examined the record and found that there was a state of facts that did not justify the compromises that the Commissioner said he made?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. If the gentleman will turn to the hearing, on page 77, it is practically conceded by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and he there promises to make no further compromises. It shows this law is abused and that it is profitable to offenders to compromise or buy immunity. I do not believe in the purchase or sale of indulgences to commit crimes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Has there been any perversion of justice by the compromises?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It seems to be conceded by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue himself.

Mr. MCMILLIN. No such thing was conceded by the Commissioner.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Let the gentleman read the hearings before his own committee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I heard them, and I have read them in addition. Now, before the gentleman criticises what the Commissioner of Internal Revenue does, and proposes, as stated by my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], to change the whole system of the administration of internal-revenue laws as applied to this statute that we are about to enact, it strikes me that he ought to be sure that there is justice in his criticism. The reasons have been filed, and if they are wrong, it is very easy for the gentleman to show that.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I am thoroughly satisfied, and I have simply taken the evidence in the hearings. I find on page 77 that persons have been given unqualified assurance that they will be protected. They are protected in their violations by the wholesale dealers, and that $3,500 has been paid by a single firm. That fact of itself proves it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And the presumption is that the officers of the Government acted wisely, and that that was the best thing for the Government to do?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No; it shows that the law has been abused.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, when interrogated before the committee upon this subject, stated in answer to a question by my colleague [Mr. TAWNEY] as follows:

Mr. TAWNEY. When they come up and pay, do you dismiss the case?

Commissioner MILLER. It depends on what they pay and what the circumstances are. Compromise is vested in the office; but we exercise it only where we are satisfied. We always get a favorable report from the district attorney. There was one case in which we required $2,200 or $2,250 to be paid. There was one case in my own State where we got $1,800 recently. He had been indicted before.

Again, Mr. Miller says:

I do not want to be misunderstood. In all cases where there are cases in court action by the Department is never taken without the consent of the district attorney.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Exactly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that to take one single item of the internal-revenue law and put a different rule upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with reference to that is not wise. What may be the wisdom of a change of the whole power given to the Commissioner is not a pertinent question here and now, but to single out this item as though the violation of this law was a greater offense than that of "all those upon whom the tower in Siloam fell" is, it seems to me, unwise, and on that I differ with the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not only that, but it will tend to bring this law into disrepute.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It will tend to bring this law into disrepute; it will tend to rouse public sentiment against a law like this. Let this law be put upon the same plane of administration as all the other laws upon kindred subjects.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to some of the facts, because we ought to legislate intelligently here. We are not changing the body of internal-revenue law as it exists now, but we are passing a law relating to this subject which is a new one. This law ought to be right. Now, let me again call attention to page 78 of the testimony of Mr. Oyster, president of the National Dairy Union, who knows whereof he speaks. He says, speaking of this matter of compromises, they are made by the Department, and that cases were compromised before the parties had any hearing. He says that one firm are selling four or five hundred tubs of oleomargarine per week, and of course the small fine of $50 does not cut any figure. Here is his exact language:

Mr. OYSTER. They assured me at the Department that cases were compromised before they had any hearing. A firm selling oleomargarine sells from four to five hundred tubs a week. The small fine of $50 does not cut any figure. I am told that one firm paid $3,500 in fines; but that is nothing compared to the money they make. They make more money in a week selling oleomargarine than that fine would amount to.

I submit, gentlemen, that you ought not to place a premium upon wrongdoing, on willful violations of the law. Where a man willfully persists in violating the law, let him be brought into court and submit to the judgment of the court. In that way he will find it profitable to cease doing wrong. We ought to make it difficult to do wrong and easy to do right, and we never can accomplish that by making it easier for a man with kid gloves to slip around behind the door and settle his offenses instead of going into court, where the average poor criminal has to come and submit to the sentence of the court.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Would not your amendment and your argument apply with equal force to all violations of the internal-revenue law?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It would, but we are making new law on this question, and I am not willing that the abuses of the past shall be carried into the new law.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But in making this new law, you make a distinction between that and the whole system of administering the internal-revenue law.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I do that because, as the gentleman well knows, and as every other person well knows, we are dealing here with an actual fraud. Nobody denies it. Neither can a person who has been convicted of a violation stand up and claim that he is innocent. Let us deal with this subject frankly. The man who knowingly uses this "filled cheese" is the exception. The great majority intend to use full cream cheese and buy it as such, paying full price therefor. The manufacturer and wholesale dealer, while he does not deceive his immediate purchaser as to the character of the product, knows full well that somebody along the line will practice a fraud and impose the product upon the consumer—that the spurious inferior product will be palmed off on the swindled consumer for a pure and superior article and at a good price. Its very inferiority makes it profitable to carry on the business, and the manufacturer and wholesaler usually pay these compromises. Even in the name the stuff bears the dishonest practice is made manifest. It is the best illustration I know of "stealing the livery of heaven in which to serve the devil." There can be no such thing as a legitimate trade in a counterfeit. Willful counterfeits in either money or a food product should be punished. The practice should be wiped out.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But also does not your amendment say that the officers, the district attorney and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, will all unite in making it possible for willful violators of this law to take advantage of his violation——

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Nothing of the kind. I simply take away from them the discretion to pardon crime; and that power ought not to be vested in any officer connected with the Internal Revenue Bureau.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But does not the history of these violations of the internal-revenue law establish the fact that where persons have willfully and repeatedly violated the internal-revenue law they have to pay large sums for a compromise?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. They have not to pay large sums. The gentleman well knows, because of his investigation, that this very fact has led to a constant increase of crime. While it has placed some money in the Treasury, it has increased crime in those States where compromises have been practiced. It is only where we know that crime will certainly be punished that crime ceases.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Does the gentleman regard this as a crime, while these internal-revenue laws are not really crimes in a great many instances?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. There is hardly a more indefensible crime against every honest sentiment of honor and virtue in the country than the adulteration of an important food product, and a man who knowingly sells this stuff, which they call filled cheese, as full cream cheese can make but small claim to honor.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That may be; but while it may be a violation of the law, he may do it unwittingly.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. For that reason I provide it shall not apply on the first violation, but after the first violation.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But your amendment provides that it shall apply after the first violation. Why do not you make it apply after the first conviction, and not after the first violation? A man may violate a law a number of times and never be called to account for it.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. And never will be convicted if you allow them to sneak out in this sort of way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It strikes me this would be applying a very severe penalty for what may be practically a technical offense. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, while no man on the floor of this House is more earnestly in favor of the passage of this bill than myself, yet I hope this amendment will not be adopted. The Government of the United States has established a policy in treating with offenders against the internal-revenue laws of the United States, and if we want a law to be popular and to be effective, to be enforced, we must be consistent in our legislation, in our acts; and if we single out this bill, if it becomes law—and I have no doubt it will—if we single this bill out and provide special penalties, and then provide that there shall be no compromise in certain cases, we shall attract the attention of the whole country to it; we shall invite criticism, we shall invoke antagonisms, and the law will be ineffective and unpopular. Now, I hope every friend of this bill will vote against this amendment.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I will modify my amendment by striking out the words "violation of" and inserting "conviction on"; so that it will read "after the first conviction on any of the provisions hereof."

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the more you discuss this bill the more you develop the fact that the bill is a fraud from beginning to end. Here is an amendment offered to put into your bill the same provision that you have in the revenue bill; and yet you get this bill upon the floor of the House because it is a revenue bill. You can not get it here in any other way this session. You get it here because, as my genial friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] says, "we want revenue." You put it in here under the pretext of being a revenue bill. It can not be here in any other way; and when you do that you should apply to it the same rules that you apply to your internal-revenue law. Then you all get up and say, "Do not do that," because it will let the cat out of the bag and develop the true hideousness of the bill. It will invite criticism from everybody in the country, and every man of you will vote against it. I submit that those who are honest in this matter will apply the same rule to this that we shall apply to every other internal-revenue law. I am with you, brother, and I will vote with you. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. DINGLEY. One moment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has certainly misapprehended the character of the amendment. As it stands it applies the internal-revenue laws exactly as they exist.

Mr. BRUMM. I understand what the amendment is.

Mr. DINGLEY. You have got it wrong end to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The noes seem to have it; the noes have it, and the amendment is lost.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, what has become of my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been submitted to the committee and voted on and declared lost. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that not one gentleman in twenty-five heard the result.

The CHAIRMAN. There were about three ayes and a large volume of noes. The Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it, the noes have it, and the amendment is lost. The gentleman from Nebraska and the gentleman from Pennsylvania were engaged in a little private conversation and he did not hear the result, but the amendment was declared lost.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I certainly did not hear the result.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the amendment will again be submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Chair is perfectly willing to submit it again. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the Chair will again submit the question on the amendment.

The question was again taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment in the form of a new section, to be numbered 18½.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no such section.

Mr. BRUMM. I am going to offer one and call it that, as I have a perfect right to do. I want to offer something that will be of real benefit to the farmer.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no question before the House.

Mr. BRUMM. This is an amendment which the gentleman will not oppose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let us know what it is.

Mr. BRUMM. I know you can not oppose it, because you are a friend of the farmer and you want revenue.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is it?

Mr. BRUMM. I want to offer as section 18½ the wool schedule of the McKinley bill. [Laughter.] I know you will not oppose that, will you?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. BRUMM. You will! Then I shall have to withdraw it. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That this act shall go into effect on the ninetieth day after its passage, and all wooden packages containing 10 or more pounds of filled cheese found on the premises of any dealer on and after the ninetieth day succeeding the date of the passage of this act shall be deemed to be taxable under section 8 of this act, and shall be taxed, and shall have affixed thereto the stamps, marks, and brands required by this act or by regulations made pursuant to this act; and for the purpose of securing the affixing of the stamps, marks, and brands required by this act, the filled cheese shall be regarded as having been manufactured and sold or removed from the manufactory for consumption or use on or after the day this act takes effect; and such stock on hand at the time of the taking effect of this act may be stamped, marked, and branded under special regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may authorize the holder of such packages to mark and brand the same and to affix thereto the proper tax-paid stamps.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I have listened very attentively to the discussion upon this bill, I have listened to its reading twice, and I have come to the conclusion that it is a vicious piece of legislation from beginning to end. It is protection run mad. There is only one redeeming feature in the bill; that is the provision requiring manufacturers of filled cheese to mark their product so that those who buy it to sell or for consumption may know just what they are doing, may know the kind of goods they are dealing in.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that this bill seems to be a proposition to license that which is wrong, dodging the question by calling the license fee a "tax." It seems to me that the very term "filled cheese" is a misnomer. The idea which it conveys to my mind is that of an external case composed of something comparatively good, the interior being filled up with impure matters, destructive of health and of life, and I believe that in licensing it under cover of this bill you are giving the countenance of the Government to the carrying on of a business that is wrong, and you will be taxing one party for the benefit of another.

On the other hand, if it is admitted that this product is not injurious to health, then this bill is wrong in principle, wrong in theory, destructive in practice, and in violation of the theory of the Government under which we live. It is framed and based upon the same principle upon which Congress acted when they imposed a tax of 10 per cent upon State banks of issue, so as to crush them out of existence and give the business of banking into the hands of national banks, thus enabling those institutions to levy tribute upon all other kinds of business enterprises by demanding exorbitant rates of interest upon all loans, thus imitating the robber barons of the Rhine of old, who from their palaces fired a shot across the bow of every passing craft, and descending like hawks from the rocks robbed and tore their victims till their greed was satisfied or the strength of the victim became exhausted.

These national banks have arranged themselves to so adjust the finances of the country as to utilize them for the benefit of one class, and that a very small class of the country. That is what they have done, and it has been completely done. The result has been that by means of their monopoly they have acquired such power that they now control this whole country, they manipulate conventions, control State and national legislation; they corrupt the jury box, control the judges, control the decisions of the courts; and if we pass this bill it will have a like effect in respect to this business of the manufacturing of cheese. It will create a monopoly for the manufacture of cheese of all kinds. The small fish will be driven out, the large ones will swallow them up, and the business will be entirely monopolized by a few, so as to raise the price to the consumer, and the great mass of the people will at last be the sufferers by having the price of all grades of cheese raised enormously.

I am opposed to the principle of this bill. It is vicious in tendency; it is destructive in practice; it is against the very theory of our Government, and I hope that every part of the bill will be stricken out except the provision requiring the manufacturers of these products to mark it so that those who buy it either for dealing or consumption may know what they are buying and see just what they are doing. If you wish to enact that part of the bill, I see no objection to it; but let us not go on and establish a monopoly and give it power to crush out the small industries of the country, which have a hard time to make a living now. Let the small fry have the right to continue business without a tax. Equal rights to all, and special privileges to none, should be our motto; and let us in shaping legislation beware lest we should tax one industry to build up another, which is both undemocratic and un-American. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, on page 9, in line 24, I move to strike out "eight" and insert "nine."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] desires to offer a substitute.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, if there are no other amendments to be offered, I ask that my substitute be read.

The substitute proposed by Mr. TERRY was read as printed above.

Mr. TERRY. I desire to state that this amendment is in line with the professed object of this bill. In this connection, I wish to submit an extract from a letter received from a worthy farmer in my district, Mr. John Nesbitt, and relating to just this question. He says:

Everything that farmers have need of is sold to them in every shape and form under a false brand, and very inferior articles seem to be sent down to us in the Southern States, and the plows are duplicated and of inferior grade, trace chains not half welded and of inferior iron, our harness filled with scraps of leather, our wagons of inferior timber, our clothing of shoddy, and our shoes of paper or scraps of wood in sole, shavings of leather glued together, and the first wet they fall to pieces—and other things too numerous to mention.

Now, sir, if the gentlemen supporting this bill are in earnest, if they want to stop fraud upon the purchasers of these articles of interstate commerce, why not make the bill apply to all such articles? Why single out the one commodity cheese and apply these provisions to it? I tell you, sir, when gentlemen speak of fraudulent practices, this bill itself is a miserable fraudulent pretense, which, under the guise of protecting the consumer, tries to strike down a competitor in a particular branch of industry, who, as the testimony shows, furnishes an article just as good as that which this bill seeks to protect. I have heard very reputable gentlemen on this floor who have eaten both kinds of cheese say that they can not tell one from the other; and the fact that the two articles command, as has been stated here, nearly the same price, shows what is the real merit of the article which you propose to strike down. But when you have imposed all the onerous restrictions of this bill upon what you call "filled cheese," the price of the other will be raised, or its grade be lowered, to the injury of the consumer, and the poor and the country merchant will get the worst of it.

Gentlemen who are supporting this bill want simply to get rid of a competitor in a particular industry under the guise of trying to protect the public. And I want to say that when this legislation has been enacted, and when the people see the results of it, you will hear from them. You are proposing to tax the little country merchant $40 for the privilege of selling the people the kind of cheese that they want.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; $12.

Mr. TERRY. It was $40 in the bill as you offered it; but no matter what may be the amount. Even $12 is perhaps more than the profits of the cheese that the country dealer sells in a whole year would amount to. Virtually, this bill will amount in the rural districts to prohibition against dealing in this article of cheese, which is cheaper and just about as good as the other. You will hear from the people on this subject, and the majority of them will be found opposed to such vicious legislation as this. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, step by step everything is coming our way in this country. I certainly find myself in a most delightful condition when a gentleman purporting to belong to the late Democratic party is found solemnly——

Mr. TERRY. You have sung that requiem before. You and your party have assumed several times that the Democratic party was dead; but you will find it a very lively corpse when you have put up your candidate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. A gentleman belonging to the late Democratic party comes here with a proposition that the United States shall undertake to regulate the manufacture of all the commodities that the people of his State are engaged in making or consuming. This is an obliteration of the old doctrine about which we have had considerable trouble heretofore both in war and peace; and I welcome the gentleman into the purer light and better atmosphere of the great party which believes that the Congress of the United States has some power to legislate in the interest of the people of this country.

Mr. TERRY. Democracy does not deny the power of Congress to legislate in the interest of the people, but that is not your bill. Certainly the "party of great moral ideas" when it undertakes to do a thing should not do it under false pretenses. If you are sincerely seeking the benefit of the consumer you should adopt some consistent and general legislation—not this cheeseparing legislation proposed here.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has fired his "farewell shot o'er the grave where his hero is buried." He has repeated the same speech which we heard upon the oleomargarine bill not very many years ago. Yet I have not heard that the people of this country have ever risen up in opposition to that bill. I think that the gentleman is entirely too anxious for the future of the men who are going to vote for this bill. This bill is upheld by the popular demand of an immense interest in the country. We will do our duty and look to the future for our vindication.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether in any section it is made clear that the enactment shall in no way affect the administration of the State laws relating to the traffic in filled cheese? I am prompted to ask this question because I find in the oleomargarine law an express provision that the laws of the States shall not be affected by the passage of a national law on the subject. In a recent case before the Supreme Court the point was made that the oleomargarine statute affected the laws of the States; and the court held that it did not, because it contained an express provision which prevented any repeal of State statutes by the United States statute. If that point has not been considered in connection with this bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind gentlemen that the question is now upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

Mr. TERRY. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], I will state that this amendment applies only to articles which are the subjects of interstate commerce; and it is in harmony with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 31, noes 109.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by adding a new section at the end of the bill in the following words:

That section 3243 of the Revised Statutes shall be, so far as applicable, extended to the provisions of the present act.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done now, the Chair thinks, by unanimous consent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think, Mr. Chairman, that this is already included in the bill, on page 3.

Mr. MOODY. I rose, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of making an inquiry. I find the section is already in the bill, and withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I now renew the motion that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House with favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8008, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and as so amended recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask the previous question on the bill and the amendments to its passage.

Mr. OWENS. Can a motion to recommit be now submitted?

The SPEAKER. Not just at this moment.

Mr. OWENS. After the previous question is ordered?

The SPEAKER. It can then be offered.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. OWENS. Now, if in order, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it should be after the amendments are acted upon. The motion will be in order when the bill has been passed to a third reading.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I now offer the following motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report a bill providing for marking and branding packages of what is known as "filled cheese" for interstate trade, and providing penalties for violating said provisions, but omitting the tax and license fees provided for in the bill now under consideration.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 27, noes 129.

So the motion was rejected.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN and others. On that let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 160, nays 58, not voting 136; as follows:

RETURN OF A BILL FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following concurrent resolution; which was read by the Clerk:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the enrolled joint resolution (S. 116) authorizing the Public Printer to print the Annual Report of the Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in quarto form and to bind it in one volume, for the purpose of correcting errors in the text.

The resolution was agreed to.

VENTILATION OF THE HOUSE WING OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. ATWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be asked to detail an expert on heating and ventilating from the office of the Supervising Architect, to carefully examine the plans submitted to the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics for an improved system of ventilating the south (House) wing of the Capitol, and that he be authorized to report to said Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics at the regular meeting of the committee on April 23, 1896, his opinion of the proposed plans, with suggestions and recommendations for such alterations as in his estimation would improve the proposed plans and better the present system of ventilation.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts who submits these plans, by whom are they drawn?

Mr. DINGLEY. They are plans in the possession of the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I wish to know by whom they were drawn?

Mr. ATWOOD. There are several plans before the committee for consideration, and we simply desire that the expert engineer having in charge the heating and ventilating of the Federal buildings under the Supervising Architect shall examine these different plans and submit to the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics his report as an expert. This resolution carries no appropriation with it, and I hope it will pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HARDY. I object.

Mr. DINGLEY. This only calls for the report of an expert upon these plans.

Mr. HARDY. I will withdraw my objection if the Speaker will allow me to say a word about the matter. I understand that the Committee on Ventilation have before them a plan to appropriate $100,000 for the ventilation of this Hall. I understand further that there are other plans before the committee for the ventilation of this Hall which will not cost $10.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Well, what the committee want is to have the expert ventilating architect of the Government tell them which plan is the best, or whether either of them is good for anything.

A MEMBER. What is the proposed plan?

Mr. HARDY. One of the plans is for ventilating by some kind of a process whereby the air is driven out by chemical means. I understand further, Mr. Speaker, that the proposition before the committee to which I particularly refer not only carries an appropriation of $100,000, but there are some pet schemes before the committee——

Mr. DINGLEY. Let the expert examine them.

Mr. HARDY. If the matter is to be left to a number of scientists or to a number of gentlemen and ladies, whoever they may be, who understand these things, and if the committee will give them an opportunity to be heard, I will withdraw my objection, and I do now withdraw it.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion, in order that I may offer a resolution to which I think there will be no objection.

PRELIMINARY SURVEY, SALMON BAY, PUGET SOUND.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk. It is a matter of emergency, and unless it passes to-night it will not be of any avail.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 104) directing the Secretary of War to transmit to Congress a report on survey of the waterway connecting the waters of Puget Sound, at Salmon Bay, with Lakes Union and Washington, and to submit an estimate of the cost of constructing said waterway.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to Congress the report of Capt. Thomas W. Symons, Corps of Engineers, dated August 29, 1895, together with the accompanying report of the assistant engineer, upon the survey of the waterway connecting the waters of Puget Sound, at Salmon Bay, with Lakes Union and Washington; also to submit an estimate of the cost of constructing the said waterway on the route described and laid down in the aforesaid report.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will ask the gentleman from Oregon if this is an attempt to start a new project for the river and harbor bill?

Mr. HERMANN. No; I will say that it is not. It is an old project; but the local engineer was requested to forward certain data with regard to the commerce of that section of the Pacific Coast. The data are now before the Secretary of War, but he is not permitted to transmit it to Congress until Congress shall ask him by joint resolution to send it. The Senate has passed this joint resolution, and it is necessary that it shall pass the House to-night. Otherwise the Senate committee will not be able to avail themselves of this information. It is a case of emergency.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is not the gentleman a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; and if so, how does it happen that the matter was not considered when the river and harbor bill was before the House? The gentleman is very alert usually.

Mr. HERMANN. I thank the gentleman, but I will say that this information was not in the possession of the Secretary of War at the time the river and harbor bill was being considered by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It is now in the possession of the Secretary of War, and he desires to transmit it to Congress, but is prevented from doing so until Congress shall ask him.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE WILLIAM H. CRAIN.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution to fix a day for eulogies in honor of the memory of the late W. H. Crain.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the session on Saturday, April 25, beginning at 2.30 p. m., be devoted to the delivery of eulogies on the late W. H. Crain.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMPILATION OF MESSAGES AND PAPERS OF THE PRESIDENTS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution. I think gentlemen will not object to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 170) to provide for the proper distribution of the publication entitled "Messages and Papers of the Presidents."

Be it resolved, etc., That the quotas of Senators, Members, and Delegates of the House Miscellaneous Document No. 210, second session Fifty-third Congress, being a compilation the title of which is "Messages and Papers of the Presidents," be delivered by the Public Printer, when printed and ready for distribution, to the Superintendent of Documents. That the Senators, Members, and Delegates of the Fifty-fourth Congress be, and are hereby, authorized to designate to the Superintendent of Documents the names of persons to whom their respective quotas of said documents shall be sent from time to time as the volumes are published.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the object of the resolution is to provide that this publication, which I think will consist of four volumes, shall be sent to the same persons, the idea being that the sets ought to be kept in complete or unbroken form.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has this been reported by the Committee on Printing?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. It had better go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I conferred with the chairman of the committee. The whole work, I may say, is under my supervision. I saw all the members of the Committee in the Senate and in the House, and all agree that this resolution should be adopted now, as the first volume is about to be delivered to Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. All right. I notice that the chairman of the committee is not present.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I know. I have seen the chairman, however, as I have stated.

Mr. DINGLEY. And the gentleman knows he is in favor of the resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON. He favors it.

Mr. DINGLEY. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McMILLIN. I submit to my colleague that I fear the phraseology of the resolution does not accomplish the object he seeks. It will be possible under the phraseology of that resolution, I think, for any person who succeeds one who may be here to send these volumes to those whom we are not designating now. I ask that it be again read.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state before it is read that it is the same language which was used in the law which provides for the distribution of the Naval Records, and also, substantially, the language used in the law which provides for the distribution of the Records of the Rebellion, one being by the Sectetary of the Navy and the other being by the Secretary of War. I ask that it be reported. The resolution was carefully drawn, and I think the object is clearly expressed.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. McMILLIN. I see that it applies to the Fifty-fourth Congress only. That had escaped me.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The House will pardon me for saying just a word or two for the information of members. The first volume of this valuable compilation, as I esteem it, will be ready for delivery to Congress in about two weeks from to-day. The Public Printer thinks that within two weeks the first volume will be delivered. It will include the first twenty-eight years of our history as a Republic; that is, from Washington to Madison, inclusive. It is thought that the compilation will make about four volumes in all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Can the gentleman indicate how many copies each member will receive?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The full number of the publication is 6,000, 2,000 for the Senate and 4,000 for the House; and dividing 4,000 by our number, 360, it gives about 11 copies to each member of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. What is the estimated expense of printing the compilation?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There has been no estimate. It was ordered by the Fifty-third Congress, and no estimate has been made. The resolution ordered the Joint Committee on Printing to have the compilation made. That committee, having no one to do the work and having no money with which to do it, placed it in my hands, and I have done the very best I could to execute the task in a satisfactory manner. I entered upon the work in March, 1895, immediately upon the adjournment of the Fifty-third Congress, and, I may add, have devoted a great deal of time and labor upon it. The utmost endeavor has been put forth to make the compilation complete and exhaustive. It will include all the annual veto and special messages, proclamations, and inaugural addresses of the Presidents, from Washington to the close of the present Administration; at least I have earnestly sought to include them all. It may be, by inadvertence, some are omitted, but I trust not. It has been especially troublesome and difficult to obtain the proclamations, as the Government does not possess them in complete form.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is done with the number left over after the equal distribution to members.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The law disposes of all such fractions. The fractions, of course, are not disposed of by this resolution; but they are under the printing law, and under that law the fractions in all cases which exceed a given number are directed to be placed in the charge of the superintendent of documents, to be by him distributed mainly upon the orders of members of Congress.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Can the gentleman tell how long it will be before the work will be completed?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not with absolute certainty. I would state, in answer to that question, however, that the work has all been done by myself, and the "copy" for the printer has been prepared, and is ready, down to Harrison's Administration, except the messages and communications from the President to the Senate in executive session from which the injunction of secrecy has not been removed. The injunction of secrecy had not been removed from the messages by the Senate since the Administration of President Johnson until about one week ago, when there was a further removal of the injunction that I might have access to them for this compilation. This removal was down to Mr. Harrison's Administration. The only matter which will enter into the first volume, members will understand, is that down to and including Mr. Madison's Administration. The other, down to Mr. Harrison's Administration, as I have indicated, is ready for the printer.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will we have it all done this session?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is hoped that by twelve months from this date the entire work can be delivered to Congress, and, as I have already stated, the compilation will make four volumes, as at present estimated at the Government Printing Office.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Pending the announcement of the result, the Chair submits the following personal requests:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FARIS, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. GIBSON, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. OGDEN, for two weeks, on account of important business.

The result of the vote was then announced; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1823) to amend an act approved July 15, 1882, entitled "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes," reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2521) to provide for the drainage of lots in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2225) for the relief of Col. and Bvt. Brig. Gen. Henry L. Abbot, United States Army, and brevet major-general United States Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2594) granting an increase of pension to William A. Beckford, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TELLER. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate has had under consideration the bill (S. 742) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, and directed the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to report it with amendments. The Senator from Mississippi being absent, I ask leave to present it for him. I therefore report the bill favorably with amendments.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Representing the minority of the Judiciary Committee, I desire to present a substitute for the bill just reported by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. It is the bill heretofore introduced by me in the Senate with certain amendments. I ask that it may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). It will be so ordered, if there be no objection. The bill and proposed substitute will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2748) providing that all judgments in civil causes in the District of Columbia shall bear interest, reported it without amendment, asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

PROPOSED SUMMARY OF CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. PEFFER. I am directed by the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service to report back Senate bill 235 and to ask its indefinite postponement. Before the order is entered I desire to give a reason for it, so as to save the necessity of submitting a written report.

It is a bill to provide for the daily publication of a summary of the proceedings of Congress, the object of the bill being to supply the people of the country in general with a summary of Congressional proceedings at a very low price, so that the people individually can afford to pay for it the same as they would pay for an ordinary weekly newspaper.

However, upon inquiry of the Public Printer, I find that it would be practically impossible for the work to be done in the present condition of the Public Printing Office. He answers that as to printing 100,000 or 200,000 or 500,000 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the office is utterly unable to estimate the cost of such an increase by reason of the difference in the size of the RECORD from day to day, and also owing to want of room, deficiency of presswork, labor, and all such things. I ask, in connection with my submission of the bill, that the letter of the Public Printer may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter of the Public Printer is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1896.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 16th instant, making inquiry as to the probable cost of an additional issue of either 100,000 or 200,000 or 500,000 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD daily, I have the honor of saying that this office is unable to estimate the cost of such an increase, for the reason that the RECORD is not uniform in the number of its pages, and no fair basis is known by which an estimate could be made which we could safely submit with any degree of accuracy. Your suggestion relative to an increased number of the issues of the RECORD would be an impossibility under existing conditions and laws as affecting this office and the publication daily of the RECORD.

To print and issue promptly, as the RECORD is now printed, an issue of 100,000 copies or either of the other numbers named, would be an impossibility, except the RECORD press facilities were increased tenfold and the working space in the RECORD press and mailing rooms increased five hundred fold. This I intend as an offhand estimate. If you were to come here in person, I could illustrate to your practical mind what would be required in machinery and space to secure the result you have in view. It is my opinion that the RECORD as a whole could be printed more satisfactorily to Congress than any summary of it.

Very respectfully,
TH. E. BENEDICT,
Public Printer.

Hon. W. A. PEFFER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PEFFER. Now let the bill (S. 235) to provide for the daily publication of a summary of the proceedings of Congress be postponed indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

ISLAND OF JAPONSKY.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back favorably Senate Resolution No. 211; and, as it is a resolution merely asking for information, I ask that it may be put upon its passage.

The resolution submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 7th instant was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the guardian of Michael Travers, a citizen of the United States, who has been declared a person non compos mentis, has represented to the Senate of the United States by a sworn petition that he has been unjustly deprived by the United States of certain property known as the Island of Japonsky, in the harbor of Sitka, Alaska, and the improvements thereon: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to ascertain and report to the Senate the facts concerning the location and residence of the said Michael Travers upon the Island of Japonsky, the making of improvements thereon by him, their character and extent, the taking of the possession of such island and improvements by the officers of the United States, and the value thereof for the uses to which the island and property were put by the United States, which information the said Attorney-General may obtain from the governor of Alaska and the district attorney of the United States and the clerk of the United States court of Alaska, and from other sources at his command.

MRS. FLORENCE E. MAYBRICK.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 129) requesting the Government of Great Britain to pardon Mrs. Florence E. Maybrick as an act of magnanimity, to report the same with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, and with a written report about three lines long. I desire to have the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts submits a written report accompanying the joint resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution S. R. 129, have considered the same, and respectfully report that in the opinion of the committee the matter is not within the jurisdiction of the Senate. They therefore recommend that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], the author of the joint resolution, is not present, and I ask that it be passed over until he comes in.

Mr. HOAR and Mr. GALLINGER. Let it go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska might ask that it go to the Calendar.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; let it go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

MRS. MARY R. WALKER.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 2839) granting a pension to Mary R. Walker, of Forest Grove, Oreg.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for a minute and a half to make a statement in reference to the bill before it goes to committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Oregon will proceed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The proposed beneficiary under the bill, Mrs. Mary R. Walker, of Forest Grove, Oreg., was born April 1, 1811, and is now over 85 years of age. On the 5th of March, 1838, with her husband, Rev. Elkanah Walker, she left the State of Maine to labor among the Indians as a missionary west of the Rocky Mountains. She forded every stream from the Mississippi to the Columbia on the back of a pack mule, her riding horse having been stolen in the early part of the journey after leaving St. Joseph, Mo.

She arrived, with her husband, now deceased, at the mission station of Dr. Marcus Whitman, in the Territory of Oregon, August 29, 1838. She is now believed to have resided west of the Rocky Mountains longer than any other white American citizen, either male or female, and is the only person remaining of the associates of Dr. Whitman. In the spring of 1839 she, with her late husband and the late Rev. Cushing Eels and wife, removed to Tshimakain, now Walkers Prairie, to establish a mission among the Spokane Indians. It is believed to be largely owing to the labors of those four persons that this tribe of Indians has never engaged in any of the outbreaks against the whites.

It was through the unremitting labors, accompanied with innumerable dangers and hardships in connection with her late husband and his associates, that Mrs. Walker became one of the great factors in saving the Northwestern States to the United States. Now, at the advanced age of 85 years, she is left in indigent circumstances, and is mentally and physically disabled, requiring the care of a person constantly.

In view of these facts and many others which might be elaborated, I introduced the bill, and ask the Congress of the United States to grant this estimable pioneer lady, the remaining survivor of that noble vanguard who planted the seeds of civilization in the far West, a pension of $50 a month. I hope the Committee on Pensions will give the bill their careful consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

S. M. CULLOM,
H. M. TELLER,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

HENRY H. BINGHAM,
JOHN E. McCALL,
ALEXANDER M. DOCKERY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I could occupy the time of the Senate, if I thought the Senate desired it, in referring to each of the amendments in detail that the Senate made to the bill as it passed the other House. I hardly think the Senate would expect that, but I do think that they probably would like to know what provisions the Senate inserted in the bill upon which the conferees of the two Houses have disagreed. I will therefore make a little statement of the facts in relation to those items.

The conferees of the two Houses failed to agree as to the following provisions:

For 25 clerks to the Senate committees, at $1,800 each;

For an increase of messengers and skilled laborers for the Senate.

The Senate will understand that on all these items the conferees of the two Houses have failed to agree.

As to 38 annual clerks to Senators;

As to an increase of the Capitol police force;

As to librarian and for the appointment of a register of copyrights;

As to the salary of an Assistant Comptroller;

As to the amendment of the Senate in relation to the contingent expenses of the assay office in Idaho;

As to a change in the time of meeting of the legislature of New Mexico;

As to provision stricken out by the Senate for employees in the Office of Naval Records;

For an additional appropriation of $11,000 for printing, binding, etc., in the Office of Naval Records;

For ten examiners, to constitute a board of examiners of surveys;

For a classification division in the Patent Office;

Amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior in his discretion to continue the contract for the Official Gazette and other things for one year;

Amendment continuing seven watchmen employed in the Capitol Grounds;

As to additional appropriations provided by the Senate for carrying on surveys in different States and Territories where additional appropriations were asked, except as to Colorado; the Colorado provisions were agreed to;

As to the amendments made by the Senate giving an increase of force in the office of the Attorney-General and an increased amount for the library;

As to provision for printing and distributing additional numbers of the opinions of the Supreme Court;

Also amendment providing for a messenger in the Eighth judicial circuit; and Finally, as to all the provisions involved in the sections in relation to a change of the system of payment of United States district attorneys and marshals. I will state, however, that in the consultation of the conferees with some of the gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee, especially of the other House, a number of amendments not touching the question of salaries in the court provisions, as I term them, were agreed to informally, but lest the provisions might be mixed up by concurring in them and disagreeing to others it was thought best to disagree as to the whole batch, in the hope that at the next sitting of the conferees we might agree upon the salary provisions and then agree to those also.

These are substantially the features of the bill as to which the conferees were unable to agree, and I thought it was due to the Senate that I should call attention to them, not for the purpose of securing an expression of the Senate regarding them, but so that the Senate might know something more about what was going on with reference to the bill than they would know by having read the numbers of the items which have been disagreed to. I could give in detail the items as to which the Senate and House conferees have agreed, but I think with this explanation of the important matters yet left to be considered the Senate will understand the report of the conference committee and agree to it, and that perhaps is all the Senate will desire to know.

Mr. GORMAN. I understood the Senator from Illinois to say that all the items relating to the increase of compensation for clerks of Senators, messengers, etc., have been disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. CULLOM. They have been disagreed to by the conferees on the part of the House, and we have not been able to come to an agreement as to them. So they will go back to another conference, if another conference is had upon the subject.

Mr. GORMAN. As I understand, the conference committee have agreed to all of the appropriations for the House of Representatives, leaving the matter of the appropriations for the Senate alone standing out.

Mr. CULLOM. There were no substantial provisions in controversy between the conferees as to the provisions relating to the clerks and employees of the House. There was nothing of that kind to contend over.

Mr. GORMAN. I suppose, as a matter of course, the conferees on the part of the Senate will take care of the items relating to the Senate.

I want to ask the especial attention of the Senator from Illinois to amendment numbered 102, on page 90 of the last print of the bill. It is an amendment added by the Senate authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to cause the present contract for producing copies of the drawings of the weekly issues of patents for inventions, etc., and for producing the photolithographic work for the Official Gazette of the Patent Office to be extended for the term of one year from the 1st of July next. Do I understand the Senator to say that that amendment has been agreed to?

Mr. CULLOM. I did not. The exact facts are these: The honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], immediately after the passage of the bill by the Senate, and before it went to conference, suggested to me that he desired to be heard upon the amendment before it was disposed of. I therefore suggested when we reached it that I preferred the Senator from Maryland should be present and have the opportunity to say what he desired before it was disposed of. It was, however, learned that the Senator was not at the time in the city, and therefore the amendment was disagreed to by the conferees of the two Houses without much discussion.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, then I prefer to make a short statement in regard to this particular amendment which was adopted by the Senate, so that it may appear in the RECORD and be used by the conferees if they so desire.

This is a provision, I think, which was offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. If it was adopted by the Senate it escaped my observation at the time, although I was present in the body. It is a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to continue in existence the contract made last year for the printing and photolithographing of the Patent Office Reports. The amount involved is about $92,000.

There has been considerable controversy on the subject, and at one time an investigation was ordered by resolution of the Senate, the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I think, offering the resolution, directing an investigation into the contract for this work. The then chairman of the Committee on Public Printing, General Manderson; the then Senator from North Carolina, Mr. Ransom, and I entered into an investigation, and went through it very thoroughly. We found in the Patent Office, under the law as administered by the present Commissioner of Patents, that there was a looseness which, in our judgment, required legislation to correct and to prevent abuses in that work. So in drafting the printing bill, which subsequently became a law, we inserted a provision requiring that each year this work should be advertised for publicly, not let privately, as had been the custom, so as to prevent it being awarded at an excessive amount to favorites. We also provided in that law that whenever the Public Printing Office was in condition to do this work it should be transferred to the Public Printer. A part of it is being done there now.

Under that provision of the law the Patent Office asked for proposals, and went outside of the requirements of the law, opening the door to a different character of work than that which had been prescribed by the act itself. The Committee on Printing having taken the matter into consideration and having their attention called to the subject, required the Commissioner of Patents to conform to the law, and in the last contract that was made there were three bidders, one being for $92,000, and one for ninety-four thousand and some odd dollars. The contract was awarded, as a matter of course, to the lowest bidder. Since then the Public Printing Office has been put in condition, or will soon be in condition, to do this work at a very much decreased cost from the present contract price.

The Senator from Connecticut, without knowing all the circumstances, as he is not familiar, I take it, with that branch of the work, offered an amendment to continue in force for one year longer the contract, which expires in May next. It is, in the judgment of myself and the other members of the Committee on Printing who have looked into the subject, not only a violation of law and a change of the statute, but it is probably going back to and inaugurating a system of affairs which we labored so hard to correct in the last Congress. I therefore hope that the committee of conference on the part of the Senate will agree to recede from this amendment; and if it be in order now, as I suppose it will be when the report is adopted, I shall make a motion that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 102.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, as the Senator from Maryland remembers, the history in this body of the amendment referred to was that it was first offered proposing that the Secretary of the Interior should be allowed to continue this contract for four years. It seemed to me that that was not right, and, at the risk of incurring the displeasure of the Senator who offered the amendment, I made the point of order upon it, which was sustained. Subsequently the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] had the amendment modified, leaving it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for one year. There seemed to be some question as to whether that provision as shaped by him was subject to a point of order. I did not make the point of order, and no one else did. The Senate adopted the amendment; and the Senate can very readily see that the Senate conferees, desiring to represent the Senate itself, naturally would feel like standing by the amendment, at least until it had been ascertained whether there was any disposition on the part of the Senate to recede from it. Therefore we took no action upon it except a formal disagreement, because of what I stated with reference to the arrangement between the Senator and myself, yet I should not have felt disposed to give up the provision without first reporting it to the Senate.

So far as I am concerned, I am willing, if it be in order, that the Senate may give an expression as to what it desires to do in reference to the amendment at this time. I believe it has to be done now, if at all. I am not very familiar with these questions. Could we not agree to the conference report and then take a vote upon the amendment?

Mr. GORMAN. I submit the question to the Chair as to whether the conference report may be agreed to and the Senate can then recede from the amendment?

Mr. CULLOM. If it be in order, I am perfectly willing to have that course adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the amendment as to a special item?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; amendment numbered 102, from which I desire to have the Senate recede.

Mr. CULLOM. Is that in order before the conference report is adopted or after, or at any time?

Mr. HARRIS. Before.

Mr. GORMAN. I think at any time.

Mr. HARRIS. It must be done before the report is voted on.

Mr. GORMAN. Then I move that the Senate recede from amendment numbered 102.

Mr. CULLOM. I think that surely is not in order, because the only question, as I understand, when a conference report is made, is whether the conference report shall be agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Is this an item which has been agreed to in conference or disagreed to?

Mr. CULLOM. Disagreed to.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me very clear that the procedure is this: The report embraces those items as items. That is not agreed to. The report is simply a recitation of what the committee has done, and this item is left open. Now, clearly it seems to me that the report should be accepted. It is only a recital of what has been done and what has not been done, and then it will be in order for the Senator from Maryland to move to recede on one of these items, which is left out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has precisely stated the parliamentary situation.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggested that the motion to recede would have to come before agreeing to the report, but I did not know at the time, and do not know now, what the report is.

Mr. CULLOM. The report on this amendment is a disagreement by the conferees of the two Houses.

Mr. HARRIS. Then my suggestion to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] was erroneous. If that be the report, of course the report may be agreed to and a motion to recede from any particular amendment will be in order afterwards.

Mr. HALE and Mr. GORMAN. Afterwards.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the report of the committee of conference be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. GORMAN. I now move that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 102.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 102, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 90 of the last print of the bill, after line 13, the Senate adopted the following amendment:

That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, cause the present contract for producing copies of the drawings of the weekly issues of patents for inventions, trade-mark certificates, drawings for the library editions of patents, for producing exhausted copies, and copies of pending applications, and of foreign patents or publications, and for producing the photolithographic work for the illustrated pages of the Official Gazette of the Patent Office, to be extended for the term of one year from the 1st day of July, 1896.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on receding from the amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber when this subject came up. I understand that some statement was made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] with relation to this matter, giving the reasons why the Senate should recede from the amendment. I did not hear those statements, but I desire very briefly to state why the Committee on Patents recommended the amendment.

In the years that have passed there has been a great deal of criticism of the way in which the contract for photolithographing the designs for the Patent Office Gazette has been executed. It has amounted almost to a scandal for the last twenty years. It had been done by one firm up to the commencement of this Administration, at a cost of about $150,000 a year. At the commencement of this Administration it will be remembered that the Commissioner of Patents made an arrangement with a gentleman from Boston, who was connected with the Administration in some way at that time, about which there was a good deal of talk and considerable criticism. After that the Commissioner of Patents advertised for a contract. The lowest bidder for the contract was a Mr. Graham. His bid was $11,000 below that of any other bidder. If I remember aright, it was about $90,000, when we had theretofore been paying from $140,000 to $150,000 for this work. That bid was accepted. That bidder has invested in the enterprise $100,000, more or less, for the purpose of being able to carry out his contract. There has never been a day's or an hour's failure in getting out the drawings. His contract has been complied with to the letter, under great disadvantages at times. The contract expires next July. Under the present law it is to be relet by advertisement. The same firm which has been taking $150,000, more or less, in years past for this contract can come in and, for the sake of breaking down this new contractor, bid for the work at less than it can be done for. When that contractor has thus been broken down, there is no other concern in the city of Washington that can do the work except the old concern. The Committee on Patents thought it would be very well to allow the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to extend the contract for one year. If the Senate thinks that is not a good business proposition, it may recede from the amendment. It is under this statement I hope they will not recede.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut was not here when I made my statement. The statement which he makes is exactly accurate about the troubles heretofore existing in relation to this contract. I made that statement substantially while the Senator was absent.

Upon examination by the Committee on Printing in regard to this matter, it became manifest that there must be a very radical change in this work, and that the great discretion which had been exercised by the Commissioner of Patents should be limited. After the most thorough investigation for the purpose of introducing economy and of having this contract awarded to the lowest bidder in an open, manly, and honest way, and to have a further safeguard so that the Government would be fully protected, this provision was made in the printing law:

All printing for the Patent Office making use of lithography or photolithography, together with the plates for the same, shall be contracted for and performed under the direction of the Commissioner of Patents, under such limitations and conditions as the Joint Committee on Printing may from time to time prescribe, and all other printing for the Patent Office shall be done by the Public Printer under such limitations and conditions as the Joint Committee on Printing may from time to time prescribe: Provided, That the entire work may be done at the Government Printing Office whenever, in the judgment of the Joint Committee on Printing, the same would be to the interest of the Government.

Under that provision, and with open bids, there were three bidders one year ago, and the gentleman who obtained the contract made a bid of about $92,000, and the next lowest bid was $94,000. The Government Printing Office at that time was not quite in condition to do this work. It is practically in condition to do it now.

Mr. President, to continue this contract by such a provision in an appropriation bill will again be entering upon a system which we tried to correct. I know the Senator from Connecticut, if he had examined this subject as thoroughly as did General Manderson and I, would see the wisdom of continuing the present system of making the contract every year, and as early as possible. A part of the work is being now done at the Printing Office, and I think this summer the whole of the work may be accomplished there at a greatly reduced cost, but it would be manifestly unjust and unwise, in my judgment, to continue the existing contract under those conditions.

I shall not go into further details. After the investigation made by the Committee on Printing the testimony was submitted to the Senate, but the committee did not attempt to criticise, as we might have done, and probably ought to have done, the action which had theretofore been taken. We rather contented ourselves in making a provision of law which would prevent such abuses in the future; and I trust that provision will not be disregarded by the retention of this amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, it will be observed that this provision is not mandatory at all. It does not extend the contract, but leaves it discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior to do it.

One word with regard to the Public Printing Office. That office is in no condition whatever to do this work. It can not do it without an addition to its plant of $100,000.

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, no; not so much as that.

Mr. PLATT. I undertake to say that to do this work will require a very large addition to the plant of the Government Printing Office.

It is true that the Government does some portion of the work of getting out the Official Patent Office Gazette. It sets up the specifications of patents on a large scale, and yet every week all of that work is photolithographed, and has to be, and this book which I hold in my hand [exhibiting] is either weekly or once in two weeks made up by the photolithographic process. There is no process in the Government Printing Office by which it can be done, and it is not contemplated that any process is to be added to that plant for the purpose of doing it.

Mr. CULLOM. I only desire to say a word, and then I hope we shall have a vote.

As the Senate will remember, this amendment was put in by the Senate; it was not inserted on the report of the Committee on Appropriations. My own judgment at the time was in favor of the provision of law requiring the Secretary of the Interior to advertise and let this contract to the lowest bidder, but I consented to allow the amendment to go into the bill without making a point of order upon it, and the Senate adopted it. So far as the Appropriations Committee is concerned, I do not think it is very much concerned whether the amendment stays in or goes out. I hope we shall now have a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to recede from amendment numbered 102.

Mr. GORMAN. Let us have the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. I do not see him present, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURROWS (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], who is not present.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire whether the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Chair is informed that the junior Senator from Rhode Island has not voted.

Mr. BACON. In his absence I feel compelled to withdraw my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. PALMER (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has not voted.

Mr. PALMER. Then I withdraw my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. FAULKNER (after having voted in the affirmative). I supposed when I voted that the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] had voted. I find, however, that he has not, and, as I am paired with him generally, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BLACKBURN (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with that Senator, but I transfer my pair with him to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and will let my vote in the affirmative stand.

Mr. DUBOIS. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER], as it is feared there is not a quorum present and voting, that we transfer our pairs, he being paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] and I being paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. I suggest that the Senator from North Dakota be paired with the Senator from New Jersey, which will enable the Senator from Illinois and me to vote.

Mr. PALMER. That is entirely satisfactory to me. I vote "yea."

Mr. DUBOIS. I vote "nay."

Mr. BACON. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 21; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], that the Senate recede from amendment numbered 102, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN], whom I do not see in his seat. I transfer my pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHANDLER (when his name was called). On this vote I agreed to pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], who is now paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER], so that the junior Senator from Illinois and I can vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] and vote "yea."

Mr. VILAS (when the name of Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin was called). My colleague [Mr. MITCHELL] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber to-day and is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). Adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] with respect to an exchange of pairs, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I again announce that I have a general pair with the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. QUAY. I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire whether the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. BACON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island, but I transfer my pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and allow my vote to stand. Otherwise I would withdraw it.

Mr. NELSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], whom I do not see in his seat. I therefore ask leave to withdraw my vote.

Mr. PUGH. I will state to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] that if my colleague [Mr. MORGAN] were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. QUAY. Then I vote "yea."

Mr. FAULKNER (after having voted in the affirmative). I announced a pair between the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE]. I understand that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] has already been paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. I therefore transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to announce the transfer of the pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES].

So the Senate receded from its amendment numbered 102.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose the House of Representatives will be notified of the action of the Senate as to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Was this the only amendment left open in the bill? If not, the Senator from Illinois should move that the Senate further insist.

Mr. CULLOM. The conference report has been adopted, and this amendment has been taken out of the bill by the vote or receded from. I move that the Senate insist upon its other amendments not disposed of and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference, and Mr. CULLOM, Mr. TELLER, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to call up the privileged question, the resolution declaring Henry A. Du Pont entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware.

I call up the resolution and desire to state that I shall not speak to-day. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] wishes to speak, and he will be followed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN]. Other speeches on the resolution will be delayed until to-morrow, so that the Indian appropriation bill can be taken up after these Senators shall have concluded their remarks.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon from the Committee on Privileges and Elections February 18, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, after the clear and comprehensive statement of the facts in this case and the law applicable thereto in the opening of the debate by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, supplemented by the able argument of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] and other Senators in support of the claim of Henry A. Du Pont to a seat in this body as Senator-elect from the State of Delaware, together with the able and exhaustive presentation of the views of the minority by the distinguished Senators from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] and Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] and others in opposition thereto, I confess to no little embarrassment in asking the further attention of the Senate to the consideration of a question every phase of which has been already presented and concerning which the judgment of Senators may possibly be fully made up and concluded. Being, however, a member of the committee intrusted in the first instance with the examination of this case, and having joined with the majority in the report presented, I venture to ask the indulgence of the Senate while I discharge what seems to be a duty in briefly presenting some of the reasons which impelled me to the conclusions reached therein.

In the discussion of any question, whether of grave or trifling concern, it is always advisable at the beginning to eliminate all those matters concerning which there is not, and can not be, the slightest contention. The debate has now so far progressed as to make this course possible. If this suggestion is adopted it will be found that the vital points in the controversy are circumscribed within very narrow limits. What, then, may I ask, are the admitted facts? Let me enumerate.

It is conceded that at a general election held in the State of Delaware in November, 1894, there were elected a governor for the term of four years and a full membership of the Delaware legislature, consisting of 9 senators and 21 representatives; that in January, 1895, the governor-elect, Mr. Marvil, was duly inducted into office and entered upon the performance of his duties; that both branches of the legislature, composed of members duly qualified, were legally organized, and that Senator Watson was elected speaker of the senate; that among the duties devolving upon such legislature was the election of a United States Senator for the full term of six years beginning March 4, 1895, and ending March 4, 1901; that the legislature entered upon the performance of this duty in conformity to law and continued therein until the day of final adjournment, May 9, 1895; and that on this last-named day the recorded vote in the joint assembly for United States Senator was 15 for Henry A. Du Pont and 15 against him, which did not give Mr. Du Pont a majority of the total recorded vote of 30, and that the legislature thereupon adjourned without day.

It is further conceded that on the 8th day of April, 1895, Governor Marvil died; and that by the constitution of the State of Delaware it is provided that—

> Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified;

That on the following day, April 9, and in compliance with this constitutional mandate, the chancellor, in the presence of the senate, administered to Mr. Watson, the speaker of the senate—and I quote the journal entry—"the oaths of office as governor," by which, among other things, Watson obligated himself to "perform the duties of the office of governor of the State of Delaware with fidelity." It is further admitted that thereupon he entered upon the discharge of the duties of such office and that he has ever since exercised and is now performing the duties of chief executive of the State of Delaware. It is further admitted that from the 9th day of April, 1895, the day Mr. Watson took the oath as governor and entered upon the exercise of that office, until the 9th day of May, 1895, the day of the final vote for United States Senator in the joint assembly, Mr. Watson took no part in the business of the senate, either as speaker or senator, or in the proceedings of the joint assembly; and that the highest vote recorded in the joint assembly for United States Senator between the 9th of April and the 9th of May was 29, and that the declared vote of 30 for United States Senator in the joint assembly of May 9th was made possible only by the appearance of Mr. Watson, then exercising the office of governor, who on that day entered the senate and the joint assembly and cast his vote for United States Senator.

It is further conceded that on the final vote Mr. Du Pont received 15 votes, and that of the 15 votes cast against him 1 of the number was the vote of Mr. Watson, and that without his vote Henry A. Du Pont would have had a majority over all, and would have been elected a Senator of the United States from the State of Delaware for the full term of six years.

In this recital I have not intended to make, nor do I think I have made, a single statement that is not conceded to be true. It will be observed, therefore, as I stated in the beginning, that the vital points in this case are circumscribed within very narrow limits and hinge primarily and chiefly upon the single question whether on the 9th day of April, 1895, Mr. Watson had the legal and constitutional right, while exercising the office of governor, to participate in the proceedings of the joint assembly and vote for United States Senator. If he had that right, then Mr. Du Pont was not elected. If he had not that right, then Mr. Du Pont was elected. This, I believe, is conceded.

Let it be borne in mind also that there is no other contestant for the seat. If Du Pont was not elected no one was.

The primary and vital question, therefore, to be considered and determined, simply stated, is this: Had Watson, while exercising the office of governor of the State of Delaware, the right to vote in the joint assembly of the legislature for United States Senator? Upon this point the Committee on Privileges and Elections were unable to agree, and this is one and the main issue presented to the Senate for its considerate and final judgment.

The majority of the committee insist that when, on the 9th day of April, Senator Watson took the oath and entered upon the exercise of the office of governor of the State of Delaware, from that moment, and so long as he continued to exercise its functions, he became and continues to be governor; and that as such he had no constitutional or legal right to discharge the functions of senator, and that his attempt to do so in the joint assembly of May 9th was an usurpation and his vote for United States Senator a nullity.

On the other hand, it is contended that although Watson entered upon the exercise of the office of governor, yet, nevertheless, he was then a senator, and continues to hold the office of senator and speaker, and that there was no constitutional or legal restraint which prevented him from discharging the functions of both offices at the same time; and that, in fact, his exact legal, constitutional, and official status was, and is, senator and speaker exercising the office of governor.

This contention presents at once an issue involving the construction of several provisions of the constitution of the State of Delaware to which it becomes necessary to invite attention.

It will be remembered that the Delaware constitution creates no such officer as lieutenant-governor, upon whom, in case of a vacancy in the gubernatorial office, the duties of governor usually devolve, but in lieu thereof it is provided that in the event of a vacancy in the office of governor, by death or otherwise, "the speaker of the senate"—in the language of the constitution—"shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified." It was under and by virtue of this constitutional mandate that Senator and Speaker Watson, on the 9th day of April, 1895, entered upon the performance of the duties of the executive office, and still continues therein. This transfer of executive authority was accomplished by the peaceful and orderly methods prescribed by the constitution, without the slightest disturbance in any of the functions of government, and would have scarcely arrested public attention but for the extraordinary and unexampled assumption of power on the part of the newly installed executive. After assuming and entering upon the exercise of the office of governor, and while in the full and exclusive discharge of its high functions, Governor Watson presumed to reenter the senate, resume the speaker's chair, preside over and participate in the deliberations of the joint assembly, and cast his vote for United States Senator, justifying this startling exhibition of autocratic power by asserting that he was not only the executive of the State, but at the same time a member of the legislative branch of the government, and, indeed, the rightful incumbent of three offices at the same time—governor, speaker, and senator—the powers and duties of all or any one of which he was at liberty to discharge at will.

Out of this assumption of official authority has grown this protracted controversy, culminating in the issue now presented for the determination of the Senate, and which may be stated in a single line, viz: Could Watson, while exercising the office of governor, lawfully perform the functions of senator?

To this query we make emphatic denial; the opposition, equally emphatic, affirmation. And thus the issue is made up.

In support of our contention that Watson had no authority to act in the dual capacity of governor and senator, we appeal not only to the common-law doctrine of incompatibility, but we confidently invoke the express prohibition of the Delaware constitution (Article II, section 12), wherein it is declared that "No person holding any office under this State * * * shall, during his continuance in office, be a senator."

Now, the contention on the part of Mr. Du Pont is that when Senator Watson entered upon the "exercise of the office of governor" he became, and was, in the language of the constitutional provision just quoted, "a person holding an office under the State," and that therefore "during his continuance in such office" he could not "be a senator"; that the holding of the office of governor and senator by the same person at the same time is herein expressly forbidden, and that Watson's attempt, therefore, to perform the functions of senator while holding the executive office was a direct and palpable violation of the constitution, by the express terms of which he was positively inhibited. There would seem to be no possible escape from this conclusion, and the force of the deduction is conceded when opposing Senators attempt to cut their way through this constitutional barrier by boldly declaring that Watson, though entering upon the exercise of the office of governor on the 9th of April, 1895, did not in fact become governor, nor was he then nor is he now, though in the continued exercise of that office, "holding any office under the State" other than that of senator, and therefore is not within the constitutional inhibition just quoted.

I have attempted to state with accuracy the exact position of opposing Senators; but that it may appear I have in no way misrepresented their contention in this regard, permit me to quote the precise language of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE]:

> I admit that the governor is an officer of the State, but I say that Watson never was governor and never could be governor. He may be some time, but when he becomes governor it will be after he is chosen by the citizens of the State to that office, in the language of the constitution. He will never become governor before that time. He can not be governor before that time. No other power can choose him. No other constituency can elect him. The governor of Delaware is chosen by the people. Watson was holding no other office under the State then—none whatever. He is a senator, and continues to be a senator.

The counsel even took the position that exercising the office is not an office, the point being to escape the constitutional inhibition that a person holding any office under the State can not be a senator, and so the Senator from Indiana continues:

> I admit that the governor is an officer, but, for sufficient reasons already given, it is plain that Watson never was governor, and could not be governor. The right devolved upon him only to exercise the office. That is the extent of his authority; but this right was not an office, it was simply a right; it was not an office; it was simply the exercise of an office; it was a right appurtenant, not to Watson, nor to any person; it was a right appurtenant to the speakership, to the senatorship. It was a right inherent in no person, appertaining not to Mr. Watson; but it was a right inhering in and pertaining to the speakership of the senate of Delaware and to a member of the senate of Delaware, by consequence.

It will be observed, therefore, that I have stated accurately the position of the minority in that they seek to avoid the consequences of the constitutional inhibition against any person being a senator while "holding another office under the State" by contending, in the words of the Senator from Indiana just quoted, that Watson, though "exercising the office of governor," was thereby "holding no other office under the State—none whatever."

It is interesting to note in this connection that the position now taken by opposing Senators—that Watson did not in fact become governor when he entered upon the exercise of that office—is a complete reversal and abandonment of the position taken by counsel in their argument before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, wherein it was admitted that Mr. Watson did become and was in fact governor when he entered upon the exercise of that office. I quote from the reply of opposing counsel to the argument made in support of Du Pont's claim. They say:

Counsel devote 30 pages of their brief to a demonstration of the fact that the speaker of the senate, in case of a vacancy in the office of governor, becomes governor of the State. The matter counsel present on this head attests their industry and may interest the curious, but it supports a proposition which we do not contest.

It was conceded then that Watson became, and was in fact, governor the moment he entered upon the exercise of the functions of that office; and had that admission been made on the floor of the Senate it would have simplified, if not ended, this controversy. But opposing Senators were too astute to make this concession, knowing that under the constitution of the State of Delaware the office of governor and senator can not be held by the same person at the same time, and that as it was absolutely essential to the validity of Watson's vote for United States Senator that he should have been a lawful member of the State senate and of the joint assembly when he voted, it became equally imperative to deny that he was at that time governor, or that he was "holding any office under the State" except that of senator.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to inquire, as a matter of fact, whether Watson, while exercising the office of governor, was by that act "holding an office under the State" within the meaning of the constitution and whether Senators can successfully cut their way through this constitutional inhibition by contending that such holding was not an office.

It will not be disputed, I suppose, that the governorship is an office. Indeed, the Senator from Indiana says:

I admit that the governor is an officer of the State.

That being conceded, it would seem to follow that one holding that position holds an office. Therefore if Watson was actually governor he was, in the language of the constitution just quoted, "holding an office under the State." Our contention is that when he entered upon the exercise of the office of governor he became governor for the time being as absolutely as though he had been elected to that office, and could not, therefore, while performing its functions, be a senator. He was the constitutional governor, subject to all the limitations and restraints which that constitution imposed. It would not be contended, I suppose, that if the governor of the State chosen by the people should, during his term of office, be elected a State senator, that he could constitutionally take the office of senator and at the same time continue to hold the office of governor. In such case he could only be admitted to the office of senator by first vacating the office of governor. If the people are powerless, by an election, to confer upon one and the same person the office of governor and senator, by what process of reasoning or under what provision of the constitution of the State of Delaware is Watson clothed with the dual powers of senator and governor? The answer is, by virtue of that provision of the constitution which imposes upon the speaker of the senate the duty, in a certain contingency, of exercising the office of governor, but that in such case, while possessed of all the powers and charged with all the duties of both offices, yet he was holding but one—that of senator—and only exercising the other. And this brings us to the examination of that provision of the constitution of the State of Delaware under and in obedience to which Watson entered upon the exercise of the executive office.

Article III, section 14, provides as follows:

Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor, by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office, by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

Plain as this proposition of the constitution is, yet it is the storm center around which all the legal acumen of the opposition spends its force. The contention is this, that the expression "shall exercise the office," does not mean that the speaker of the senate shall become or is governor in fact, but that he is simply "exercising the office"—moving it around as though it were a thing of life, to keep its blood from stagnating; to keep the office alive until such time as a real governor can be elected by the people and be duly qualified. Is this the common-sense or legal meaning of the expression "exercising an office"? Webster defines the verb "to exercise" as follows: "To put in practice; to carry out in action; to perform the duties of; as, to exercise an office."

It is difficult to comprehend how one can exercise an office, perform all its functions, discharge all its duties, and yet not be an incumbent of such office. As was said in a well-adjudicated case, to which I shall have occasion to refer later, "How can a person fill the office of governor without being governor? Given a public office and one who, duly empowered, discharges its duties, and we have an incumbent in that office." Mechem, in his work on Public Offices and Officers, a recognized authority in the profession, says:

A public office is the right, authority, and duty created and conferred by law, by which, for a given period, an individual is vested with some portion of the sovereign function of the government, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public.

An office—

Says Blackstone—

is a right to exercise a private or public employment and to take the office and emoluments thereunto belonging.

Judge Cooley, whom the Senator from Indiana justly eulogized as a great jurist, in Troop vs. Langden (40 Michigan) said:

An office is a special trust or charge created by competent authority. If not merely honorary, certain duties will be connected with it, the performance of which will be the consideration for its being conferred upon a particular individual who, for the time being, will be the officer.

Judge Danforth, in Rowland vs. Major (83 New York), said:

Whether we look in the direction of our language, the terms of politics, or the diction of common life, we find that whoever has a public charge or employment, or even a particular employment affecting the public, is said to hold or be in office.

But it is needless to multiply authorities.

It is impossible to conceive, in the light of these citations, how Watson could exercise all the functions of governor, perform all its duties, and yet not be in fact the executive of the State. Yet, in the face of reason and authority, the contention is persistently adhered to that when Senator Watson took the oath of office as governor, and entered upon the performance of its duties, he was merely exercising the office of governor as an appendage to the office of senator, and was not in fact governor. It is contended that he was a sort of ex officio governor—speaker of the senate, and, by virtue thereof, exercising executive functions; that the two offices were linked together. True, the speaker of the senate is designated as the first in the line of succession to the vacant governorship, but it by no means follows that because of that designation the person named is vested with the powers and duties of both offices. The designation of the speaker of the senate was only for the purpose of making certain the person upon whom the executive office should devolve; and when the devolution occurs, and the individual named enters into the office, "he holds it in his natural and not his official capacity." As was well said by the court in a case to which I shall refer:

If an office be appendant to another office, the determination of the first office will determine the second. On the contrary, if the appointment to an office be by descriptio personæ of one who holds some office by the title of which he is described, and who on some contingency is to enter and fill another office, the answering the description, at the time the contingency arises, designates him as the person who is to enter and fill the office, and when, as thus designated, he enters into the office he holds it in his natural and not in his official capacity.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Michigan kindly give me the citation?

Mr. BURROWS. It is a case reported in 11 Oregon, at page 389, the case of Chadwick vs. Earhart.

Watson's being speaker of the senate simply made him eligible to the office of governor, but when he entered upon the discharge of the functions of that office he held it wholly independent of and without regard to the office of speaker.

It was only to designate some person with certainty. It might have been the senior senator; it might have been anybody not in the senate or in the house. It was to designate some person, and if that person happened to be an official who was so designated it does not follow that he takes the duty of both offices.

But in examining the question whether Watson, in entering upon the exercise of the office of governor, actually became an incumbent of the office, it is wholly unnecessary, in my judgment, to look beyond the plain terms of the constitution itself. That such became and is his official status is clearly demonstrable, I think, from the very language employed. Indeed, any other interpretation would render the words used wholly inexplicable. Let us examine carefully, then, for a moment, that provision of the Delaware constitution under and by virtue of which Watson entered upon and is now exercising the office of governor. It is as follows:

Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If there be no speaker of the senate, or—upon a further vacancy happening in the office by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

These words have been passed over lightly by our friends on the other side—

I want to call attention to the words "further vacancy happening in the office"; that is, happening in the office of governor. Here we have, in case of a vacancy happening in the office of governor, the line of succession definitely fixed. First the speaker of the senate, and after him the speaker of the house shall exercise the office. When does the exercise of the office of governor devolve upon the speaker of the senate? In the language of the provision just quoted, "upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, removal, resignation, or inability." And when does the exercise of the office devolve upon the speaker of the house? In the language of the constitution, when there is "no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy," not a continuing vacancy, "happening in the office by his death, removal, resignation, or inability."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The speaker who has become governor?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes. The "further vacancy" here referred to is clearly a vacancy caused by the death, removal, resignation, or inability of the speaker of the senate, who, upon the happening of a vacancy in the office of governor, has entered upon the performance of the executive functions. I asked the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in relation to that when he was on the floor, and he said:

It means exactly what it says. It means the death of the speaker of the senate.

Mr. BURROWS. After he has entered upon the office.

Mr. GEORGE. After he has entered upon the exercise of the duties of governor.

Here we have, it will be observed, two vacancies referred to—one caused by the death, removal, resignation, or inability of the governor elected by the people; and the other by the death, removal, resignation, or inability of the speaker of the senate, who may have succeeded to the exercise of the executive office. It will be observed this second vacancy is spoken of as a "further vacancy in the office."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Of governor.

Mr. BURROWS. Of course, not the same vacancy. Mark the words "further vacancy." This presupposes a prior vacancy, and not only that, but that such prior vacancy had been filled by somebody, otherwise the expression "further vacancy" would be meaningless and absolutely senseless. There could be no further vacancy until that former vacancy had been supplied. There might be a continuing vacancy, but not a further vacancy. If Watson, when he entered upon the exercise of the office of governor, did not fill the vacancy caused by the death of Governor Marvil, and become the governor of the State, then Watson's death, resignation, or removal could not create a further vacancy in that office. It would only continue the original vacancy. It is absurd to talk about a further vacancy in an office already vacant and continuing vacant. That is an impossibility. The vacancy already existing must first be filled before it is possible to create another or further vacancy in the same office. One vacancy happening in an office, there can not be another or a further vacancy in that office until the prior vacancy has been filled. A tenant may vacate his landlord's house, but there can not be another—a further—vacancy in that house until it has been again occupied. The expression "further vacancy" is wholly inexplicable upon any other theory than that the original vacancy had been filled and, in this instance, by Governor Watson. This seems to me conclusive.

This view is strengthened by the words of the constitution, which contemplate that the person exercising the office of governor may vacate his position by death or resignation, or he may be removed or become incapacitated; but if the contention of the opposition be correct that Watson did not become and is not now governor, and further, that the exercise of the office is not in itself an office, then Watson is holding no official place in connection therewith, and, although wielding all the powers of the executive office, he is in a position—call it what you may—from which there is no escape except by death. His only hope of relief is through the interposition of Divine Providence. True, the constitution declares he may relieve himself by resignation. But if he is not an officer he can not resign, for he has nothing to surrender. How can he resign that which he does not hold? He can not be removed, for he is in the occupancy of no official position. He may become a madman or an imbecile, yet no degree of incapacity can dislodge him from an office which he does not possess.

But, more than this, if the contention of the opposition that Watson is holding no official place in connection with the gubernatorial office is correct, then an immunity and distinction is conferred upon him which no other executive, State or national, enjoys. He is placed beyond the reach and power of impeachment. The constitution of the State of Delaware (Article V, section 2) provides:

The governor and all other civil officers under the State shall be liable to impeachment for bribery or any high crime or misdemeanor in office.

Who may be impeached? First, the governor. But, in the language of the Senator from Indiana, "Watson never was governor and could not be governor;" so he could not be impeached as governor. Secondly, who could be impeached? "All other civil officers." But, in the language of the Senator from Indiana, Watson was a senator and was—holding no other office under the State, none whatever. The right devolved upon him only to exercise the office of governor; but the right was not an office, it was simply a right; it was not an office.

If it was not an office, then its occupant was not and could not be and is not an officer; and so Mr. Watson can not be impeached as a civil officer for any crime or misdemeanor in connection with the gubernatorial office. It is no answer to declare that Watson may be impeached as senator or speaker for crimes committed in the executive office, for he may be required to exercise the office of governor long after the expiration of his term as senator. It will hardly be contended he could be impeached in an office which he has ceased to hold.

And so we have the anomaly and, I may be pardoned for adding, the absurdity of a person exercising all the functions of the great office of executive of a State with all its powers, civil and military, wholly exempt from that wholesome restraint which the right of impeachment secures. Such is the absurd result to which the contention of the opposition necessarily leads. It seems to me, therefore, from the clear and express language of the constitution itself, there is no escape from the conclusion that when Watson entered upon the exercise of the office of governor he filled a vacancy in that office, caused by the death of Governor Marvil, and, for the time being, became in fact the executive and was, therefore, within the inhibition of the constitution which prohibits any person from being a senator who is "holding any other office under the State."

But if there could be the slightest doubt about the intention of the framers of the Delaware constitution to wholly divorce the exercise of executive from legislative functions by the same person at one and the same time, such doubt must be wholly dispelled by that other provision of the constitution wherein it is declared that—

No * * * person holding any office under this State shall exercise the office of governor.

It is admitted that the senatorship is an office. If Watson, therefore, was and is senator, as is contended by the opposition, he is expressly interdicted from even "exercising the office of governor." He is doubly barred from the performance of the dual functions of governor and senator.

But it is sought to evade the effect of this latter inhibition by contending that its force is suspended in the case of a speaker of the senate, who, in obedience to the mandate of the constitution, is charged with the duty of exercising the office of governor; that such case constitutes an exception. If such was the intention of the framers of the constitution, why did they not so declare? Why did they not say that "no person holding any office under this State shall exercise the office of governor, except when its exercise devolves upon the speaker of the senate or house of representatives, as in this constitution provided." The fact, however, that they made no such exception is suggestive of the conclusion that they intended none.

But it is needless to grope our way through the uncertain and bewildering paths of legal speculation when we may confidently walk with steady and unfaltering step in a course illumined with the light of judicial learning. I propose to call attention only to two or three cases out of the many which seem to bear most directly upon the issue involved in this controversy. And first I will cite a case to which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] alluded in opening the debate, decided by the supreme court of the State of Maine, and reported in 7 Greenleaf, page 483. The constitution of the State of Maine contains the following provision (Article IV, section 14):

Whenever the office of governor shall become vacant, by death, resignation, removal from office, or otherwise—

Precisely like the constitution of Delaware—

the president of the senate shall exercise the office of governor until another governor shall be duly qualified; and, in case of the death, resignation, removal from office, or other disqualification of the president of the senate so exercising the office of governor, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a president of the senate shall have been chosen; and when the office of governor, president of the senate, and speaker of the house shall become vacant, in the recess of the senate, the person acting as secretary of state for the time being shall, by proclamation, convene the senate, that a president may be chosen to exercise the office of governor. And whenever either the president of the senate or speaker of the house shall so exercise said office he shall receive only the compensation of governor; but his duties as president or speaker shall be suspended; and the senate or house shall fill the vacancy until his duties as governor shall cease.

On the 14th of January, 1830, Joshua Hall, a member of the Maine senate, was chosen president of that body. Soon afterwards the governor died, and Hall entered upon the exercise of the office of governor. Sixteen senators, including Hall, had been admitted and sworn. On the 26th of January the senate decided that there were four vacancies. Under the constitution these vacancies were to be filled by a joint assembly of the legislature. On the 1st of February the house of representatives sent a message to the senate requesting that body to meet the house in joint assembly for the election of senators to fill the vacancies. On the 2d of February, the senate being in session, a senator moved an adjournment, in order that the members of the senate might meet the members of the house of representatives in joint assembly. Hall, who was then exercising the office of governor, appeared in the senate and claimed the right to act as president. The vote was taken by yeas and nays. Hall voted in the negative. His vote being counted, the result was—yeas 8 and nays 8; and the motion was lost. On the 13th of February Jonathan G. Hunton, having been meantime elected governor, submitted certain questions to the supreme court, in pursuance of a provision of the Maine constitution. One of these questions was the following:

2. Has the president of the senate, when the office of governor is vacant, and when he ought to be acting as governor, a right to preside and vote at the senate board?

The answer to this question was given by the chief justice, with the concurrence of the other justices, in the following words:

As to the second question, my opinion is that while the president of the senate, in virtue of his office as such, is clothed with the power of exercising the office of governor, he has no right to preside over the senate or to vote as a member of that body.

There is a provision of the Maine constitution which to some extent impairs, but by no means destroys, the value of this decision as an authority in the case now under consideration. It is to the effect that while the president of the senate exercises the office of governor his duties as president of the senate shall be suspended and a president pro tempore elected. Clearly Hall had no right to preside over the senate, for the constitution expressly suspended his functions as president of that body while exercising the office of governor, and the court was certainly right in so holding. But the court went further and declared Hall had no right to vote in the senate.

If this provision of the Maine constitution just quoted suspended the acting governor's duty to preside over the senate, it certainly does not suspend or purport to suspend his power or duty to vote as senator. If his power or duty to vote as senator is suspended, it must be suspended by some other provision of the State constitution. That other provision is to be found in a clause which is common to both the Maine and the Delaware constitutions, to the effect that "no person holding any office under the State shall, during his continuance in office, be a senator or representative." And this gives great value and weight to the Maine decision as an authority in the case now under consideration, for it makes the Maine case and the Delaware case, so far as this point is concerned, closely analogous. The prohibition is the same in both constitutions.

Mr. GRAY. I shall not interrupt the Senator if it annoys him, for I see he is making a close argument, and if he intimates that it will annoy him, I shall not interrupt.

Mr. BURROWS. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator says that the answer given by the chief justice to the question propounded by the governor of Maine was founded, in so far as that answer declares that the acting governor had no right to vote as a senator, upon a provision which forbade anyone holding an office under the State being a senator. If that be true, why was it necessary for the framers of the constitution of Maine, in addition to a provision which said that no one holding an office under the State should be a senator, to also add that the person who exercises—or whatever the phrase is—the office of governor shall be suspended in his duties as speaker; for, clearly, if he could not be a senator he could not be speaker?

Mr. BURROWS. I of course do not know what was in the minds of the framers of the constitution of the State of Maine when they declared that the duties of the president or speaker should be suspended while exercising the office of governor. They might have declared also that his duties as senator should be suspended during that time; but I suppose it never entered the mind of any one of the framers of that constitution, as it had never entered the minds of the people of Delaware until recently, that anyone holding the office of senator could at the same time exercise the office of governor or would ever attempt to do so.

Mr. GRAY. It seems to me, if the distinguished Senator will allow me further, that the framers of the constitution had in their minds that it might be possible when the speaker of the senate exercised the office of governor it would be claimed that he could still be speaker, because they said in effect that it was necessary to inhibit him from remaining as speaker by express words. So the framers of the constitution of Maine have practically put a construction upon that other inhibition, to wit, that no one exercising an office under this State, or holding an office under this State, shall be a senator, by afterwards, or in the same constitution, putting an additional prohibition that the person who exercises the office of governor shall be suspended as to his duties as speaker. They have evidently put that construction on the first inhibition by deeming it necessary to add the second.

Mr. BURROWS. However that may be, I think the decision of the supreme court on the question is directly in point; for they not only declare that by the express terms of the constitution his function as speaker was suspended, but also that he had no right to vote as a senator.

I have one other case, and only one, to which I desire to call attention, which I think is very important in this connection, and it is the case reported, as I have stated to the Senate, in 11 Oregon Reports, page 389, of Chadwick vs. Earhart.

By the constitution of the State of Oregon it is provided:

In case of the removal of the governor from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the duties of the office, the same shall devolve on the secretary of state; and in case of the removal from office, death, resignation, or inability both of the governor and secretary of state the president of the senate shall act as governor until the disability be removed or a governor elected.

This case arose in this way: The governor of the State was elected to the United States Senate and resigned the governorship, and thereupon, under the provision of the constitution just quoted, the secretary of state entered upon the performance of the duties of governor. The contention was whether the secretary of state was entitled to the salary of governor.

Chief Justice Waldo, delivering the opinion of the court—and the case is stated in the opinion very fully—said:

Two questions are submitted in this case. The first and principal one is whether, when, under section 8 of Article V of the constitution of Oregon, the duties of the office of governor devolve upon the secretary of state, he has a right to the salary of the office. Second, if this question be answered in the affirmative, whether he shall continue to perform the duties of the office for the remainder of the term of the outgoing governor, or shall he perform those duties only so long as he shall continue to be secretary of state.

"In case of the removal of the governor from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the duties of the office, the same shall devolve on the secretary of state; and in case of the removal from office, death, resignation, or inability both of the governor and secretary of state the president of the senate shall act as governor until the disability be removed or a governor elected." (Constitution of Oregon, Article V, section 8.)

Counsel for the respondent claims that, in the contingency provided for in said section 8, the duties of the office of governor become annexed to the office of secretary of state and are discharged as duties incident to the latter office; in other words, that the duties of the office, but not the office itself, devolve upon the secretary of state.

This position seems to require, first, either that the office of governor should continue vacant during the time the secretary discharges its duties, and that such duties be in some way performed by the secretary of state, as such, consistently with a condition of vacancy; or, second, that the office be filled, and yet he who fills it be in nowise governor, but continue to be merely secretary of state.

I think the case is on all fours with the one we have here:

In the first place, it is not shown how an office can be vacant and yet there be a person—not the deputy or locum tenens of another—empowered by law to discharge the duties of the office, and who does in fact discharge them. It is not explained how in such a case the duties can be separated from the office so that he who discharges them does not become an incumbent of the office; and, in the second place, how a person can fill the office of governor without being governor.

It is the function of a public officer to discharge public duties. Such duties constitute his office. Hence, given a public office and one who, duly empowered, discharges its duties, and we have an incumbent in that office. Such is the case here. The secretary of state, by force of the function cast upon him, becomes governor, and consequently entitled to the salary appertaining to the office.

In Merriam vs. Clinch, 6 Blatch., 9 (1867), Mr. Justice Blatchford said: "Three times since the adoption of the Constitution the President has died, and, under the provision referred to, the powers and duties of the office of President have devolved on the Vice-President. All branches of the Government have, under such circumstances, recognized the Vice-President as holding the office of President, as authorized to assume its title, and entitled to its emoluments. The Vice-President holds the office of President until a successor to the deceased President comes to assume the office at the expiration of the term for which the deceased President and the Vice-President were elected."

The case of The People, ex rel. Church, vs. Hopkins (35 N. Y., 74) is much in point. In 1859 a law was passed in New York establishing the office of superintendent of insurance. The superintendent was to be appointed by the governor for the term of three years, with authority to appoint clerks, one of whom was to be designated his deputy, and to "possess the powers and to perform the duties attached by law to the office of principal during a vacancy in such office, and during the absence and inability of his principal." The superintendent resigned his office, the duties of which thereupon devolved upon the deputy. The deputy claimed the salary of a superintendent during the time he discharged the duties of the office, and it was held that he was entitled to such salary.

The court, by Grover, J., supported the conclusion reached by references which are especially pertinent in this case: "But there are precedents which, though not judicial, I regard as entitled to be considered as decisive of the question under consideration. In the constitution of the State adopted in 1822 will be found the following provision: 'In case of the impeachment of the governor or his removal from office, death, resignation, or absence from the State, the powers and duties of the office shall devolve upon the lieutenant-governor for the residue of the term, or until the governor absent or impeached shall return or be acquitted.' (Const. 1822, Article III, section 6.) On he 11th of February, 1828, the office of governor became vacant by the death of De Witt Clinton, the then incumbent of the office, and its powers and duties, under the above provision of the constitution, devolved on Nathaniel Pitcher, then lieutenant-governor. The question arose whether he was to be regarded, in the exercise of the powers and performance of the duties so vested in him, as acting governor, or in the performance of the contingent duties of lieutenant-governor, and, as a consequence, whether he was entitled to the salary of the former office, or the compensation given to the lieutenant-governor for his services as such.

"It was held by William L. Marcy, then comptroller, that he was to be regarded as the acting governor, and entitled to the salary given by law to that officer. The same questions, under the same provision, again arose in 1829 upon the resignation of the office of governor by Martin Van Buren, and the powers and duties of the office devolving upon Enos T. Throop, then lieutenant-governor, and were decided the same way by Silas Wright, then comptroller. It will be seen that these questions were identical with that in the present case. We surely shall not go far astray in following the precedents established by these able jurists, wise statesmen, and rigid economists."

The principle on which the second question is to be decided, namely, whether the appellant shall cease to be governor when he ceases to be secretary of state, seems to be this: If an office be appendant, as the expression is in 1 Leon, 321, to another office, the determination of the first office will determine the second. This is the case where a person holding any office is ex officio entitled to some other office. For instance, in City of Portland vs. Denny (5 Oreg., 160) the recorder of the city of Portland was ex officio a justice of the peace. In that case the office of justice of the peace was appendant to the office of recorder and determined with it.

On the contrary, if the nomination or appointment to an office—

Now, mark the language—

On the contrary, if the nomination or appointment to an office be by descriptio personæ of one who holds some office by the title of which he is described, and who, on some contingency, is to enter and fill another office, the answering the description at the time the contingency arises designates him as the person who is to enter and fill the office, and when, as thus designated, he enters into the office he holds it in his natural and not in his official capacity. This seems to be the principle which applies when the office of governor devolves on the secretary of state on the happening of any of the events specified in the constitution. That the president of the senate, who holds under a similar title, ceases to be president of the senate when he becomes governor seems evident, for the two offices are incompatible at common law and there is no constitutional implication that both offices shall be held together. It would follow, therefore, that the president of the senate would hold the office of governor, once incumbent, without reference to his office of president of the senate. Now, as two offices may remain distinct which are not incompatible, though the officer is the same person, it would seem that the same principle should govern the holding of the office of governor by the secretary of state.

This question therefore must also be answered in favor of the appellant and judgment be entered accordingly.

Judgment reversed.

It seems to me that this case is directly in point and on all fours with the case we are trying in the Senate to-day.

It seems to me, in conclusion, in the light of reason and authority, that when Governor Marvil died and Watson entered upon the exercise of the office of governor, he became the executive of the State and, by reason thereof, was prohibited by the constitution from discharging the duties of senator, and that his participation in the proceedings of the joint assembly of May 9th, 1895, and vote therein for United States Senator were without authority of law and wholly void.

Mr. President, it is not my desire, nor is it my purpose, to examine the other ground occupied by the opposition, namely, that whatever the fact may be as regards the legality of Watson's vote, the Senate of the United States is impotent to investigate that question. Though clothed with constitutional power to "judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members," yet, in the exercise of that power, we can not cross the threshold of the legislature from which the election springs.

The governor of the State, or any other person with the consent of the legislature, may, in open violation of the organic law of the State, participate in the election of a member of this body, yet we are estopped from calling in question the legality of such act. Such a doctrine is an invitation to fraud in the legislative organization of every State; exposes this body to the machinations and intrigue of unscrupulous partisans, and menaces the very foundation of representative government. But, as I said, I shall not discuss this question, for I am persuaded if Senators are convinced that Watson had no right to vote for United States Senator, and that without his vote Du Pont was elected, they will not be restrained by any theory of estoppel from so declaring.

Mr. President, it is impossible for me to rid myself of the conviction that the course of Governor Watson, in entering the senate and the joint assembly of the State of Delaware on the final day of its session and casting his vote for United States Senator, was dictated by party necessity more than by any conviction on the part of Watson or his supporters that there was any warrant in the constitution or laws for a proceeding so unseemly and unexampled. After a struggle of nearly four months the day had come when it was conceded that Henry A. Du Pont, in a joint assembly of 29 members, would receive a majority of the votes and the election to the office of United States Senator. To prevent this result Governor Watson was summoned to the joint assembly and to vote against Henry A. Du Pont. He obeyed his party's mandate and, for the first time since his departure, reappeared and assumed legislative functions.

From the 9th day of April, 1895, when, in the presence of the senate, Watson took upon himself the oath "to support the Constitution of the United States and the State of Delaware, and to perform the duties of the office of governor of the State of Delaware with fidelity," until the 9th day of May thereafter, Governor Watson had taken no part in the proceedings either of the senate or the joint convention. On the 9th of April he received the thanks of the senate for the efficient manner in which he had discharged the duties of speaker, and thereupon vacated the chair, took leave of the senate, and retired from the chamber. From that time on, until the 9th day of May, he responded to no roll call of the senate or joint assembly. His name was not called in either body. He ceased to receive the compensation of a senator or speaker; his accounts for services in such capacity were adjusted and closed, and from that time on he has drawn and is now receiving only the salary of governor. He assumed the title of the executive of the State, and in all his official papers has subscribed himself as "governor." In all this he followed the footsteps of a long line of illustrious predecessors, no one of whom, in the whole history of the State, so far forgot the obligation of his oath of office or the proprieties of official life as to attempt to perform both legislative and executive functions.

In my judgment this whole business was an afterthought. Certain it is that it was a work distasteful to Watson himself, from which he shrank in the consciousness of its impropriety. On the very day the step was to be taken Watson declared: "I do not think it right, but my party demands it." This was the spur that "pricked the sides of his intent" and goaded him on to the consummation of the deed.

By this act Governor Watson thwarted the sovereign will of the people of Delaware and inflicted an irreparable injury upon the State by depriving her, for more than a year now, of that equal representation in the Senate of the United States to which, under the Constitution and laws of the country, she was justly entitled. I am aware of the fact that the high character and great ability of the distinguished Senator who stands sole sponsor for the State has reduced that injury to the minimum, yet this can not justify the wrong or palliate the offense. How long this disfranchisement of a State is to be tolerated and enforced it is impossible to forecast, but one thing is certain, that every hour of its continuance is a fresh grievance and an added injury. While we are powerless to make reparation for the past, the future is within our control. It is to be hoped that the judgment of the Senate will be such as to restore to the State her rightful representation in this Chamber by according to Henry A. Du Pont the seat to which he was elected and is justly entitled.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, Henry A. Du Pont applies to the Senate and asks to be admitted as a member thereof because he has received 15 votes in the Delaware legislature, which body consisted of 29 votes conceded to have been legal, and which Du Pont claims was the whole number of the legislature of that State at the time of his election, and that therefore he has received the vote of the majority of the members of the legislature of his State. His election is opposed on the ground that there was one other vote which was cast at the same election and which should be counted as such, and if counted does not give Mr. Du Pont a majority. That vote is the vote of Mr. Watson, and the circumstances that made his vote legal or illegal may be briefly stated: That he was elected and duly qualified as a senator of the State; that he was elected speaker of the upper house; that pending the session of the legislature, and after the voting on the subject of United States Senator had begun, the governor of the State of Delaware died, and in pursuance of the fourteenth section, Article II, of the constitution, a vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, the speaker of the senate, Mr. Watson, exercises the office of governor. He accepted that duty; entered upon that duty; ceased to act as senator and his name was stricken from the rolls of the senate and from the roll of the legislature. His name was not called during the month that elapsed between the death of the governor and the occasion on the 9th day of May which is involved here, though every day there was a vote on the question of United States Senator and every day the roll of the senate was called in joint assembly, his name was omitted. He exercised all the functions of governor; described himself as governor; was recognized as governor by the two houses, and had his pay as governor.

As has been illustrated by the case which has been read here by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], it is the governor who draws the salary and not the person who occupies the office of governor. Section 6 of Article III, at the top of page 29, provides:

The governor shall, at stated times, receive for his services an adequate salary, to be fixed by law, which shall be neither increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected.

In accepting the pay under that section Mr. Watson recognized himself as the governor and described himself as such in drawing the pay. In short, in the language of the constitution, he exercised the office and exercised it to its fullest extent. Under these circumstances the committee have found eleven reasons, stated at pages 40 and 41 of their report, why Mr. Watson's vote should not be recognized as a legal one, and, therefore, why Mr. Du Pont should be sworn in as a member of this body. The minority of the committee have stated their reasons in the same report.

The distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], of the minority of the committee, who apparently drew the report and signed it, has more fully and more clearly, in the elaborate and able argument made in this Chamber, stated the reasons for their opinion. I will briefly state them before discussing the particular questions involved. In doing so I use my own language and my deductions from his argument, which, as I analyze it, consists of these reasons:

First, that the record and journal of the joint assembly shows 30 votes were cast for the office of United States Senator, and that the record can not be disputed. If I understand rightly the argument of the Senator, this point goes to the extent that the conclusions stated in the record that there were 30 votes cast must control, although the record should also show, as it is claimed on the other side the record did show in this case, that there were but 29 votes in the legislature, and although the record should also show that 1 of the 30 votes had ceased to be a member of the legislature and had become governor. Or to take a more extreme case, the final entry in the record that there were 30, if conclusive, it would be equally conclusive though the same record had also shown that 5 or 10 of those votes had been persons who were never elected to the legislature; had never been qualified as legislators, but had been janitors or subofficers or persons on the street that had been added to make up the 30. I shall have occasion to discuss this point more at length a little later on.

The second ground taken by the Senator is that Watson did not become governor, but remained senator and speaker, exercising the office of governor.

The third, that if by chance he should continue to exercise the office of governor after the period for which he was elected to be senator or speaker he would exercise it neither as speaker nor senator nor governor, but would exercise the office as a person upon whom the constitution had devolved the duty of exercising the office of governor.

In this respect, if I understand him correctly, the learned Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] differs with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE]. According to the Senator from Mississippi, instead of his exercising the office as a person he claims that the office of speaker is continued—elongated, as it were—stretched out after the term for which he was elected senator, and continues on and on for the purpose of supporting the office of governor.

Fourth, that as speaker and senator he had the right and power to exercise at one and the same time all the functions of legislative and executive duty. That is, that he could sit in the Senate, preside over its deliberations, vote as a member, present bills to the same extent, and at the same time veto bills as the executive. Exercise the two functions hand in hand—pari passu.

The fifth position assumed by the Senator from Indiana—that the act of Watson going into the senate, taking the chair of the speaker a few moments before the vote on the 9th day of May at 12 o'clock m., and marching with the senate into the joint assembly and there voting without objection on the part of any other senator or any member of the assembly, was a judgment and adjudication of the senate as to his membership; and Sixth, that the adjudication of the Delaware senate thus rendered is binding upon the Senate of the United States, even though upon its face that judgment should appear to have been rendered erroneously—that is, if upon its face it should appear and should be found that Mr. Watson was not authorized to vote at all or be present—he claims that the action of the Senate of the State of Delaware is final in this adjudication, and the adjudication is the evidence of the finality of that action.

It is claimed on behalf of Du Pont that at the common law the office of senator and governor is incompatible. Putting it in other language, the mere statement of the fact that one and the same person has assumed to be governor, or to exercise that office, and assumed to be senator, strikes the average republican mind as wrong in principle, impossible that the same man can at the same time exercise these two offices, so contradictory in their functions. This is a sentiment that grows not merely out of common law, to use the phrase which has been so much commented upon here, but it grows out of the very nature and existence of the education of all free people. It has become crystallized into all State constitutions; it is the theme of essays and discussions on political freedom. Even the distinguished counsel who argued this case before the committee (I do not speak of the members of the Senate, but the counsel who appeared before the committee) against the application of Mr. Du Pont, say at page 9 of their brief:

> It is undoubtedly true that, in the American system of government, the separation of powers into three great departments—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial—is fundamental.

This comment made by the able counsel—and I take it they are among the very ablest of the State of Delaware—who framed the brief was made before they had heard the argument of the Senator from Mississippi, in which he asserts that there was no such doctrine and that it did not exist at the common law. It is fundamental because in all the education of a free people, of all English-speaking people, the theory and thought of keeping these three functions separate has been continuous. From the earliest beginning of liberty in England the distinction was recognized, a distinction that has been made wider, and deeper, and more consistent from that day to this, a distinction which has grown with the growth of republican principles and with the growth of liberty itself.

To refer to the brief again of opposing counsel, they assert that that thought has gone back clear to the early Greeks, and I quote again from the language of that brief:

> The idea is at least as old as Aristotle, who, in his Politics, says that there are in every State three divisions—the deliberative, or legislative assembly, the magistracy, and the judiciary.

The great thinkers of republicanism have always expressed this thought as the primary corner stone of civil liberty. The report contains, the briefs of counsel contain, and there has been quoted in this debate the language of Montesquieu and Lieber and Paley, showing the unbroken thread of thought on this matter. Not only have the great thinkers expressed the same views, but it flowers in the eloquence of the orators of the United States. It is emphasized by Webster, as already quoted before this Senate. Law writers Kent, Cooley, Sutherland, etc., have echoed this sentiment. The judiciary of this country have over and over again stated this division of power as the vital one of republicanism. Judge Waite, in the Sinking Fund Case (99 U. S., page 718), says:

> One branch of the government can not encroach on the domain of another without danger. The safety of our institution depends in no small degree on the strict observance of this salutary rule.

We say, then, that these two offices of governor and senator are incompatible. Not merely incompatible at the common law, but in the sense of republicanism. Wherever there is a republic existing or has existed, the executive and legislative are incompatible positions.

The Senator from Mississippi, in his able and careful argument, has challenged us to show that at the common law the office of the executive was incompatible with that of the legislative, and since I have listened to his argument I turn to a few of the fundamental definitions, to which I wish to call attention. First, I quote from Bacon's Abridgment the language of Lord Coke. He was a judge of the common law, if anybody was, as good as the Senator from Mississippi, and this is his language:

> Offices are said to be incompatible and inconsistent so as to be executed by the same person when from the multiplicity of business in them they can not be executed with care and ability, or when their being subordinate and interfering with each other it induces a presumption they can not be executed with impartiality and honesty. (Bacon's Abridgment, title "Offices" K.)

This authority will surely be recognized as common law. Let us apply the test of it to the case we have now. Can these offices be exercised at the same time, in such manner as not to interfere with the full, free, and complete exercise of each other; or would the fact that the person claiming to exercise the office of governor was a member of the legislature interfere with his prerogative or interfere with the prerogative of the legislature? Can the legislative power be free and not be interfered with when the executive is a part of it, directing it, voting with it, casting the tie vote, exercising in that manner, to the extent that the determinative vote will, the entire power of the legislature? And on the other hand, which is the necessary counterpart to be considered, is the executive not subordinate to the legislative power when the chief executive is a member of the legislative and sits in its body subject to its orders?

These are correlative questions and go to the definition of incompatibility; yet when the question is propounded to the Senator from Mississippi he says that they are foreign to the issue; that he is not here to answer conundrums; that he can not answer it; but he states frankly and fully and completely that if the executive is a member of the legislative he must be subject to its orders and surbordinate to its commands. When the Senator from Oregon asked him the question whether the legislature could compel Mr. Watson under the circumstances in which he was situate, if a member of that body, to appear before it and attend its sessions, the Senator from Mississippi frankly answered he must obey the orders of the body of which he is a member; but when asked the result and the effect, if Watson as the chief executive was engaged in the act of putting down rebellion or sedition, whether the Senate could control him by requiring him to attend upon them, he replied, as I said above, that these were questions which were immaterial. But is it immaterial to determine whether each office can be exercised so as not to interfere with the other? The common-law definition which the Senator has challenged us to produce showing incompatibility says that they can not be exercised together if they interfere in their operation, either on account of the multiplicity of objects or on account of the nature of the functions. Other definitions show the incompatibility in the sense that they interfere with the proper performance of the functions of each other.

I will read a brief section from Throop on Public Officers, a recognized authority on this subject, I believe:

> A learned American judge, discussing this question, has forcibly said that it has been erroneously supposed from the remarks of Lord Tenterden in Rex vs. Jones (1 B. & Adol., 677) that in order to render two offices incompatible there must be some such relation between them as that of master and servant—that one must have "controlment" of the other; or that one must be charged with the duty of auditing or supervising the accounts of the other; or that one must be chosen by or have the power of removal of the other. But these are only instances of incompatible offices, not definitions; and therefore it does not follow that these are all the instances in which offices are incompatible. Thus a judicial office and a ministerial office are incompatible. And in Rex vs. Tizzard (9 B. & C., 418), Bayley, J., gave another instance of incompatibility when he said: "I think that the two offices are incompatible when the holder can not in every instance discharge the duties of each."

If we were to go to the extreme extent which it has been claimed is the test of incompatibility as laid down in the case of Rex vs. Jones, that one must be under the "controlment" of the other, we would in this case have an illustration of it in the fact that whenever Mr. Watson claimed to exercise the duty of a legislator he is under the control of the legislature, he is under the control of the senate, and he could not exercise the executive office freely and independently while he is under that control.

I have one or two other definitions to which I wish to call attention from very fundamental and well-recognized writers. Blackstone, who is supposed to be a common-law writer, says:

> In all tyrannical governments the supreme magistracy, or the right both of making and of enforcing laws, is vested in one and the same man, or one and the same body of men, and whenever these two powers are united together there can be no public liberty. (1 Blackstone's Commentaries, page 145.)

In Rex vs. Hughes (12 Eng. C. L. Rep., 886,) I find the following:

> By the governing charter of a borough, there were to be ten aldermen and ten capital burgesses, and vacancies in the body of aldermen were to be filled out of the capital burgesses: Held, that the acceptance of the office of alderman by a capital burgess, even under a void election, operated as a surrender of the latter office, and that a person so elected and afterwards ousted on quo warranto was not thereby restored to the office of capital burgess; and therefore where a capital burgess became an alderman de facto by means of a void election and in the character of an alderman attended and voted at the election of a mayor, but was afterwards ousted on quo warranto: Held, that he could not be considered as having attended and voted as a capital burgess.

The case of Rex vs. Tizzard, in 9 Barnewall and Cresswell, which is referred to, is as follows:

> In the borough of W the town clerk is appointed by the mayor, aldermen, and baliffs to hold the office during their pleasure, with a salary which they have power to control in amount or withdraw altogether; and one of the town clerk's duties is to attend all corporate meetings of the mayor, aldermen, and bailiffs and burgesses and draw up minutes of their proceedings under their inspection. Held, that the offices of alderman and town clerk are incompatible, and that an alderman by accepting the latter vacated the former office. (The King vs. Tizzard, 17 Eng. C. L. Rep., 418.)

I quote a few definitions from our own American writers to the same purport. In Judge Sutherland's work on Statutory Construction, page 1, he says:

> In the Federal Constitution and in the State constitutions the three fundamental powers, the legislative, executive, and judicial have been separated—organized in three distinct departments. This separation is deemed to be of the greatest importance, absolutely essential to the existence of a just and free government.

Judge Wright, in the case of Bryan vs. Cattell, 15 Iowa, says:

> Incompatibility in offices exists where the nature and duties of the two offices are such as to render it improper from considerations of public policy for one incumbent to retain both.

That definition is adopted by Judge Dillon in his work on municipal corporations, and it is the law.

What is meant by the quotation from the Federalist upon which the Senator from Mississippi pins his argument, which he has brought here? That quotation is as follows:

> The whole power of one of these departments ought not to be exercised by the same hand which possesses the whole power of either of the other departments.

What is the whole power of the legislature as referred to in this clause? The legislature must act by the majority vote of each of the houses concurring as to the particular act or measure; in the election of a Senator the majority of the joint assembly, but in determining the action of the majority, it is the action of each that constitutes it. Every member must exercise his function equally with every other. It is the vote of each individual member that is final and decisive of the particular question that may be involved. Each one determines it and each one exercises the whole power of the legislature. Each member of this Senate is equally the judge with every other in this case, and his vote is the exercise of the whole power of adjudication. When a court consists of several members, each one is a complete judge of every case. If for any reason one member of the court is so disqualified by consanguinity or otherwise that he can not sit as the sole judge in the case, the entire judgment of the court is null and void; the disqualification of one disqualifies the whole bench, and it was so held in the celebrated case of Oakes vs. Aspinwall, 3 New York court of appeals. It has never been denied to be the law by any law writer or by any authority.

This is an illustration of the argument that I make, that each one of a composite body is necessarily a portion of the whole, and as such is exercising the whole power. When Watson came into the joint assembly and attempted to exercise with the 29 others legislative authority, he was attempting to exercise the whole power of the legislature. His casting vote gave him the entire power of the legislature if it is to be counted. He had the whole power of the executive, and was at this same time attempting to exercise the whole power of the legislature.

On the other hand, if the senate can control Watson by arrest, by bringing him before the body when he was exercising the office of governor; if they can bring him before the legislature and make him act as a part of it when he is at the head of the army, the senate is exercising the whole power of the executive. Taking the extreme definition which the Senator from Mississippi has given us, then, we find that to permit Mr. Watson at once to exercise the office of governor and to exercise the office of senator gave the legislature the exercise of powers of both and gave him the exercise of powers of both.

The Senator from Mississippi has turned to the illustrations of our own history, and has claimed from them that they disprove this common-law rule of incompatibility of offices; that they fall within different branches of duty of the Government. The illustrations taken from our own history by the Senator, instead of disproving the general definition of republican government, all show that the founders of our institutions regarded the division into three branches as essential to republican freedom. So far as there was any departure from the division in the early organization, it was temporary in its nature and has been changed, and was intended to be changed by those that constructed the Government, as soon as circumstances would permit. The States that in their organization infringed the rule, changed their obnoxious constitutions to conform to the common standard as soon as possible, and recognized the incompatibility of the executive and legislative by abolishing that power of the executive that interfered with the legislative as soon as possible. The ordinance of 1787, to which reference has been made as being an illustration of a contrary rule, only authorized the governor and judges to select laws from those of other States for a brief period. In it it is provided that as soon as the organization of the Northwest Territory could be effected there should be a joint assembly which should consist of the governors and legislative council of the houses of representatives, and that the organized Northwest Territory was designed to be, and was, a mere temporary arrangement until that territory could be divided and the States admitted to the Union upon the common pattern and the division of the three powers into separate branches.

This incompatibility is defined and recognized by the constitution of the State of Delaware. On every occasion the constitution has to mention the duties of the person succeeding to the office of governor there is either an applied or express prohibition. The clauses have been read many times.

Section 12, Article II:

> No person holding any office under this State shall be a senator.

Section 5, Article III:

> No person holding any office under this State shall exercise the office of governor.

Section 14, Article III:

> Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

These three have been in the various constitutions of the State ever since the State was a part of the Union. These three must be construed together. They are in pari materia. When construed together it would seem that there is but one construction which shall be consistent and which gives meaning to each of them, and that is the construction which has already been given by the majority of the committee, and stated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], that the language used in section 14 designates the person who shall succeed as heir to the high office of governor and does not designate an office which shall hold the office of governor ancillary or attached to it, and that when the speaker begins to exercise the office of governor he ceased to exercise the office of senator.

The distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] has argued with great ability and ingenuity that because the fourteenth section of Article III prescribes that the speaker shall exercise the office, that he does not thereby become governor, and therefore there would be no incompatibility in his continuing to be speaker and exercise the office of governor. That whole branch of the argument turns upon the distinction between "exercise the office of governor" and the governorship itself. But the prohibition of section 5 of the same article is not against an officer of the State being governor, but a prohibition that the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office of governor. "No person holding any office under the State" must include the speaker of the senate, and as long as he holds the office of senator he shall not exercise the office of governor. The prohibition is emphatic and can only be made consonant with the other section in the construction that upon his acquiring the office of governor or exercising the office of governor he ceases to be speaker.

The second position taken by the Senator from Indiana is that Watson did not become governor, but remained speaker and senator, exercising the office of governor; that the office of governor is attached to that of speaker; that the lesser office swallowed up the greater, made ancillary to it in such sense that it become one of the duties of speaker in the same manner, to use one of the illustrations of the distinguished Senator, that the Chief Justice of the United States exercises the duties of presiding over the Senate in case of impeachment of the President. The discussion as to whether Watson becomes governor or merely exercises the office is perhaps an immaterial one in the result of this case.

Whether we call him governor or merely a person exercising the office of governor, the prohibition of his exercising the two offices at one and the same time is equally strong for all reasons that may be brought therefor, and is equally strong in the language of the constitution of Delaware forbidding any person holding any State office to exercise the office of governor, and the incompatibility must certainly be as great, whether we call him by one name or call him by another. All the illustrations which the learned Senator from Indiana brings rather tend to comfirm him actually as holding the office rather than as exercising it as a part of another. He says that he acquires it as heir. He was the person whom it devolved upon as an estate devolved upon the heir at law; just precisely as the Prince of Wales acquires the title of King of England. It devolved upon him as heir. He inherits it; but does he exercise it as a part of the office of the Prince of Wales, or does he become the actual Crown itself, and does not the other office devolve upon somebody else in turn? By whatever name you call him the person that exercises the duties of the executive is the executive itself. The addition of the title neither adds to nor detracts from. He is still the supreme executive, and that vested in William T. Watson upon the death of Governor Marvil and the taking of the oath of office by Mr. Watson,

The constitution of the State of Delaware seems to differ. The whole position of the learned Senator from Indiana, that there is a distinction between exercising the office of governor and being governor itself, is set at rest and ended by the very first section of Article III: "The supreme executive power of the State shall be vested in the governor." That is equivalent to saying that he shall be the governor, in whom the supreme executive power is vested. What is meant by supreme executive power? It can mean nothing but an exercise of the duties of this great office, no matter by whom or whenever exercised. Watson was to exercise those duties when he took the office; exercise them fully to the same extent and the same manner and in the same fullness that a governor elected by the people could exercise them. The supreme executive power must be completely carried out or else he is not exercising the duties of the office. He was exercising the supreme executive power when he voted against Du Pont and was vested with that supreme power. What is vested? Webster says, "to vest, to clothe with authority; power; to put in possession." Watson was put in possession of the supreme executive power. He was clothed with the authority of supreme executive power. He could not exercise the office of governor without being vested with supreme executive power. In the language he was governor because he was vested with supreme executive power.

But suppose that the term of office of Watson—or of any other person who thus enters upon the duties of governor—as speaker expires before any governor is elected by the people and qualified as provided in the other section of the constitution? This question was put to the Senator from Indiana, and he was asked what position Watson would hold under those circumstances, and he said he would be a person upon whom would devolve the office of governor; in other words, he would cease to be speaker, he would cease to be senator, he would not be, according to the argument, governor, but he would simply be the person upon whom devolved.

Now, let us take the illustration a little further, and not an improbable one, because this constitution prescribes that in case there should be any controversy as to the office of governor, any contest, the person then exercising the office shall continue to hold over, so that at the expiration of the term of Mr. Watson, or any other of these persons similarly situated as speaker, he would be still exercising the office of governor. The contest might last three or four years. During that four years, or as long as that contest lasted, he still exercising the office of governor, another speaker is elected of a new senate; has this new speaker thus elected the right to assume the office of governor or to exercise the duties of the office of governor? If the governorship is but an appendant, a watch charm, an attachment, an auxiliary to the office of senator-speaker, if there is a new speaker elected he would be the governor, as there is no contest to his election. If Mr. Watson should continue to this office a new election is held, a new legislature takes its seat in January, 1897, a new legislature assembles, a new speaker is appointed, Watson still exercises the office of governor, the governor-elect, if any shall have been had, is contesting his seat, if it is a mere appendant and duty of the speaker of the house, as has been argued by the Senator from Indiana and the senior Senator from Nebraska, this man is by right speaker, for Watson can no longer, by any imagination, be held to be speaker, must have the right to enter upon the duty of governor, and yet we are flatly met with another prohibition in the constitution, because it is provided that the person who once begins to exercise the office shall exercise it until a governor elected by the people shall have duly qualified.

If the Senator from Mississippi meets this question by saying that there are States and there may be contingencies in which there may be two speakers, I answer, true: There might possibly be such a provision made in the constitution; but, as he reminded, us we are not making a constitution, but we are construing one, and by the constitution of Delaware there is but one speaker created. There is no provision for two speakers. There can be but one; and there is none other provided for. If the position of the Senator from Mississippi be correct and the speakership is lengthened out until a subsequent contest is decided and a subsequent governor has duly qualified, then there would be no place for Watson. If he had the right to cast a vote before, he would have the right also to cast a vote afterwards. He would become the thirty-first member of the legislature and his right would have been just as great after a new legislature had been created, after they had taken their seats, as it was when Du Pont was being elected. If he could vote for Du Pont, and there should chance to be no election for governor next year, he would have the same right, under that argument, to turn around and go in and vote again upon the senatorship and cast the thirty-first vote.

The illustration of impeachment has been made by many of the Senators asking this question, and has been answered, that if a person who thus succeeds, as Watson did, to the duties of the office of governor, should improperly exercise it, how would he be impeached? They say he is impeached as senator. But suppose that after his term of senator has expired, after he is not speaker, and another person is elected speaker, he then usurps authority and is guilty of malfeasance in office, commits the crime of treason against his State, in what capacity is he to be impeached? The Senator from Indiana says he is merely a person upon whom has devolved this great duty, not a governor, not a speaker, not a senator, but a person who holds no office, but has merely crept into and exercises the duties of one without holding it. Is it possible that a constitution which provides so fully and clearly for impeachment as this constitution does shall be construed to leave the State without the power to exert that method of punishment at the very emergency when it would be liable to be most needed? A person exercising the office of governor, not elected, simply holding it, would have more temptation and more occasion perhaps to violate the duties of that of governor than one who was duly elected. The distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] has asked for the analogy between this constitution and the laws of the United States with regard to the succession to the Presidency, and has read to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] while discussing this question the last statute passed providing for that succession, and the Senator from Delaware referred to the old statute as it existed prior to 1886, when the succession devolved upon the Speaker of the House.

Let us look at the illustration for a moment. If the Secretary of State succeeds to the office of President of the United States or acts as President has he no power to create a new Secretary of State to take his place? If he should resign as Secretary of State would he resign as President? Does he not, as in the case of the Prince of Wales becoming King—does he not, too, assume the crown and leave behind him the old office for some one else to occupy; vacate the office of Secretary of State in favor of the greater office that he accepts? Under the old law was it the design or expectation of the law if the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States should, under the circumstances provided in the act, become President of the United States, that he would still continue as Speaker, that he would exercise the duty as a member of the lower House, originating legislation, discussing legislation, recognizing the members to speak and acting as czar and autocrat therein, as it is said the Speaker does, and at the same time have the power to veto? This is the question which the Senator from Delaware says has been affirmatively answered by one of the Senators upon this floor. This affirmative answer, however, would show that the Government of the United States might in that contingency cease to be republican in form.

The uniform construction of one hundred years of Delaware has been appealed to as the construction of this constitution. It being claimed that because four or five senators who have succeeded from the office of speaker to that of exercising the duty of governor reentered upon their duties as senator, that was a construction of the whole State of Delaware. My answer to that is, in the first place it is a construction of a fact wholly immaterial to the issue here. It makes no difference in the issue here whether after the duties of the incumbent shall cease he can retake his position as senator or not. The thing which is of vital importance is, can he exercise both at one and the same time; can he exercise the duty of senator, speaker, and governor on the same day and on the same occasion and altogether concurrently? Upon that we have the affirmative construction, not merely the construction by "neglect," as the Senator says, but the affirmative construction of the conduct of every legislature in the one hundred years. When the question has arisen we have the affirmative construction placed upon it by this very legislature, and this very officer recognizing the construction placed upon it by all the previous officers. We think the construction placed upon the constitution by the four or five going back and acting as senator when their duty as governor had ceased was an error upon the part of those gentlemen, but it is an immaterial thing anyway. The distinguished Senator from Mississippi appeals to us and asks us to put the case of Du Pont upon the issue as to whether it was a vacancy, or a suspension, or an abeyance. It makes no difference which it was. Any one of these roads would lead to the same conclusion and lead Du Pont into the Senate. To that it is replied there is and can be but one right, and if we can not select the right one none is right. We may not be able to agree upon which is right, we may differ which is right, but know that the right is among them. One Senator may think that the office is in suspension; another may think it is vacated; another may think it is in abeyance; but as the argument arrives at the same result in each case, it must be entirely immaterial by which one of these methods we travel to that common goal.

We find another argument against the claim that the duty of exercising the office of governor is attached to the speakership in the language of the constitution at page 30, as printed, part of section 14, Article III, as follows:

> If upon a vacancy happening in the office of governor there be no other person who can exercise said office, within the provision of the constitution, the secretary of state shall exercise the same until the next meeting of the general assembly, who shall immediately proceed to elect by joint ballot of both houses a person to exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

If it had been the design that this duty should attach to the speakership as a part of it, all that would have been necessary to have been done would be when the legislature or general assembly was elected for the senate to meet and elect a speaker. He would ipso facto and by virtue of his office at once become governor. But the constitution it seems provides that he shall not be governor or exercise the office of governor at all in this contingency, as above stated. The assembly shall meet, and, of course, each House must elect its own officers, including the speaker, but instead of that speaker exercising the office of governor, the assembly shall yet proceed to elect by joint ballot of both houses, not a speaker, but a person to exercise the office of governor until a governor is elected by the people and shall be duly qualified.

Argument is made by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi that the words at the top of page 30, in section 14, "The person holding the office shall continue to exercise it until a governor shall be elected and duly qualified," must necessarily apply to some other case than to that where the speaker has succeeded to the duty of exercising the office of governor; and this is the only reason given for it, that on the previous page it had already been provided that in such case the speaker shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. The learned Senator says that the constitution having already provided for the office being exercised in that contingency until the governor elected by the people shall be qualified, it can not be that in the next sentence the same contingency would be provided for again, and therefore some other construction must be given to this provision. This argument must presuppose as its basis that the constitution makers of Delaware always use the most concise language and were never guilty of any repetition of thought, and use every word in its precise meaning, and so the Senator has taken occasion to tell us at various times how carefully this constitution was drawn and how accurately the language is used. A further examination of this same section, however, will show that this constitution repeats the same thought and the same protection over again in other language, even under the construction placed upon it by the Senator from Mississippi himself. We find that the command upon the speaker of the senate that he shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified is repeated in the latter part of the section, where it is stated—

> If the trial of the contested election shall continue longer than until the third Tuesday of January next ensuing the election of a governor, the governor of the last year or the speaker of the senate or of the house of representatives who may then be in the exercise of the executive authority shall continue therein until a determination of such contested election.

Of course if he must continue until his successor is qualified he must continue until not only the contested elections are determined. but still longer, until the qualification of the successful contestant has taken place. Here we have an instance and illustration of how this constitution repeats the same provision by the same authority over and over again. It would seem to be that each one of these different commands were but different forms of repeating the authority and maintaining the protection to the people of having an executive by providing that the same person shall exercise the office and shall continue to exercise the office in different forms of language. All three mean one and the same thing, in two places describing the person who is to exercise it or continue to exercise it as speaker, and in another as the person holding the office.

Counsel who argued this case before the committee have placed in their brief, and cited at page 52, a case from Pennsylvania. It is said that the Pennsylvania constitution at that time was word for word like that of Delaware. It is cited by the counsel for the purpose of showing the construction placed upon the constitution by the acting governor and the assembly of Pennsylvania, and it is claimed and cited by the Senator from Mississippi as an authority that the speakership and the exercising of the office of governor are indissolubly blended together, and that the speakership continued after Mr. Johnston had entered upon the exercise of the duties of the office of governor. At most, the authority does not even give the opinion of Mr. Johnston except as it might be inferred from his conduct. All that can be claimed for it, then, is that by his conduct one Mr. William F. Johnston has interpreted the constitution according to the views of the Senator from Mississippi. We might ask here who is Johnston? Was he a learned lawyer, a judge, or anybody whose opinion would throw any light or weight on the action of this Senate? Decisions of courts of the highest character are not always even conclusive upon other courts or tribunals. Mr. Johnston may or may not have been a man of any weight or consequence any further than that he was elected governor of the State of Pennsylvania.

A great many governors of a great many States have been very ignorant of law, and his position as governor would give no guaranty or learning or ability. But if we look at the record a little more carefully we will see that Mr. Johnston and the Pennsylvania legislature considered the office of speaker and the duty of exercising the office of governor entirely distinct things and not indissolubly blended together. Johnston, it seems, had been elected governor after he had entered upon its duties the year before, on the 13th day of January, 1849. Whether it was before or after the time for which he had been elected expired or not does not appear; at all events upon that date he resigns, or tenders his resignation to the senate of Pennsylvania as speaker and also resigns to the speaker of the senate as senator. But reference to that record will show that while the resignation was accepted he did not enter upon the duties of governor until the 17th, four days later. On the 15th and 16th the legislature was in session transacting business as a legislature, and of course necessarily somebody was acting as governor and that somebody must have been this same William F. Johnston. So that by his conduct and his action in this very case we have the opinion of Mr. Johnston, whatever it may be worth, that he could continue in this position of exercising the office of governor to which he had succeeded under the statute only after he had ceased to be speaker and after he had ceased to be senator, and after he had actually resigned those places and his resignation had been accepted.

It is argued by the Senator from Mississippi that if the presiding officer of the senate at the time of the alleged election of Du Pont was not authorized to act as we claim, that then there was no joint assembly, no senate there, and that the election would be void for that reason. The act of Congress does not prescribe that each house shall be there, nor does it provide anyone to preside over that joint assembly. It was not necessary that there should be two presiding officers in a joint assembly, one over the senate and one over the House. It was competent and has not been uncommon for the joint assembly to select their own presiding officer. It is not the two houses that are met there, as has been so extensively argued without authority, or rather asserted, it is under the act of Congress. It is the members of the two houses who convene in joint assembly.

Discussion has been had in some of the States as to who would be the proper presiding officer where there is a lieutenant-governor, who can not take part in the election of a United States Senator. In some States they have selected a member of the senate to preside over the joint assembly, in others they have selected the speaker of the house; but they might as well select any other member of the house or any other member of the senate. The formality of one body marching in form and order into the midst of the other was an unnecessary proceeding. If, without any form members assemble that is all that the statute requires. All that is necessary is that the roll shall be called and the vote recorded. When that is done the members of the two houses have performed their duty, and it becomes then the duty of the United States Senate to act upon the record thus made. It is not for the State alone to be satisfied with this record; the United States has an equal interest in seeing that the members of the two houses have voted. As was illustrated by the question during the argument of this case, if there was a majority of all the members of the two houses, that would give jurisdiction to the joint assembly to elect a Senator although there was not a full quorum of one of the houses. In other words, 15 members of the house and 1 senator would make a majority of the members of the two houses, and they would have jurisdiction to elect a United States Senator, though there was no senate there except as represented by that 1 member. Perhaps I might even go further and say that 21 members that being a majority of the members of the two houses, might have all been from the lower house, and the senate not there at all. It is not necessary, however, to go to that extent; but that might be, and yet be within the pale of the statute of the United States.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. Does the distinguished Senator think that an election for Senator of the United States under the Constitution could be had where it was made by the members of one house alone, and still conform to that provision of the Constitution which says that the Senators from each State shall be chosen by the legislatures thereof?

Mr. BROWN. I think it could.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware whether it has ever been disputed, since the passage of the act of 1866, that if there is a majority of all the members elected to both houses present, there is a competent assembly to elect a Senator, although the members may all come from one house, and there is not present any from the other house?

Mr. GRAY. It has been disputed, notably by the distinguished Senator from Vermont, Mr. Edmunds, the predecessor of the present junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. CHANDLER. I had the impression that there had been no serious dispute on that point, it being the whole object of the law to prevent the members of one house from defeating the election of a United States Senator, if there was a majority numerically of all the members elected to both houses present.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Utah. This is not material to his argument.

Mr. BROWN. It is not material; but the position I have taken certainly can not be disputed if the act of Congress is a constitutional and valid one.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That was one of the principal questions raised and argued when the objection was urged that the act was not constitutional.

Mr. CHANDLER. That was Senator Edmunds's point.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Senator Edmunds's objection was, as I understood him to argue very strenuously, that in his opinion the act of Congress was unconstitutional.

Mr. CHANDLER. But there has been no dispute as to the meaning of the law as it stands on the statute book.

Mr. BROWN. The distinguished Senator from Mississippi, among other positions, has insisted that the title of an officer de facto of any kind or character can not be assailed collaterally, or in any proceeding collateral or direct, unless in a suit where such officer is himself made a party and the public is represented by the State, and some Massachusetts authorities have been read here to show what a de facto officer is, and that a de facto officer applies to one as well who occupies an incompatible office as one who is wrongfully in office for any other cause, all to show that accepting incompatible office did not vacate the first. But after all the definitions and on the reasoning of all the cases which have been read or can be read, it is necessary to constitute a de facto officer that he must be in possession of the office and exercising the office. The very first case cited by the Senator from Mississippi in the 1st Allen begins with the definition by saying "one who comes into office by the forms of law," etc. The next one was the one who was in the office under color of title. To all of these we answer that Mr. Watson was not in office either with or without color of title. When, on the 9th day of April, he formally left and was thanked for the services which he had rendered as speaker, when he took the office as governor, when the legislature by its proper officer dropped his name from the roll, and in every other public manner possible showed he severed his relations with the office of speaker and of senator, he ceased to hold de facto or under color of title or had any possession or exercise of it. If he was not in possession he was not an officer de facto, whether he had the authority or did not have the authority. There can not be found a printed case where the doctrine of de facto officer has less application than to this of Mr. Watson. There always must be a person continuing consecutively and constantly to exercise the office. When he has formally renounced the office, when he has stepped out of the office and says, "I am not exercising it," he can not go back to it on some other occasion and say, "I am now de facto officer and now exercise the duties."

To this effect I quote a few authorities. First, I read an expression from The People vs. Carrique (2 Hill, 97):

> It is therefore said that by continuing to act in the justice's court this was rather an election to hold the first office, notwithstanding his accepting, taking the oath, and entering on the duties of the second. The contrary is entirely settled, and the effect directly opposite to that which is supposed to have followed.
> It is said in the book already cited (same page) that a resignation by implication may take place by being appointed to and accepting a new office incompatible with the former one. And it is added to a note (N. 4) that—
> This is an absolute determination of the original office and leaves no shadow of title to the possessor, so that neither quo warranto nor amotion is necessary before any other may be elected. (Vid Willock on Mun. Corp., 240-617 to the same point.) Ld. Mansfield in Rex vs. Trelawaney, 3 Burr., 1615; Buller, J., in Milward vs. Thatcher, 2 T. (87).

In Biercourt vs. Parker, 27 Tex., 562, the court used this language:

> On the acceptance and qualification of a person to a second place incompatible with one he is then holding the first office is ipso facto vacated. (The People vs. Carrique, 2 Hill, 93.) A resignation by implication will take place by being appointed to and accepting a new office incompatible with the former one. It is said to be an absolute termination of the original office and leaves no shadow of title to the possessor. So that neither quo warranto nor amotion is necessary before another may be elected. (Rex vs. Trelawaney, 3 Bun., 1616; Milward vs. Thatcher, 2 T. R., 87; Willock on Mun. Corp., 240-617; Ang. and Am. on Corp., 255.)

In The People ex rel. vs. Common Council (77 New York, 510), the court says:

> The moment he accepted the new office the old became vacant. His acceptance of the one was an absolute determination of his right to the other and left him "no shadow of title, so that neither quo warranto nor amotion was necessary." (People, ex rel. Whiting, vs. Carrique, 2 Hill, 95-97; Dill. on Mun. Corps., section 164, and cases cited in note 1.) These cases also show that this would be so at common law and independent of the statute. He was no longer alderman de facto or de jure. The plea of plenarty on which the appellany's counsel insists, or that the office was "full of him," and which is also set up in the answer to this proceeding, is in no sense well founded. It can not be sustained even by a legal fiction. The office was and is as vacant as if Mr. O'Rielly had never been born; his removal is as complete as if caused by death. When he accepted the new office, the other ceased to have an incumbent. It was not a case, therefore, for quo warranto, for that will lie only when the party proceeded against is either de facto or de jure officer in possession of the office. (King vs. Corporation of the Bedford Level, 6 East., 368.) And an office that is vacant is in possession of no one. Besides, such writ issues when the facts are in dispute, and one object aimed at is to ascertain the facts. Here no fact is disputed, but a mere question of law.

Yet, notwithstanding these authorities, the distinguished Senator from Indiana would argue, and did argue, if I understood him, that some action was necessary; that he must be kicked out by the senate; he must be determined by the senate of Delaware not to be in office, or he must have resigned. The action was in being sworn in as governor. That was a resignation; that was a termination of his office as senator or speaker.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Utah will allow me at this point I should like to call his attention to what doubtless he has not hitherto seen, the very best statement of that doctrine which I have yet noticed. It is to be found in the constitution of the State of Mississippi, adopted November 1, A. D. 1890. With the Senator's permission I will read what it says.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. Section 2 reads:

> No person or collection of persons being one or belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others.

Now, I call the Senator's attention and also the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to the following clause:

> The acceptance of an office in either of said departments shall of itself and at once vacate any and all offices held by the person so accepting in either of the other departments.

That, to use the Senator's own expression, is the crystallization by the Senator from Mississippi as late as 1890 of the doctrine on this subject which the Senator is exhibiting to the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. What is the date of the constitution, if the Senator will allow me?

Mr. CHANDLER. November 1, 1890.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will ask whether the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] was not a member of that convention?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no doubt it is the work of the great mind and brain of that distinguished constitutional lawyer, the Senator from Mississippi, who I find——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He was a member of the convention.

Mr. CHANDLER. I find that J. Z. GEORGE was a delegate at large.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Utah allow me to proceed?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Mississippi has been drinking in constitutional law ever since boyhood, and in 1890 he crystallized the whole American constitutional law upon this subject, and here it is in the constitution of Mississippi absolutely conclusive upon the point which the Senator from Utah is making.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator from Utah will allow me, in the absence of the Senator from Mississippi, whom the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] so felicitously says has been drinking something since childhood—I did not catch what it was——

Mr. CHANDLER. Law; law; nothing but law. No other liquid or fluid, but substantial law.

Mr. GRAY. Allow me to say that it is exceedingly interesting to find what he calls this crystallization of a proposition in the written text of the constitution, and it will be exceedingly interesting when Delaware comes to summon its constitutional convention, as it may shortly do, to consider whether it also will crystallize that provision into the written text of the constitution then to be formed. But as it stands now it seems to me that it points very decidedly in the direction which we have been arguing on this side, that it takes an express constitutional provision in order to enforce that doctrine.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is where the Senator from Delaware and I differ, as we frequently do on great constitutional questions. I hold that that has been the law for a hundred years.

Mr. GRAY. Then it was not necessary to state it in the constitution of Mississippi.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; but constitutions are full of unnecessary assertions. The Senator from Utah has already called attention to the fact that there never yet was a constitution with no unnecessary word in it. The Senator from Delaware does not contend that in every case where there is a prohibition in the constitution the thing prohibited would have been lawful without the prohibition. It is a mere assertion of the law as the Senator from Mississippi has gathered it in his long experience. It was the law before he comprehended it; it was the law before he enunciated it, and it is the law of America to-day and has been for a hundred years.

Mr. BROWN. In other words, constitutions, the same as statutes, are often merely declaratory of what is the common law. The Bill of Rights which, was supposed to have existed in this country before the Revolution, before the Constitution was organized, was merely framed in words and made a part of the Constitution of the United States. It is not necessarily a change of the law because it is made in writing.

I think I discovered in the reading which the Senator from New Hampshire has given us a reason why the argument of our friend the Senator from Mississippi deviated from the argument of the Senator from Indiana. It was the Senator from Indiana who so emphatically and so lengthily said that it would require some act; that there was no ipso facto doctrine; but that some act of Mr. Watson or some act of the legislature or some act of the senate was necessary to sever Mr. Watson's relations as senator. He must be kicked out, he must resign, is the effect of his argument. The Senator from Mississippi, however, takes a little different tact. He evidently had in view the constitution which he himself had drawn.

I wish to read another definition of the effect of accepting incompatible offices. I did not suppose it would be disputed till both Senators seemed to discuss it so lengthily. Therefore I read from an elemental authority. I read from Judge Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations, section 164:

An office may be impliedly resigned or vacated by the incumbent being elected to and accepting an incompatible office. The rule, says Parke, J., in a leading English case on this subject, that where two offices are incompatible they can not be held together, is founded on the plainest principles of public policy, and has obtained from very early times. The principle applies not only where the second office is the superior and more important one, but also where it is not. The rule has been generally stated in broad and unqualified terms, that the acceptance of the incompatible office, by whomsoever the appointment or election might be made, absolutely determined the original office, leaving no shadow of title in the possessor, whose successor may be at once elected or appointed, neither quo warranto nor amotion being necessary.

The same rule was applied in the case of Rex vs. Hughes (5 B. & C.). There were 10 aldermen and 10 capital burgesses, a house and senate. One of the aldermen was elected a capital burgess, and after being elected to that place he continued to act as alderman, as he claimed, de facto. The court held that he could not be considered as acting at all; that it was a mere nullity.

The distinguished Senator from Mississippi read authorities from Massachusetts on the subject of a de facto officer and as to its requiring some action to remove him; and as he read them I did not know but that there might be some conflict on this subject. To-day I sent down to the library, and I find that one of the very cases which he himself cited, not quoted to the Senate, also lays down the rules as strongly as any that no action is necessary; that he is not an officer after he takes that incompatible office. I read from Commonwealth vs. Hawkes (123 Mass.):

By the common law, when two offices of public trusts are incompatible with each other a person holding the one is not disqualified to be appointed or elected to the other, but his acceptance of the second office is in law an implied resignation of the first, whenever it may be resigned by the mere act of the incumbent, without the assent or concurrence of a superior authority.

Then the court quotes a long list of authorities—

There may be municipal or county offices that a person can not decline to accept, and therefore has no right to resign at his own will. But under the Constitution of the United States and of this Commonwealth, at least, a judicial office, depending upon the appointment of the Executive, no person is obliged to accept or to hold longer than he pleases, but has the absolute right to resign at any time. (United States vs. Wright, 1 McLean, 509.)

Did Watson not have the absolute right to resign the speakership at any time—the absolute right to resign the senatorship at any time? He did not have to ask the consent of the other members of the senate. That was an absolute right in him, and when he accepted the office of governor or accepted the duty of exercising the office, it was ipso facto a resignation—

It follows that the defendant, by taking the seat to which he had been elected in the house of representatives—

Taking the seat of governor in this case——

Mr. GRAY. Would not his resignation have to be accepted by the senate?

Mr. BROWN. I think not. I think it is an absolute right of the senator to leave the office. I do not know that any Senator of this body is liable to resign, but if any of them should, I think he has the right to resign without the consent of the other members of the Senate.

It follows that the defendant, by taking the seat to which he had been elected in the house of representatives, legally vacated his judicial office, unless there is something in the constitution itself which controls the general law. Upon examination of all the provisions of the constitution on the subject, we are of opinion that they affirm, rather than reverse or qualify, the rule of the common law as applicable to the case.

When the Senator referred to those authorities it seems as if he believed they disputed the doctrine laid down in the common-law cases which I have read.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator whether the case from which he has just read is one of implied resignation of the legislative office?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir. He was a justice or a judge of some kind, and he accepted the position of member of the legislature—of the senate or of the house of representatives—I do not know which.

Mr. President, on another ground I claim that the office——

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me, because the point is interesting? Which office was held to be vacated in that case?

Mr. BROWN. The first one.

Mr. GRAY. The office of justice of the peace?

Mr. BROWN. The office of judge.

Mr. GRAY. Not the position of member of the legislature?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir. Accepting the second office vacates the first. This authority is in conformity with the universal rule.

Mr. GRAY. Where the first is not a legislative office.

Mr. BROWN. It makes no difference what the office is.

Mr. GRAY. You can not get any authority——

Mr. BROWN. The first is held to be vacated.

The executive offices are incompatible with legislative offices in the meaning of that clause of the Constitution of the United States, section 4, Article IV, which provides "that the United States shall guarantee each State a republican form of government." This clause of the Constitution of the United States has had less occasion to be adjudicated and considered in courts than most any other. Decisions upon it are few, but its meaning would seem to be plain that all departments of the United States Government, in whatever manner it may be appealed to, shall maintain only the republican form in the State governments. The determination of what is a republican form probably primarily rests (7 How.) with Congress itself. It has been consigned at times by Congress to the Executive with regard to some of the States growing out of the reconstruction. It was for the Executive to determine whether the new States were republican in form or not.

In the case of the very latest State admitted into the Union, in the act of admission or the enabling act to permit the formation of a constitution it was provided that the constitution of the new State when framed should be submitted to the Executive and by him determined as to whether or not it was republican in form. But the power of the Executive to thus determine its republican form came from the act of Congress and not from the Executive duty alone. It is the duty of Congress to maintain that guaranty. It is needless here to inquire how far Congress would be called upon to interfere with the State government in purely local matters in case the State government was not republican, but whenever the State government comes before Congress itself, or any branch of it, legitimately, and the question arises incidentally whether the State has a republican form of government or not, it is the duty of such branch of Congress itself to so construe the acts and conduct of the State as to perfect and maintain that guaranty. The right and duty is recognized in Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard 1, page 42.

The republican form of government had already its definition when the Constitution was created. It meant what the writers and thinkers on civil freedom had said it should mean. It meant what the common law had determined, to wit: The preservation of the distinction of the duties between the executive, the legislative, and the judiciary. No State that amalgamates these three forms into one and obliterates this distinction can be said to be republican. If a new State should be formed which should consign to the chief justice of the State the power to pass laws and the power to exercise the office of governor and combine them all in one in his person, it could not be said to be republican in form. It would be directly the reverse. Call it by republicanism if you will, it is a contradiction of itself; the terms of the constitutional guaranty would not be kept, and it would be the duty of Congress to interfere and prevent such a State exercising the forms of a State government. If a government is not republican, in extreme cases, where all three powers are vested in one and the same person, it must be true in less extreme cases to the extent that the distinction is obliterated and wiped out. A State that says the executive shall make laws in whole or in part is just as objectionable to the guaranty of this clause of the Constitution as it would be to authorize the executive to be the judge as well as the governor. It is abhorrent to the very terms of the English tongue and abhorrent to the very idea of republican government. It is therefore contradictory to this clause in the Constitution, which says:

That the United States shall guarantee to each State a republican form of government.

It has been stated here in the debate that there is one State, or was at one time one State, in this Union where the governor was required and empowered to act as the chief legislator, with the chairman to be the presiding officer of the grand committee, the presiding officer of the senate to have the casting vote in certain cases, and to be the executive in addition. Such a State government was contrary to the prohibition contained in the section which we are considering. It would have been the duty, whenever the act of such a State came before Congress, or before the Executive of the United States, to decide that it was not republican in form and could not be enforced as a republican government. It was brought before the courts and held that Congress must decide. It might possibly have been in the power of the United States Congress to have interfered and in some manner prevented the maintaining of such a government in the State of Rhode Island. But the Constitution of the United States has prescribed no method by which this guarantee shall be fulfilled.

The constitution of that State was brought before the court in the case I referred to, Luther vs. Borden, and Judge Tawney, among other things in a long decision, gave this opinion:

The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion and, on the application of the legislature or of the executive (when the legislature can not be convened) against domestic violence. Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guarantees to each State a republican form of government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the senators and representatives of the State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority, and its decision is binding upon every other department of the Government and can not be questioned in a judicial tribunal. It is true that the contest in this case did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue, and as no Senators or Representatives were elected under the authority of the government of which Mr. Dorr was the head, Congress was not called upon to decide that controversy. Yet the right to decide is placed there and not in the courts.

In other words, the question as to whether it would be according to a republican form of government for Mr. Watson to act as legislator and governor both is placed here, and we exercise it by admitting Senators and Representatives into the councils of the Union.

That is the expression of the judge:

When the Senators and Representatives of the State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the Government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority.

It is for us, when a Senator applies here for admission, to inquire whether he has been elected by a legislature under a republican form of government. One means of carrying it out we have here in this case. Now, a case where we can apply the principle and maintain the guaranty is here in this particular case of Du Pont's by saying that the constitution of Delaware must be construed as to be consistent with the idea of republicanism, and can not be so construed as to be contrary to republican form of government. Giving this constitution upon which these differences have arisen the construction which has been contended for by the minority of the committee and the Senator from Indiana empowers the governor to act as speaker at the same time, and senator at the same time, introduce bills as senator, vote upon them as senator, to decide upon their vote as speaker, and enforce them as governor; at one and the same time to exercise all classes of duty, legislative and executive, on the same day, in the same person, at the same hour, and at the same place, from the same chair.

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator think that if that merely was embodied in the constitution of the State of Delaware it would constitute a form of government nonrepublican?

Mr. BROWN. I do.

Mr. GRAY. What does he think of the government of New Hampshire, where the constitution provided that the governor should have two votes in the legislature?

Mr. BROWN. That was passed——

Mr. GRAY. First a vote and then the casting vote.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think it was a republican form of government while it existed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. Just a moment. It was the constitution prior to the Revolution. It has been changed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator kindly allow me to refer to it? As it was stated by the Senator from Mississippi it seems he did not get it from the Constitution. He got a copy of Madison's Notes on the Constitution and read from it.

Mr. GRAY. I have it here.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes; it was in the constitution.

Mr. GRAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. It was in the constitution of 1784, and it was knocked out in the constitution of 1792 as being absolutely unrepublican. That was getting along with tolerable rapidity in the adoption of the American doctrine for which we are contending.

Now, as to Rhode Island. Rhode Island was so conservative that she did not have any constitution, I think, until 1842—until the time of the Dorr rebellion. She was content to live under her old colonial charter, and under the colonial charter the governor did preside in grand committee.

Mr. GRAY. And vote.

Mr. CHANDLER. And vote in grand committee. When I asked the Senator from Delaware the other day if he knew of any other such case, he declined to be catechised. I did not know but that he knew of some other case of that sort. He has told me to-day that he did not know of the New Hampshire case. If he had asked me I would have enlightened him about it and would then have told him that in 1792 we got rid of that monarchical and old country anomaly adopted for a little while in 1784. The Senator from Rhode Island can explain the conservatism of Rhode Island if he wishes.

Mr. GRAY. I admire the conservatism of Rhode Island.

Mr. BROWN. To obey this clause of the Federal Constitution we should so construe this constitution of Delaware that this unusual, improper, incompatible, contradictory, self-destroying position can not be maintained by one and the same person. The construction before us is a simple one of the English language and can be made consistent with the Constitution of the United States, the common law, the common understanding, and the constitution of Delaware.

Let us take up the views of the Senator from Indiana on the question of our power of inquiry. First, that the record shows 30 votes were cast, and that the record can not be disputed because it is the journal of the joint assembly. To enforce this argument the learned Senator assumes, and very properly assumes, that this entry of the journal is equivalent to the record of courts, and it has been very generally held, perhaps universally held in the United States, that this journal can not be disputed as to any fact therein stated. But all records, whether of courts of record or of courts not of record, of legislatures, or acts of the Executive, must be consistent with themselves. If they dispute themselves, then, in any collateral or direct attack they must be construed in accordance with the fact of the law applicable to such cases. The record must be a verity to itself; the verdict and judgment must agree. To illustrate, if the record had shown that there were 31 votes cast, it would show on its face that there was 1 more than the law allowed or that the constitution of the State of Delaware permitted. It could not speak a verity, because on its face it spoke a contradiction to the fundamental law. If this record had stated that there were 34 votes cast and that those 34 votes were members of the legislature, the argument of the learned Senator from Indiana would have been just as appropriate. He could have said to make a majority of 34 we must have 18, and therefore any number less than 18 would not be an election; that the record said 34 members were present and that could not be disputed. Would the Senator deny that in such a case, where there were 4 votes more than the fundamental law permitted, that it would be in the power of any court not only to examine the record but expurgate and take out the 4 illegal votes? That was the Kansas case, which has been quoted here. The fundamental law permitted but 125, and 129 voted.

The court, in determining the constitutionality of an act, inquired by the record as to who voted for the act, and finding that the 4 who were not entitled to seats voted for it, determined that the law was unconstitutional. If this is true where there were 4 extra votes, it would be true where there is 1. The record in this particular case shows that there were 30 votes cast, it is true, but it shows who cast the 30 votes, and it shows as well that there were 29 members of the legislature cast 29 of them and that the other vote was cast, not by a member of the legislature, or any senator, or any representative, or by any person that had theretofore been recognized by the legislature, but by William T. Watson, then acting governor. The record works its own contradiction. We must give verity to the record, but in giving verity we recognize that there were but 29 votes that were legal and 1 vote that was illegal; therefore Du Pont received the 15 votes, a majority of the legal votes cast, and he is unaffected by the 1 illegal vote.

The Senator from Indiana, however, says he might concede, for the sake of the argument, all that had been said for Du Pont, with the single exception that the action of the State of Delaware was final; that the clause, section 6, Article II, of the constitution, which provided that each house shall be the judge of the election and returns and qualifications of its own members, has been exercised in this case, and its action is final and conclusive upon the Senate of the United States. It is but a restatement of the first point. To maintain it the learned Senator must assume that the things that were done on the 9th day of May was the adjudication. He has said, however, in another part of his argument, that this adjudication must be the record. Let us see what was done of record and not of record on that day, as claimed by the Senator.

It is claimed in the affidavits (which are not of record) that shortly before 12 o'clock Mr. Watson appeared in the senate, assumed the place of speaker, exercised the duty and office of speaker, voted as speaker, and when 12 o'clock came marched at the head of the senate into the joint assembly room. None of this is of record and most of it contradicts the record. The record shows that he did not vote in the senate. The record is silent as to whether he ever took the seat of speaker; it does disclose Mr. Ricords, speaker pro tempore, did preside, and so far the judgment, as it is called, the adjudication behind which we are not permitted to go, is merely the affidavit of those who are attacking the seat of Mr. Du Pont. It exists wholly dehors the record; there is no record of any judgment so far. The fact that he marched at the head of the senate is not of record.

It is said here, and an eloquent argument has been made, that the sergeant-at-arms of the senate was the proper person to see to it that no intruder marched at the head of the senate and that his failure to put Mr. Watson out was an adjudication by the senate. To that it may be replied that neither the constitution nor the law nor the action of the senate could ever refer the question of its membership to its sergeant-at-arms, and the record is silent as to whether he did or did not object. As each house is to be the judge and not the joint assembly, we might pause here and say that there was no adjudication whatsoever upon this subject. By the senate alone the adjudication is to be found, not the joint assembly.

The journal of the meeting is—

The hour of 12 m. having arrived, the senate, preceded by the speaker and attended by the clerk and sergeant-at-arms, proceeded to the hall, etc.

The record does disclose that on the first vote the speaker did vote and that that speaker was some other than Mr. Records, because there is the record of the vote, Mr. Records, speaker pro tempore, being called in his own name and some one answering to the name of speaker. The proof shows that this was Watson, that he was there, and this is claimed as an adjudication by the senate of Delaware that he was a member duly qualified as a matter of fact, and that as a matter of law he was entitled to be a member and entitled to vote, and that adjudication of fact and of law is conclusive upon us. The reply to that is that the same record shows that he was not a member because he was governor.

The record shows that the speaker, Mr. Records, was the real speaker, had already voted, and that the record thus contradicts itself by showing that somebody under the name of speaker was voting that had no right to vote. If Watson had the right to vote of course the conclusion in the record that there were 30 votes cast would be correct. The position of the right to vote gains no greater weight by the record. There is no adjudication of any fact or of any law which should change it in any manner. The record stands as a record of a judgment of a court of law would stand if it had appeared that the judge who had jurisdiction had vacated the seat, and that a mere intruder, not in any manner qualified, had usurped the function, sat upon the bench, signed the judgment roll, and rendered judgment. Such a judgment and record would be an actual nullity and could be collaterally attacked.

In an illustration the other day in this debate this case was compared to an alien sitting upon a jury and voting. Let us make the comparison more exact. It is not the case of an alien or one sitting constantly. Watson has not been sitting for thirty days. Suppose a jury of 12 is called; they sit and hear the evidence in part, a long trial, as long as the trial that was had in producing this United States Senator, from January 29 to May 9, and on the 9th day of April, upon this trial, one of the jurors should be discharged and excused, both counsel sat by and said nothing; recognize the other 11 jurors in every manner it is possible to recognize them until the final day, and after the arguments have been made and after the charge of the judge had been given, just as the jury was about to go to their jury room to ballot, in fact as they were going, another person not a member of the jury, not sworn as a juror, an interloper, should mingle in with the 11 and go to the jury room, should there participate in the deliberations of the jury, and should return with them and find with the 11 jurors a verdict, and when the roll was called as to what the verdict was, the 11 jurors should answer to their names, and the twelfth person, who never was a juror, should answer to his name, would that verdict be the verdict of any jury, or would it not on its face show that it was not the verdict of a jury, but the verdict of 11 jurors and one interloper, and could the action of that one interloper be recognized in any court of law?

But to go a little further with this adjudication, if there can be any such thing as mere adjudication by the conduct of a senate, then we have more adjudications in this case. Let us see what it was on the 9th day of April, when Governor Marvil's death was announced. Mr. Watson took the oath of office as governor; he accepted the duties of governor; he proceeded to exercise the office of governor; he vacated the seat he had formerly occupied as senator and as speaker of the senate; he adjudged as far as it was in his power to adjudge by that conduct and that act that he was not a senator.

The distinguished Senator from Mississippi says that no weight is to be attached to the fact that the oath of office as governor was taken by Watson, because it was merely extra caution or extra form; that no oath was required; that the only oath that the constitution contemplated was that applicable to all officers and stated in the constitution. The language, however, of that section would imply that each one should vary the form of oath by inserting in it the office which they are to perform the duties of; but whether it does or does not, the interpretation and construction put upon this oath by Watson, by the legislature of Delaware, and by James L. Wolcott, chancellor, was that it was necessary to take an oath, and if it was in fact unnecessary, it is all the greater proof that all these persons—the chancellor, the legislature, and Watson himself—believed that he was entering upon a new and different office from that of senator. If he had already taken the oath, and the statute did not contemplate the taking of another, as argued by the Senator from Mississippi, then the voluntary taking of it was an emphatic construction and adjudication that at that time he was entering into a new office.

Look at the record. First, the legislature passed a resolution that James L. Wolcott, chancellor, be invited to administer the oath to Mr. Watson. Next, that James L. Wolcott did administer the oath to him, and that the oath which Watson took was that he would perform the duties of the office of governor of the State of Delaware with fidelity—precisely the oath which has always been administered to the governors of that State—and this was the interpretation and construction which this same legislature that voted for Du Pont placed upon the act that they were performing. It was a construction that Watson was the governor, and became governor, as he had sworn to perform the duties of it.

Let me read the record not only with regard to what Watson did, but with regard to what the legislature did. The legislature passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. James L. Wolcott, chancellor, be, and he is hereby, invited to administer the appropriate oaths of office to William Tharp Watson, speaker of the senate, who, by reason of the death of the governor, the Hon. Joshua Hopkins Marvil, shall, under the constitution, exercise the office of governor until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

That was the act of the legislature. The Hon. James L. Wolcott then administered, in the presence of the members of the senate, to Hon. William Tharp Watson, speaker of the senate, the following oaths of office as governor, to wit:

I, William T. Watson, do solemnly swear on the Holy Evangels of Almighty God that I will support the Constitution of the United States of America. So help me God.

I, William T. Watson, do solemnly swear on the Holy Evangels of Almighty God that I will support the constitution of the State of Delaware. So help me God.

I, William T. Watson, do solemnly swear on the Holy Evangels of Almighty God that I will perform the duties of the office of governor of the State of Delaware with fidelity. So help me God.

That was an adjudication, in their presence by them, so far as their conduct could make it, that he was entering upon a new and different office and was no longer a member of the senate. After they went there the senate dropped his name from the roll, they elected another presiding officer, and every day when the roll was called to vote on the question of electing a United States Senator Watson's name was not called. If judgment can be rendered by the joint assembly and by the senate sitting in joint assembly by their conduct, here was the most solemn declaration on the part of the senate in joint assembly that William T. Watson was not a member of the senate.

It was not one adjudication only, but every week day from the 9th day of April to the 9th day of May, and on some days many times a day, did this voting go on, and as often as it went on each time the joint assembly and the senate adjudged as solemnly as such a performance can be, an adjudication that William T. Watson was not a member of the senate and had no right to vote.

If the adjudication of the Senate of Delaware upon this subject is to be binding upon the Senate of the United States, then we have the adjudication over and over and over again; not merely in the heat and excitement of a fighting contest at the closing day, but deliberatively week after week, that Mr. Watson was governor and not senator. But, Mr. President, the Senate of the United States also has power to adjudge of the qualification and election of its own members, and in the duty of exercising that power they have the right to determine the legality of every legislature and every legislator.

The duty of the United States Senate is not performed by merely asking the State of Delaware or its legislature or any branch of its government what it decides as to its constitution or what it has decided. The legislature elects the United States Senator. Its right and duty end there. Our right and duty begin there, to determine whether that election is a constitutional one; that it was a fair election; that it was an election by the legislature within its duty and its function. We can not say what is a constitutional election without deciding upon that constitution and construing it for ourselves and determining every branch of it that is within our duty. We can not say what is an election by the legislature without inquiring who is the legislature and in determining that fact. We must decide not only which of two bodies may be the legislature, but who are the lawful components of it. That is, we have the right here to go back into the election of each and every member of the legislature, determine his election de novo. If a man has been elected a member of the legislature illegally, improperly, wrongfully, fraudulently, it is our duty in the exercise of our power to weed him out from the legislature which sends a Senator here.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has read at great length the case of Potter vs. Robbins (Taft, 94) and spent a great deal of time in eulogizing the different statesmen who took part in that decision, and yet when asked what the real object in reading it was, and if it does not simply establish the fact that the Senate of the United States would have the right to determine between two bodies which was the genuine legislature, he answers yes, that that was the point of the decision. It is not only not disputed on this side, but it is one of the chains in the argument which we make, that the Senate of the United States have the right, where there are two distinct legislatures, each claiming to be the lawful one, to determine which, in the opinion of the Senate, is the lawful one, and in exercising that right the Senate of the United States may differ from the supreme court of the State from which that legislature came. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States that says in any manner that the Senate of the United States is bound by the decision of the judges of the State or the lawyers of the State or anybody else in the State. In every case where there is a conflict between two legislatures this body must be the ultimate tribunal and when a seat of a United States Senator is at stake, and in determining that question it may be that it will be necessary to determine the proper election of some one person.

If it be conceded for the sake of the argument, and that only, that this body could not go into the details of the election of any member of the legislature where there is a conflict as to the legislature, yet in case of conflict between two legislatures, if the determination of that question would say which was the rightful legislature, it would be within the power and duty of this body to inquire into the election of one member of it. All this is certainly within the implications of the case of Potter vs. Robbins. It was also held by the court in the celebrated cases between Governor Garcelon and the supreme court of the State of Maine. (See Answer of Judges, 70 Maine.) There two bodies each claimed to be the legislature, each set up the plea that each house shall be the judge of its own membership. The governor had recognized one body as the lawful legislature; another body had stood out contesting that claim, and the appeal was made to the supreme court by question for them to answer, and the supreme court of Maine were just as much prevented from determining the membership of any particular member of the legislature as the Senate of the United States is. The inhibition was just as broad there as here, but for the sake of determining which of these bodies was lawfully elected the supreme court deemed it their duty and proper to examine the returns, details of election of the different members, and to determine that certain ones were lawfully elected and certain others were unlawfully elected, and that same power would be within the scope and duty of this Senate.

If the constitution fixed a definite number of the legislature—as all constitutions do, the constitution of Delaware fixing 30—and it shall appear that a crowd of 34 or 45 have been electing a Senator, it is within the scope and duty of this Senate to say that that body was not a legislature. It is not denied, but has been admitted here, that the Senate of the United States could determine which is the legislature and what is the legislature. They can determine here under that clause that 45 persons are not the legislature, and they would not be required in that determination, in case there was a vote of 45 persons for United States Senator, to say that they reject the illegal part. There may have been a legitimate 30 who had voted; it would be our duty to protect that exercise of that right. It must follow, then, as a part of our right and duty to determine which is the legal legislature and select out that part of it which is the illegal branch of the legislature, to determine, as the chairman of the committee said, whether there is an office vacant or not; to determine if any extra votes were cast, and who had usurped the place and tried to exercise the office to which they were not elected or entitled. Here we are determining whether there was a vacant office in this thirtieth place. We have the same right as to this thirtieth place as if there had been 15 extra.

The constitution of the State of Delaware providing and designating the speaker as the person who shall become governor, and that he shall cease to be speaker, it is our duty to protect our own membership and our own rights, to select out of those 30 offices that were being voted any illegal place. The constitution of Delaware so provides that upon this contingency there were but 29 in the legislature. It is our duty to see that there are but 29 votes cast and but 29 votes had the right to be cast for the office of Senator. We must select that 29; we must determine who the legal legislature were, what were the legal offices, legal holders, and strike out the illegal office of the thirtieth. In doing that we put our hand upon the record; we need not go behind the record to see who the illegal voter was. We discover that there were but 29 persons entitled to vote, and we discover from the record that the person exercising the illegal right was William T. Watson, and that he was voting for Edward Ridgley. Casting him out, as it is our duty to do, Mr. Du Pont got a majority of the votes of this joint assembly and is entitled to his seat here.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to speak upon the resolution, but prefer not to go on to-night. Therefore I ask that the resolution may go back upon the Calendar, and I shall request that it be taken up at the conclusion of the routine business to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). That order will be made.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that a deficiency appropriation of $100,000 is needed to complete the United States court-house and post-office building at Omaha, Nebr., and recommending that this amount be appropriated for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that a deficiency appropriation of $116,000 is needed to complete the United States post-office and court-house building at Kansas City, Mo., and recommending that this amount be appropriated for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that a deficiency appropriation of $355,000 is imperatively needed to complete the United States post-office building at Washington, D. C., as at present designed, and that a deficiency appropriation of $115,000 additional, making a total of $470,000, will be required for the completion of the building if an independent light and power plant is to be supplied therein, and recommending that this amount be appropriated for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

UNCOMPAHGRE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be read.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the desire of the Senate that the unfinished business shall be laid aside informally?

Mr. CANNON. I desire, if possible, to go on with the unfinished business. It has been pending here for nearly three weeks——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I hope the Senator from Utah will yield for a motion to adjourn. It is late.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senate to pass a very short bill, that will not take a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the Senator from Utah to yield to me that I may submit a motion to adjourn.

Mr. GRAY. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Very well; I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FAULKNER. I understand the Senator from Oregon is willing to withdraw the motion temporarily.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I withdraw it temporarily.

ST. JOSEPH'S CATHOLIC CHURCH, AT MARTINSBURG, W. VA.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 435) for the relief of the trustee of St. Joseph's Catholic Church, at Martinsburg, W. Va.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "full," to strike out the words "of rent and damages"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Bishop Augustine Vandebyver, trustee of St. Joseph's Catholic Church, at Martinsburg, W. Va., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,880, the same to be in full for the use and occupation of said church by the Army of the United States during the war of the rebellion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I renew my motion.

Mr. CANNON. Let the Chair lay the unfinished business before the Senate, so that it may remain pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business was laid before the Senate, and the Chair is under the impression that it was laid aside temporarily.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; I simply want to have it retain its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 14, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 13, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

JOHN RUHM, SR.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1882) for the relief of John Ruhm, sr., of Nashville, Tenn.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John Ruhm, sr., of Nashville, Tenn., late United States district attorney for the middle district of Tennessee, the sum of $295, for services rendered the United States in the case of the State of Tennessee for the use of the United States against W. J. Hill and others, and other cases.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask for some explanation of the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, pending the right to object, I should like to hear the report read.

The report (by Mr. DE WITT) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 1882) for the relief of John Ruhm, sr., of Nashville, Tenn., report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out in line 8 of the bill the words "and ninety-five"; so that the bill will read "the sum of $200 for services rendered the United States," etc.

It appears from the proof in this case that John Ruhm, sr., was United States district attorney for the middle district of Tennessee for some years prior to 1894, when, on February 1 of said year, he retired from said office. He had received his maximum emolument up to and including the calendar year of 1893, and for services rendered by him for the month of January, 1894, there was allowed by the Attorney-General the sum of $405, the maximum being $500.

Of this sum of $405 allowed him he was paid the sum of $205. The remaining $200 was allowed for services in the cause of the State of Tennessee for the use of the United States against W. J. Hill, sheriff, and his sureties. This cause was ended February 1, 1894, the day on which General Ruhm retired from office. The Attorney-General, in approving General Ruhm's account of $200 for fees in this case, placed $100 for the fiscal year 1892 and $100 for the fiscal year 1893. These amounts were disallowed by the Comptroller for the reason that the attorney had received his maximum compensation for those years.

While it appears that the services for which this $200 was allowed were rendered in 1892, 1893, and in January, 1894, at which time the cause in which they were earned was ended, your committee is of the opinion that the fees were not due until the termination of the suit, February 1, 1894, and the attorney not having received his maximum emolument for January, 1894, that this sum of $200 should be paid him and not charged back to the fiscal years 1892 and 1893, for which years his emolument account had reached its maximum and had been closed.

Mr. HOPKINS. Was the service for which this bill proposes reimbursement rendered in 1892 or 1893?

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Mr. Ruhm went out of office in February, 1894.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then, as I understand the report, he was paid the maximum allowed United States attorneys for 1892 and 1893?

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. This case had not been settled.

Mr. HOPKINS. But the service was rendered and he was paid as he went along.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Not for this case. The rule of the Department is that fees are not allowed to district attorneys until the cases in which they are earned are terminated. This gentleman went out of office in January, 1894, and for the month when this case was disposed of he did not earn his maximum fee, and that was the only month in which he did not earn it.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understand, then, that the maximum fee is allowed in each case and not on the gross amount of the business of the office?

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. So much on each case. The Attorney-General recommends the payment of this claim.

Mr. HOPKINS. I withdraw my objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to know why the Department did not allow this claim?

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. The Department did make the allowance. The Attorney-General allowed the claim, but in the settlement of the account for January, 1894, the Comptroller, instead of paying the full amount allowed by the Attorney-General, paid Mr. Ruhm $200, and arbitrarily charged him with $100 for the year 1892 and $100 for 1893, the years for which he had received his maximum fees. I have a letter from the Attorney-General recommending the payment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended in the second paragraph of the report was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCALL of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill as amended was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; had receded from its amendment numbered 102; had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives; had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CULLOM, Mr. TELLER, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT MISSISSIPPI CITY.

Mr. DENNY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8043) to amend chapter 58 of the Revised Statutes, being an act to provide for holding terms of the United States court at Mississippi City.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 58 of the Revised Statutes, being an act to provide for holding terms of the United States court at Mississippi City, approved April 4, 1888, be so amended as to insert the word "Biloxi" in lieu of and where the words "Mississippi City" occur in sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 of said act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENNY. Mr. Speaker, the committee recommend certain amendments to the bill which I should like to have adopted.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out the words "chapter 58 of the Revised Statutes, being," in line 3, and insert in lieu thereof the words "the act entitled."

Strike out the word "insert," in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the word "substitute."

Strike out the words "and where," in line 7.

Strike out all of line 8, and insert in lieu thereof the words "wherever the same may occur in said act."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended by striking therefrom the words "chapter 58 of the Revised Statutes, being."

On motion of Mr. DENNY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RITA STINE.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2813) granting a pension to Rita Stine, amounting to $20 per month.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Rita Stine, of Memphis, Mo., invalid and helpless orphan daughter of George W. Stine, late lieutenant of Company Q, Twenty-first Missouri Volunteer Infantry, upon the pension roll, and that said Rita Stine be allowed a pension of $20 per month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object pending an explanation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask to have the report read.

The report (by Mr. CROWTHER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2813) granting a pension to Rita Stine, of Memphis, Mo., invalid and helpless orphan daughter of George W. Stine, late first lieutenant Company I, Twenty-first Missouri Infantry Volunteers, at the rate of $20 per month, having carefully investigated all the facts and circumstances, respectfully submit the following:

George W. Stine enlisted as corporal and was mustered into Captain Harle's company, First Northeastern Missouri Infantry Volunteers, and transferred to Company I, Twenty-first Missouri Infantry, February 12, 1862; promoted to second lieutenant July 29, 1862, and as first lieutenant January 12, 1863, and honorably mustered out and discharged December 5, 1864.

The evidence shows that Rita Stine, a daughter of the soldier, has been helpless from infancy from hydrocephalus, and that her limbs are now rigid and out of shape, and that she is totally blind and requires almost constant care and attention.

Her mother died about 1883 from overwork and exhaustion in caring for and lifting this helpless invalid child, then 14 years of age. Her father, the soldier, died in February, 1888, and since then his small estate has been exhausted in paying at the rate of $20 per month for the care and keeping of his orphan daughter.

On March 7, 1893, there was only $84.22½ of his estate remaining, and since that was expended the county (Scotland) has contributed $10, the Grand Army of the Republic post $3, and the Christian Endeavor Society of the Presbyterian Church at Memphis, Mo., the remainder necessary to provide for Rita Stine. She has but two relatives living—an uncle in Missouri and a sister—but both too poor to contribute to her support.

In view of all the facts stated, which are thoroughly supported and shown by reliable testimony, your committee believe this soldier's child should not be turned into the poorhouse or left dependent entirely on the charity of the world, and recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "twenty," in line 8, and inserting the word "seventeen" in lieu thereof, and that the title of the bill be amended by striking out all after the word "Stine," and as amended that the bill do pass.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman why this bill has not been considered at a Friday night session, in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Simply because we have not been able to reach it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What special circumstances demand the consideration of it to-day? Why does it not take the regular order? Why do you not have it considered at a Friday night session?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Because we can not get to it. It is a very distressing case and ought to be attended to without delay.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is not the object of this bill to relieve the county from the support of this person?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The object is to relieve the invalid daughter of an old soldier from the pauper's position she now occupies.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is not the object to relieve your county from supporting her?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No, sir; I do not reside in the county at all.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Well, to relieve the county in which she resides from the burden of supporting her. Is not that the object?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No, sir. The object is to relieve the invalid daughter of a worthy soldier who lost his life in consequence of his services to his country—to keep her out of the poorhouse.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Does the gentleman take the position that every helpless daughter of a soldier must be supported by the Government?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I take exactly that position.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. No matter how many there are in the country?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is not a doubt on the subject in my mind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended in the report was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from New York inquires in regard to this idiotic or permanently helpless child——

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I beg to correct the gentleman. I did not use the term "idiotic."

Mr. PICKLER. Well, this is a permanently helpless child, and the case comes within the general law except that she did not apply before she was 16 years of age. That is the case as I remember it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is the case.

Mr. PICKLER. The general law is, that if a permanently helpless or idiotic or insane child of a soldier is receiving a pension before 12 years of age, it continues to receive it through life, but the pension must have begun before that age. The intention of the law is to cover the cases of permanently helpless or indiotic or insane children and those only, and the Government has come up to the point of saying, under the general law, that such children shall receive $12 a month while they continue in that condition. That is all there is in this bill, but this helpless child of a soldier is not able to come within the general law on account of her age.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, why we have this speech from the gentleman from South Dakota? I did not object to the bill, nor did any gentleman object, and it was about to go through.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, I thought from the gentleman's statement that the House might get a wrong impression as to the character of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the amendment which has been adopted fixes the rate at $17 instead of $12.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is just the amount to which her father was entitled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not desire that there should be any misunderstanding as to what the bill provided.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title of the bill was amended by striking out all after the name "Stine."

VESSELS PROPELLED BY GAS, FLUID, NAPHTHA, OR ELECTRIC MOTORS.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1646) providing for certain requirements for vessels propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors.

The bill was read.

Mr. LOUD. I may be in favor of this bill, but I could not hear enough of it as read to understand what it is, and I listened as attentively as I could.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The Clerk will again read the bill.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. BENNETT] whether the intent of this bill is not to oblige naphtha launches to employ engineers?

Mr. BENNETT. No; it is not. It specially provides that naphtha launches above 15 tons burden run for hire——

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. It would apply to them?

Mr. BENNETT. Only those that are run for hire—used generally as ferryboats.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Well, I object.

STRATTON H. BENSCOTER.

Mr. LACEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3771) for the relief of Stratton H. Benscoter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby empowered and directed to set aside and annul the sentence of court-martial against Stratton H. Benscoter, of Company I, Ninth Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, and to grant him an honorable discharge from the said service, said discharge to date December 5, 1865.

Mr. LACEY. As the report is somewhat voluminous, I think a brief statement by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] would be all that is needed to make the matter understood.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] who introduced the bill would be better qualified to make the statement. As I remember the facts, this soldier, toward the close of the war, was in a billiard room and was approached by his officer, who was wearing citizen's clothes, who was not in uniform. The officer cursed the soldier, and as I remember the soldier replied in similar language. The officer brought charges against the soldier, who was thereupon court-martialed. He was very young. He made no defense. He did not know enough to make a defense. So he was convicted and sentenced, and in consequence thereof was dishonorably discharged from the Army. The officers who constituted the court-martial have united in petitioning that the sentence be set aside, and that the soldier be granted an honorable discharge. The case is a very clear one, and the committee reported unanimously in favor of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is it the object of this bill to give the man a pension?

Mr. LACEY. The object is to give him an honorable discharge. That is all there is in it. He was dishonorably discharged in consequence of the finding of the court-martial.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

E. R. SHIPLEY.

Mr. TRACEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 67) for the relief of E. R. Shipley.

The bill was read.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. TRACEY. I will cheerfully make an explanation. Let me state, in the first place, that this bill comes from the Senate, where it has been passed three or four times. I believe this is the fourth time it has been sent here from that body. It has been reported favorably by every committee to which it has ever been referred in either House.

The facts are simply these: Mr. Shipley was a postmaster, and his office was entered by burglars and one package of registered matter taken. The postmaster, without knowing exactly what were his rights under the law, paid, upon demand of the post-office inspector, the amount of money supposed to be contained in the registered package which had been stolen. This man is now asking that the money which he ought not thus to have paid be refunded to him.

Mr. LOUD. Has there been any report on this case by the post-office authorities?

Mr. TRACEY. There has been a favorable report on the bill some half a dozen times. It has passed the Senate three or four times—I think this is the fourth time. It has been reported favorably by every committee that has examined it. It is now on our Calendar, reported favorably by the House committee.

Mr. COX. What committee does it come from?

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY] that the official copy of the Senate bill is not at the desk.

Mr. TRACEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the House take up the House bill and substitute the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The trouble is, the Senate bill is not here.

Mr. TRACEY. Then I should like to have the House bill taken up. I do not know why the Senate bill is not here. It passed the Senate on the 5th of March.

The SPEAKER. It was, no doubt, referred to a committee in the natural course.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that it will further his business if he will wait until the committee reports the Senate bill. Then it can be taken up some morning and passed.

Mr. TRACEY. I understood the committee had reported the Senate bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. At any rate it does not seem to be at hand just now.

Mr. TRACEY. I did not know it had not been reported.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman will not further the matter, but only complicate it, by having the House bill passed.

Mr. TRACEY. Then I withdraw my proposition for the present.

GEORGE ALCOTT.

Mr. LEIGHTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2412) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against George Alcott on the rolls of the War Department.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to remove from the rolls and records of the War Department the charge of desertion now standing on said rolls against George Alcott, late a private in Company C, One hundred and fifty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and to issue to him an honorable discharge to bear date June 13, 1865.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. TALBERT. Has this bill been considered at a Friday night session?

Mr. LEIGHTY. It has not been.

Mr. TALBERT. I reserve the right to object until the report is read or a statement made.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I suggest that the report be read from the desk, as I may interpose an objection, even if the gentleman from South Carolina declines to do so.

The report (by Mr. FENTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2412) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against George Alcott on the rolls of the War Department, having considered the same, report it back to the House and recommend its passage.

The evidence shows that this soldier did not return to his regiment after the expiration of his furlough in June, 1865, because on reporting to the proper authorities at Indianapolis, Ind., for the purpose of obtaining transportation to his regiment, he was informed that, as the war was over, no transportation was being furnished to enable soldiers to reach their commands; that he should either remain in Indianapolis or return to his home, and that he would be notified when wanted. He was not notified, and was not present when his regiment was mustered out.

The evidence submitted by officers and soldiers of his regiment seems to support the claims of the petitioner.

The following is the report in the case from the Record and Pension Office, addressed to Senator Manderson:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, February 14, 1891.

"SIR: In compliance with your request (received to-day) for a transcript of the record in the case of George Alcott, late member of Company C, One hundred and fifty-second Indiana Volunteers, I am directed by the Secretary of War to inform you as follows:

"The official records show this soldier to have been enrolled February 15, 1865, for the period of one year and to have been mustered into service February 17 following. He appears to have been granted a twenty days' furlough on May 24, 1865, and failing to rejoin his command upon its expiration, he is reported on the company muster-out roll, dated Charleston, W. Va., August 30, 1865, as follows: 'Absent, deserted; left Summit Point, Va., May 24, 1865, on twenty days' furlough, and never returned.' He is regarded as having deserted June 12, 1865.

"The following is a synopsis of the testimony heretofore submitted to the Department in connection with application for removal of the charge of desertion, to wit:

"Under date of October 8, 1890, the soldier testified that he received a furlough for twenty days from May 24, 1865, and that upon its expiration he reported to the proper officers at Indianapolis, Ind., on June 13, 1865, for transportation to his regiment, but which was refused him for the reason, as the officers alleged, that they had received orders not to forward any more men, as the war had ended and regiments were about to return to be mustered out; that the said officers took his name and post-office address, and directed him to either remain in Indianapolis or to return to his home, and they would inform him when to return for muster out; that his regiment came back and was mustered out without his knowledge, the said officers having failed to notify him; that he would have rejoined his regiment had he not been prevented from doing so by the officers in power and command at Indianapolis.

"There is no record of the man at Indianapolis subsequent to May, 1865.

"George E. Young, late lieutenant and adjutant, and George P. Alexander, late captain Company C, One hundred and fifty-second Indiana Volunteers, under dates of October 8 and 9, respectively, testified that upon their arrival home at the close of the war they learned that the soldier had attempted to rejoin his regiment and got as far as Indianapolis, but was unable to go any farther on account of the close of the war.

"On January 4, 1890, the Department held that as 'this man's service prior to May 1, 1865, amounted to a less period than six months, and as his assertion of reporting at Indianapolis and of being refused transportation is not borne out by the records, favorable action can not be taken under the law, and the application must be denied.'

"Robert Moore, under date of March 1, 1890, testified that he remembered meeting the soldier on the morning in which he said he was going to his regiment from his furlough; that he (affiant) met the soldier at his gate just as he started, and remembered distinctly what he told affiant, who had every reason to believe that he told the truth, as he had on knapsack, etc., 'and is now, and he has been, a man of good reputation.'

"James Collins testified, March 12, 1890, that he was a member of Company C, One hundredth Indiana Volunteers, and that about June, 1865, while returning to his command from furlough, he met the soldier, also on furlough, at Elkhart, Ind., the soldier declaring that he was going to Indianapolis for the purpose of rejoining his command, to which place affiant accompanied him.

"This affiant (Collins) corroborated the soldier's testimony as to reporting to the officers at Indianapolis for transportation to his regiment, and to the refusal of the officers to furnish it, on the ground that his regiment was about to return to be mustered out.

"Collins, as a member of Company C, One hundredth Indiana Volunteers, entered the general hospital at Indianapolis on May 17, 1865, and was mustered out there June 13, 1865, on an individual muster-out roll.

"On April 15, 1890, the Department held that the additional testimony presented did not warrant a reversal of the former adverse decision, and the application was again denied.

"Since that date the status of the soldier has not been changed by the introduction of new testimony.

"Very respectfully,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
"Captain and Assistant Surgeon, United States Army.

"Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
"United States Senate."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TALBERT. I submit that we have every Friday afternoon for consideration of claims of this character. They ought to be brought up regularly and we ought not to make exceptions.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope my friend from South Carolina will waive the rule in this case.

Mr. TALBERT. I will not object to this.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEIGHTY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PINTSCH COMPRESSING COMPANY.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5790) to permit the Pintsch Compressing Company to lay pipes in certain streets in the city of Washington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to grant to the Pintsch Compressing Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New Jersey, and having a plant located in square 269 in said city, permission to lay pipes for the distribution of the gas manufactured at its plant for the purpose of furnishing light to railway postal mail cars and the gas buoys of the United States Light-House Board in the following-named streets in said city of Washington, to wit: From the works or plant of said company in square 269 along Maryland avenue to Sixth street west; thence along Sixth street to the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad depot; also continuing along Maine avenue to Third street west, and thence along Third street to B street north, thence along B street north to First street west, thence along First street west to Indiana avenue, and thence along Indiana avenue to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad depot, and also across Thirteenth and E streets to the yards of the Southern Railway; also from their said plant or station along Thirteenth-and-a-half street southwest, or along such other street or streets as agreed upon, to the Potomac River; that said pipe lines shall be laid under the direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That said Pintsch Compressing Company shall furnish said Commission with bond or bonds or such other security as they may require to guarantee the strict compliance with the permit that may be granted said company, and to insure the complete restoration of all pavements and other public or private property disturbed in laying said pipe line as aforesaid.

The Committee on the District of Columbia recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

SEC. 3. That said Pintsch Compressing Company shall also lower or relay any pipes whenever directed to do so by said Commissioners by reason of a change in the grade of the streets or the construction of any public works therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. I desire to offer two amendments so as to correct clerical errors in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, strike out the words "postal mail"; so as to read, "railway cars"; and in line 2, in section 2, strike out the word "commission" and insert "Commissioners."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TAXES AND TAX SALES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4149) in relation to taxes and tax sales in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill——

Mr. DOCKERY. Exceedingly.

Mr. DALZELL (continuing). And should properly be considered in Committee of the Whole. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DOCKERY. Why not in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. DALZELL. Well, we will accomplish the same end.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULICK. I would like to have the report read. It is not lengthy, and embodies the amendment recommended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The bill is now open for general debate, and if the gentleman desires it, the report can be read as a part of his remarks.

Mr. DOCKERY. This bill now, Mr. Speaker, is being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. I would like to ask if that would not require the bill to be read by paragraphs for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule after the general debate is concluded?

The SPEAKER. It will have to be considered by paragraphs, just as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HULICK. In view of the suggestion that has just been made, and as this bill must be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, I ask consent to withdraw the bill for the present, as there are other matters from the committee which may be disposed of without discussion, and we can take this up afterwards.

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent. Without objection, the bill will be laid aside to be called up under the same conditions hereafter.

There was no objection.

CONTESTED ELECTION, GOODWYN VS. COBB.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin yields to me for a moment to make an announcement, and also a request with reference to the case of Goodwyn vs. Cobb. It seems that owing to the illness of a gentleman on the minority of the committee he has not been able to prepare the minority report, which was to have been handed in on Saturday, but will be able to prepare it and hand it in on Wednesday. On account of the delay occasioned in this manner it is agreed that the case shall be called up for hearing before the House on Tuesday of next week, and that each side shall have three hours for the purpose of submitting their views.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York desires unanimous consent that the views of the minority in the case mentioned may be filed on Wednesday next. The gentleman also asks that this case be called up for consideration on Tuesday next and that three hours' debate on each side be allowed, after which the vote will be taken. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE, JOHNSTON VS. STOKES, SEVENTH DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. JENKINS, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, presented the report of the Committee on Elections No. 3 in the contested-election case of Thomas B. Johnston vs. J. William Stokes, from the Seventh Congressional district of the State of South Carolina; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. JENKINS. In connection with this report, I ask unanimous consent that the minority have ten days in which to present their views.

Mr. DALZELL. Is not that too long a time?

Mr. JENKINS. I will modify that request, at the suggestion of some gentlemen here, and will ask that the minority have an opportunity to file their views without fixing the time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to ask the gentleman if there has been an agreement with the minority in respect to this case?

Mr. JENKINS. It was understood that the minority should have time to present their views. It was hoped that it could be done inside of ten days, but gentlemen whose views I respect very much say that time is too long.

Mr. DOCKERY. No representative of the minority seems to be present.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman propose?

Mr. JENKINS. I will say, for the present, five days, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask the gentleman, was there not some understanding when the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STOKES] went away as to the time in which the report would be submitted?

Mr. JENKINS. No; not that I am aware of.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was informed that he had some agreement with the Committee on Elections in respect to this case. I understand the gentleman to say there was none.

Mr. JENKINS. Not with reference to the presentation of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] asks that the minority have five days in which to present their views. Is there objection?

Mr. DALZELL. I suggest that three days is long enough.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STOKES] is absent, and he made the statement to me before he left that the time had been extended, as I understood him, almost indefinitely, for him to remain away, and that he expects to be gone some two weeks.

Mr. DALZELL. The leave could be extended only by the House, of course.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The committee could agree not to take up the case, of course?

Mr. HOPKINS. That sort of delay would defeat the very object for which the three Committees on Elections were established.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois certainly does not wish to attempt to override any agreement made with the gentleman?

Mr. HOPKINS. Nobody knows anything about the agreement, except the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is sufficient, if I know it. I made the suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] in view of the statement made to me by the gentleman from South Carolina, who, I know, went away with that understanding.

Mr. DALZELL. Of course I would not undertake to interfere with any agreement that has been made with the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That was all I was suggesting.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, confirmatory of the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, I will suggest that the records of the House show that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STOKES] has leave of absence for ten days.

Mr. DALZELL. That is no reason why there should be ten days' delay in the presentation of a report on a contested-election case—simply because the gentleman goes away.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is the contestee himself who is away.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition that the minority have five days in which to file their views?

Mr. DALZELL. I object.

ANTON GLOETZNER.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 6104) for the relief of Anton Gloetzner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That all real estate lying in the District of Columbia heretofore purchased by and conveyed to Anton Gloetzner, of said District, prior to the passage of this bill be, and it is hereby, relieved and exempted from the operation of the act entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens," etc., approved March 3, 1887, and that all forfeitures incurred by force of said act in respect of such real estate be, and they are hereby, remitted.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let us have some explanation of that bill.

Mr. HULICK. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. HULICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6104) for the relief of Anton Gloetzner, have given consideration to the same and recommend its passage.

The beneficiary under this bill has resided in the District of Columbia for more than twenty years. He is a professor of music, and bears the reputation of being an honest, good citizen, and well disposed to the good order and government of the District. He purchased real estate in the District in ignorance of the law prohibiting aliens from holding real estate in the District. Immediately upon being advised of his disability in this respect, he filed his application to become a citizen of the United States.

He claims that through inadvertence he failed to become a citizen, and not through any desire to retain or hold allegiance to any foreign government.

The affidavit of Mr. Gloetzner is herewith made a part of this report, as follows:

"DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

"Before me, Hiram W. Barrett, a notary public in and for the District aforesaid, personally appeared Anton Gloetzner, who, being first duly sworn, deposes and says: I am a resident of the District of Columbia, and have been such continuously since September, 1873. I was born in Bavaria, Germany, January 31, 1850. I came to the United States in September, 1873, and have continuously since resided here. I am by profession a professor of music. In ignorance of the law respecting the holding of lands in the District of Columbia by aliens, I have from time to time purchased several pieces of real estate, three of which I still hold. It has long been my intention to become a citizen of the United States, but through inadvertence I have delayed taking the necessary steps to that end. My attention was called last summer to the existence of the law referred to, and I immediately took the initiative step looking to my naturalization, namely, the making a declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States. It is my purpose to follow this with the other steps necessary to become a citizen of the United States—a step which I would have taken long since except, as already stated, through inadvertence.

"ANTON GLOETZNER.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 11th day of March, A. D. 1896.
[SEAL.] "HIRAM W. BARRETT, Notary Public."

Also the testimony of Fred Weiler:

"DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

"Before me, H. W. Barrett, a notary public in and for the District aforesaid, personally appeared Ferdinand Weiler, who, being first duly sworn, deposes and says: I am a citizen of the United States and a resident of the District of Columbia. I am by occupation chief clerk of the loan division of the United States Treasurer's Office. I know Anton Gloetzner, professor of music, and have known him for upward of twenty years. I know that during all that time he has been a resident of the District of Columbia, following his profession here, and that during my acquaintance with him he has from time to time dealt in the purchase and sale of real estate in the District, believing in his full right so to do under the law. He has, as I am informed and believe, made declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and he has declared to me his purpose to follow the same by taking the other necessary steps to enable him to become such citizen. Mr. Gloetzner is a man of unquestioned character, and I have no doubt of his honest purpose to become such citizen.

"FRED WEILER.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 11th day of March, A. D. 1896.
[SEAL.] "HIRAM W. BARRETT, Notary Public."

The Commissioners of the District recommend favorable action.

A letter from the district attorney is appended as a part of this report, as follows:

"OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
"Washington, February 21, 1896.

"GENTLEMEN: I have considered the bill (H. R. 6104, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session) for the relief of Anton Gloetzner, which you referred to me for examination and report.

"It would be well, I think, for Congress to repeal the act of March 3, 1887, restricting the ownership of real estate to the American citizens, so far as it applies to the District of Columbia, and thus avoid repeated applications for exemption from its operation, since I do not believe the thing sought to be prevented by that act ever existed or is likely to exist in this District.

"The bill appears to be in good form, and is herewith returned.

"Very respectfully,

"S. T. THOMAS,
"Attorney District of Columbia.

"Hon. COMMISSIONERS, ETC."

The suggestion therein as to the propriety of repealing the act of March 3, 1887, has not been considered by the committee, and hence no recommendation thereon is submitted.

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill for the relief of Anton Gloetzner, which proposes to relieve property purchased by him from the operations of the act of March, 1887, referred to in the bill. He is not a citizen of the District, but he purchased the property that he seeks now to have released from the operations of this act without knowing the disabilities under which he labored in regard to holding property in the District of Columbia. The testimony is that he is a good citizen, and that as soon as he ascertained that this disability existed, as far as his right to purchase or hold property is concerned, he immediately made application to become a citizen of the United States. He has resided in the District about twenty years, and he brings testimony as to his character and reputation as a good citizen. The committee are unanimous in reporting favorably on this bill.

Mr. KIEFER. Has he taken out his papers?

Mr. HULICK. He has taken out his first papers.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no doubt that this bill is entirely proper, but I wish to call attention to a fact which I think should be suggested, although I do not desire to make the point in this case——

Mr. HULICK. Very well; I should like to hear any suggestion from the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is that under the rule all bills in the nature of claims—and this is, in the nature of a claim—should go to the Committee on Claims. The simple fact that an applicant resides in the District of Columbia does not give the Committee on the District of Columbia jurisdiction over a claim. I call attention to the fact, in order that this may not form a precedent for sending other private claim bills to that committee, thereby giving them an advantage that they would not have if referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HULICK. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. It will relieve the Committee on the District of Columbia from these bills, and we should be glad to be relieved from the duty of considering them. A suggestion has been made by the District attorney that it is his opinion that the law of 1887 should be repealed so far as it applies to the District of Columbia. The committee have not acted upon that suggestion, but have reported in favor of the passage of this individual bill, without reference to the broad principle contained in the general bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULICK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DRAINAGE OF LOTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7264) to provide for the drainage of lots in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That each original lot or subdivisional lot situated on any street in the District of Columbia where there is a public sewer shall be connected with said sewer in such manner that any and all of the drainage of such lot, whether water or liquid refuse of any kind, except human urine and fecal matter, shall flow into said sewer; and if such original lot or subdivisional lot is situated on any street in said District where there is a public sewer and water main, such original lot or subdivisional lot shall be connected with said sewer and also with said water main in such manner that any and all of the drainage of such lot, whether water or liquid refuse of any kind, shall flow into said sewer: Provided, That the connections required to be made by this act shall be made under the following conditions: When there is on any such original lot or subdivisional lot aforesaid any building used or intended to be used as a dwelling, or in which persons are employed or intended to be employed in any manufacture, trade, or business, or any stable, shed, pen, or place where cows, horses, mules, or other animals are kept, then, and in that instance, such original lot or subdivisional lot shall be connected with a public sewer and water main or with a public sewer, as may be required with this act; and whenever there is no such building, stable, shed, pen, or place, as aforesaid, on such original lot or subdivisional lot, then such lot shall be required to be connected with a public sewer only when it has been certified by the health officer of said District that such connection is necessary to public health.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of said District to notify the owner or owners of every lot required by this act to be connected with a public sewer or water main, as the case may be, to so connect such lot, the work to be done in accordance with the regulations governing plumbing and house drainage in said District.

SEC. 3. That if the owner or owners of any such lot neglect or refuse to make such connections as are required by this act within thirty days after the receipt of such notice, such owner or owners shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction in the police court of said District, be punished by a fine of not less than $1 nor more than $5 for each day he, she, or they fail or neglect to make such connections.

SEC. 4. That in case the owner or owners of any such lot be a nonresident or nonresidents of the District of Columbia, or can not be found therein, then, and in that case, the said Commissioners shall give notice, by publication twice a week for two weeks in some daily newspaper published in the city of Washington, to such owner, directing the connection of such lot with such public sewer or with such public sewer and water main, as the case may be; and in case such owner or owners shall fail or neglect to comply with the notice aforesaid within thirty days it shall be the duty of said Commissioners to cause such connection to be made, the expense to be paid out of the emergency fund; such expense, with necessary expense of advertisement, shall be assessed as a tax against such lot, which tax shall be carried on the regular tax roll of the District of Columbia, and shall be collected in the manner provided for the collection of other taxes.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it necessary to occupy the time of the House by the reading of the report, unless it should be desired by some member upon the floor.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman what change in the existing law is contemplated, and what expense is to be thrown on the property owner?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. It is simply a sanitary measure, Mr. Speaker. It provides that where there are sewers, connection with the same shall in every case be made by the property owner. The bill is recommended by Judge Thomas S. Miller, of the police court, by the District Commissioners, by Dr. Woodward, of the health officer of the District, and is also unanimously recommended for passage by the Committee on the District of Columbia. The health officer in reference to the need of such legislation, in his last report, says it has been—demonstrated by the recent investigations which have been made to ascertain the cause of the prevalence of typhoid fever in this District. The enormous value to the community of a properly planned and constructed system of sewers can not be overestimated; but it is remarkable that, in the recent agitation for improvement in the sewer facilities of this District, so much should have been said about the need for new sewers and so little about the importance of availing ourselves of those we already have.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, there can be any objection to this bill.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this bill requires of the property owners of the District of Columbia unusual and in some instances unnecessary expense. I notice here in the beginning the bill says—

That each lot or subdivisional lot situated on any street in the District of Columbia where there is a public sewer shall be connected with said sewer in such manner that any and all of the drainage of such lots, whether water or liquid refuse of any kind, * * * shall flow into said sewer.

Now, I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill if under it a person owning a lot in the District of Columbia is compelled to connect that lot with a sewer where there is a sewer—for instance, in an alley, where the water naturally runs down to the trap in the alley and then into the sewer? If there must be in such case an independent connection with the vacant lot, if it is required, it is an outrage on the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say this, that where any lot is already drained it is not required to furnish additional drainage. It is simply where standing water becomes a menace to the health of the District, and it is intended to provide for the drainage of those lots.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The bill, unfortunately, does not say that. If it said that, there would possibly be no objection to it. The bill says that if it can be connected with the sewer it must be connected with the sewer. Now, for instance, suppose there is a lot represented by about the shape of this bill, and from it the water would run into the alley. There are usually sewer traps in the alley, and, the lot draining into the alley, the water runs off freely in case of showers. Under this bill, if the health officer or some other officer does not like the owner of that lot, he may require him to make a separate and independent connection with the sewer. Would not the bill fully justify that order? And if it does justify it, it is wrong. There is no justification for it in regard to the public health or otherwise, and such a provision if enforced will ruin many a lot owner in the District of Columbia. That is my opinion, and I would like to have some answer on that point.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, it was contemplated by the party who drew this bill to provide for drainage of lots which are already drained, or on lots located and situated as stated by the gentleman from New Hampshire. It may be seen clearly that it would be impracticable to drain them where the slope of the lot would be in the opposite direction to the sewer.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But suppose in the same direction as the sewer and the rainfall naturally runs off, leaving no standing water whatever, then under this bill that man may be compelled to make a connection with the sewer in the alley, while usually the water runs into the alley and down the alley into the sewer traps, which are provided in nine out of ten alleys in the District.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman will read the bill from line 16 down, it fully sets forth all the purposes sought to be accomplished.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not see any answer in that.

Mr. BABCOCK. If you will read it you will.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Suppose you read that part which will be an answer to my inquiry.

Mr. BABCOCK (reading):

When there is on any such original lot or subdivisional lot aforesaid any building used or intended to be used as a dwelling, or in which persons are employed or intended to be employed in any manufacture, trade, or business, or any stable, shed, pen, or place where cows, horses, mules, or other animals are kept, then and in that instance such original lot or subdivisional lot shall be connected with a public sewer and water main or with a public sewer, as may be required with this act; and whenever there is no such building, stable, shed, pen, or place, as aforesaid, on such original lot or subdivisional lot, then such lot shall be required to be connected with a public sewer only when it has been certified by the health officer of said District that such connection is necessary to public health.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Let me call the attention of the chairman of the committee to lines 14 and 15, which he omitted to read, in which it is expressly stated as follows:

Provided, That the connections required to be made by this act shall be made under the following conditions.

The conditions are expressly stated, and I am sure, Mr. Speaker, fully cover the objection of the gentleman.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I think the bill is still open to the criticism I have made, and that as drawn it would become a useless, unnecessary, very expensive, and unjust charge on many of the lot owners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HULICK. Does not the gentleman think there is need for some legislation of this kind?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do.

Mr. HULICK. What suggestion have you to make, if any, as to an amendment to this bill?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I could not suggest any amendment upon the spur of the moment which would probably cover the whole subject as it ought to be covered, but I think the bill should apply only to such lots as contain "pockets," where water will stand and may breed disease. There should be sewer connections made in cases where there are human habitations or stables or other buildings whenever the absence of such connections shall be found by the health officer to be injurious. But this bill, as I apprehend, requires everybody who owns a lot, whether there is standing water on it or not, or whether it is occupied or not, at the beck and call of the Commissioners or the health officer, to make the connections. This is the grandest bill that has ever been presented in this House for the benefit of plumbers. I certainly must object to its passage in its present form.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Has not the bill been explained to the gentleman's satisfaction?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire asked for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 2.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER (having made a count). There are 179 members present. The ayes have it, and the bill as amended is ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

UNCLAIMED FREIGHT, BAGGAGE, ETC.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6663) to authorize and regulate the sale of unclaimed freight, baggage, and other property in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any freight, baggage, or other property transported by a common carrier to, or deposited with a common carrier at, any point in the District of Columbia, shall remain unclaimed by the owner or consignee, or the charges thereon shall remain unpaid, for the space of sixty days after arrival at the point to which the same shall have been directed or transported, or after deposit as aforesaid, and the owner or person to whom the same is consigned, or by whom the same shall have been deposited, shall, after notice of such arrival, or after notice to take away such property so deposited, neglect or refuse to receive the same and pay the charges thereon within such period of sixty days, then it shall be lawful for such carrier to sell such freight, baggage, or other property at public auction, after giving three weeks' notice of the time and place of sale, once a week for three successive weeks, in a newspaper published in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That upon the application of such carrier, verified by affidavit, to the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a special term, setting forth that the place of residence of the owner or consignee of any such freight, baggage, or other property is unknown, or that such freight, baggage, or other property is of such perishable nature, or so damaged, or showing any other cause that shall render it impracticable to give the notice or delay the sale for the period provided in the first section of this act, then it shall be lawful for such court to make an order authorizing the sale of such freight, baggage, or other property upon such terms as to notice as the nature of the case may admit of, and to such court shall seem meet: Provided, That in case of perishable property the affidavit and proceedings required and authorized by this section may be had before a justice of the peace.

SEC. 3. That the residue of moneys arising from any such sale, under either the first or second section of this act, after deducting the amount of charges, including charges for transportation, the cost of handling and storage, demurrage, and the costs and expenses of proceedings to authorize the sale, and of advertising and sale, shall be paid to the owner of such freight, baggage, or other property, on demand.

An amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to, striking out, in line 7, after the word "of," the words "sixty days" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "six months."

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Speaker, another amendment is necessary in order to conform the language of another part of the bill to the amendment just adopted. I move to strike out, in line 14, page 2, the words "sixty days" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "six months."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MEREDITH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SECTION 416, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4452) to amend section 416 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 416 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, be, and the same is, amended as follows:

"SEC. 416. All property or money taken on suspicion of having been feloniously obtained, or of being the proceeds of crime, and for which there is no other claimant than the person from whom such property was taken, and all lost property coming into possession of any member of the police force, and all property and money taken from pawnbrokers as the proceeds of crime, or from persons supposed to be insane, intoxicated, or otherwise incapable of taking care of themselves, shall be transmitted as soon as practicable to the property clerk, to be fully registered and advertised for the benefit of all parties interested, and for the information of the public as to the amount and disposition of the property so taken into custody by the police. That whenever any money or property of deceased persons coming into the custody of the property clerk of the police department shall remain in his hands for the period of one year without being claimed by the legal representatives of such deceased person, such money or property, when not exceeding $50 in value, shall be disposed of as lost or abandoned property as provided in this chapter: Provided, That when the value of such money or property shall exceed $50 and shall have remained in the custody of the property clerk for one year, all records pertaining to the same shall be certified by the property clerk to the orphans' court of the District of Columbia, which shall appoint an administrator of such estate according to law: Provided further, That the administrator so appointed by the orphans' court shall deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, to the credit of the policemen's fund, any balance remaining in his hands after the time limited for the final settlement of the estates of deceased persons under existing law."

The report (by Mr. HULICK) is as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2653) to provide for the appointment of a public administrator in the District of Columbia; also the bill (H. R. 4452) to amend section 416, Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, report that they have considered both of said bills together, and are of the opinion that it is unnecessary to establish the office of public administrator in the District of Columbia, and therefore report against H. R. 2653 and recommend its indefinite postponement, and in lieu thereof recommend the passage of H. R. 4452, to amend said section 416. In support of this conclusion reference is made to the letter of Richard Sylvester, chief and property clerk Metropolitan police, District of Columbia, addressed to Maj. William G. Moore, superintendent of police, Washington, D. C., as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE,
"Washington, D. C., January 6, 1896.

"SIR: The accompanying bill was handed to me by Hon. George Truesdell, Commissioner District of Columbia, with directions to report the necessity for such legislation and to suggest any amendment, if there should be such required.

"The 1st of July, 1884, one David Patterson died in this city intestate and without leaving any next of kin, so far as known. At the time of his death he occupied a room in the Federal Building. The coroner found on the body of deceased $656.10, which on July 19, 1884, he turned over to me, as property clerk. Several years later, in obedience to the orders of the Commissioners, as I held, in conformity with section 416 of the Revised Statutes relative to the District of Columbia, and as had been the practice for years, I deposited the amount to the credit of the policemen's fund.

"Seven years after Patterson's death, one Kurtz, who claimed to have applied a salve to the deceased's sore back during his lifetime, applied for letters of administration. The case was taken to the court of appeals, where it was held that letters as applied for should issue, and Congress appropriated the amount that had been deposited to the credit of the policemen's fund to repay the amount to the administrator thus appointed, with interest. This was the first interference with what had been the practice in over twenty years.

"All that is required, and what suggested this bill, which was arranged nearly three years ago, is legal authority to deposit the proceeds of abandoned estates with the policemen's fund. In this respect, as cited in the Patterson case, the court of appeals holds the lost and abandoned property law to be deficient (section 416, Rev. Stat., rel. D. C.).

"The records show that during the past calendar year there came into my possession abandoned estates as follows:

Leftrick	$14.00	Cannon	$0.50
Buchanan	1.20	Wells	2.00
Allen	5.00	Yakey	.85
Schultz	.25	Harper	5.00
Monroe	5.25	Purcell	10.00
Bell	.25	Ellis	1.23
Morris	.02	Atwood	5.00
Nelson	4.80

"It will be observed that not one of these is of sufficient value to pay the first expense attending administration, let alone the cost of advertising for heirs. Under the proposed law, the administrator could do nothing with such inferior estates. On the other hand, if the property clerk had authority to deposit such small sums, however small, they would always prove of advantage to the deficient policemen's fund.

"The above-enumerated cases illustrate the average run of estates coming into my custody each year, and include those returned to me by the coroner.

"The Patterson case is the only case I can call to mind in my thirteen years' experience where there were no heirs found and where the amount involved exceeded $100.

"I have inquired of the office of the register of wills, and learn that the business, aside from the character of cases I have just referred to, which would be assigned to a public administrator would be insignificant.

"It is clearly evident that such valueless estates would not pay the expense of filing first papers in the orphans' court, let alone desk room or fees. In other words, there would be insufficient business to maintain the office of public administrator, and the policemen's fund would be deprived of deposits which might be secured to it.

"Another objection, under which complications might arise should the bill become a law, is the deposit of balances remaining in the hands of the public administrator at the end of one year to the credit of the policeman's fund. (Section 4, lines 5 and 6.)

"Existing and immemorial laws concerning estates presume next of kin or legal claimants, etc., to be living for a period of eight years, and it would therefore be unreasonable to close the proceeds of an estate against a wife or child within a period other than that generally allowed by law.

"I have therefore to recommend that the accompanying bill be abandoned, and that in lieu thereof section 416 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia be amended and followed by an additional paragraph, as follows:

"'When money or property of deceased persons, coming into the hands of the police, shall remain in the custody of the property clerk for the period of one year, without being claimed by an executor, administrator, or other person legally authorized to sign and receipt for and to receive the same, such money or property, when not exceeding $50 in value, shall be disposed of as other lost and abandoned money or property provided for in this chapter.

"'When the value of such money or property of any deceased person shall exceed $50 in value, and shall have remained in the custody of the property clerk for at least one year, all records pertaining to the same shall be certified to the orphans' court of the District of Columbia, and the presiding justice thereof shall appoint an administrator to dispose of such estate according to law: Provided, That any such administrator so appointed shall deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, to the credit of the policemen's fund, any unsettled balances remaining in his custody for a period of at least five years.'

"The present depleted condition of the policemen's fund suggests the above amendment.

"Respectfully, RICHARD SYLVESTER,
"Chief (also Property) Clerk, Metropolitan Police, District of Columbia.

"Maj. WM. G. MOORE,
"Superintendent of Police, Washington, D. C."

The attorney for the District of Columbia is of the opinion that the proposed legislation embraced in the bill H. R. 2653 can be better attained as proposed by the bill H. R. 4452. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia recommend and favor the adoption of the latter bill.

In view of the facts and statistics set forth in the said report of the chief of police and the concurrent opinion of the officials of the District, who have been consulted, the committee recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. 4452) amending section 416, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a substitute for House bill No. 2653, which provided for the appointment of a public administrator for the District of Columbia. Upon consideration of that measure the bill that is now before the House was presented by the Commissioners and was approved by the District Committee. The property that is to be cared for by this bill, such as that arising from the proceeds of crime, property which is lost, property of parties who are insane, and property for which there has not been a claimant, is provided for by the existing law in this way. If it remains one year unclaimed by the legal representatives of the parties concerned, then it is to be disposed of in a certain way, as provided in section 6417 of the Revised Statutes. The amendment of this section begins with the word "Provided," in line 25.

The amendment provides that an administrator shall not take possession, or be appointed by the courts to take possession, of the property until a year shall have elapsed, and then only where the amount of the property exceeds $50. Within the last year, according to the returns made by the chief of police, out of fifteen instances the total amount of property taken from this class of persons was only $56, and to have an administrator appointed for each one of the items would cost far in excess of the amount involved. The highest amount of property received during last year from the sources indicated was $14 and the lowest 2 cents. The statute as it now stands provides absolutely what shall be done with the money, and this bill amends it so as to provide that after the money has remained in the hands of the officer for twelve months then, instead of having an administrator appointed, it shall be paid over into the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of the police fund. I do not think it necessary to make any further explanation of the bill unless some gentleman desires to be informed as to special points. I therefore ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULICK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FALLS CHURCH AND POTOMAC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BABCOCK. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 7139) to authorize the Falls Church and Potomac Railroad Company of Virginia to extend its line into and within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

Mr. LACEY. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. BABCOCK. I have an amendment which I propose to offer on behalf of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, at the end of section 1, the words "and across Seventh street to the Baltimore and Potomac Railway station at its terminus" and insert "the west building line of Ninth street northwest"; so as to read, "thence eastward on B street to the west building line of Ninth street northwest."

Mr. LACEY. That is the amendment I was about to offer.

Mr. BABCOCK. This makes the terminus of this line Ninth street instead of Sixth street.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, after the word "no," insert the word "horses"; so as to read: "Provided, That no horses, overhead trolley, or steam locomotive shall be used."

Mr. BABCOCK. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MEREDITH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SEC. 2. That the drawback certificates herein provided for shall be receivable for all arrears of general taxes due and unpaid on and prior to the 30th day of June next succeeding the issue thereof.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 2, page 2, strike out the words "including interest thereon to the date of this act."

In the last line of the bill, strike out the word "succeeding" and insert "preceding."

Mr. DOCKERY. This bill, as I understand, provides that 56 tax-sale certificates, amounting in the aggregate to $1,559.04, be made receivable for taxes. These certificates have been held by the courts to be invalid because the collector of taxes did not make his report to the recorder of deeds within the time fixed by law.

Mr. HULICK. He never made a report; he failed entirely to make any report to the recorder, as the law required him to do, of the sales that had been made, by virtue of which these tax certificates were issued.

Mr. DOCKERY. And therefore the committee hold that, in view of the negligence of the officer, these tax-sale certificates should be validated by making them receivable hereafter for taxes. Now, the question I wish to ask is, whether the holders of these certificates had not some remedy at law, so that they could have compelled, in some way, the issue of tax deeds?

Mr. HULICK. The committee are of opinion that they had no remedy at law.

Mr. DOCKERY. My reason for asking the question is this: I find in a letter from the president of the Board of Commissioners this statement:

When these holders were entitled to the deeds they should have demanded them, and failing to get them, should have sought their remedy at law. As they failed to resort to their legal remedy, they are not entitled to interest after that period.

In view of this statement, the query arose in my mind, What was the legal remedy of these parties, and if there was a remedy of which they failed to avail themselves, whether they were not at fault as well as the officers of the District?

Mr. HULICK. The committee considered that question, and were of opinion that, in view of the fact that the city government received the money of these parties, they ought in equity to have it refunded to them, but without interest. The Commissioners recommended not only a refund of the money actually paid, but the payment of interest.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand that the committee has very properly amended the bill so as to strike out the provision for the payment of interest. But the theory on which this bill is based is the alleged negligence of the officers of the District who failed to make a report within a certain time.

Mr. HULICK. Yes, sir; and that in equity these purchasers should have their money refunded.

Mr. DOCKERY. That seems to me clear, unless they themselves failed to employ some legal remedy of which they might have taken advantage. I wish to know what their remedy was, because Mr. Ross, the president of the Board of Commissioners, states that they had a remedy.

Mr. HULICK. Section 175 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia required the collector of taxes when he made a sale for taxes to report it to the recorder of deeds of the District, and by him it was to be recorded among the land records. When this property was sold in the first place it was in 1874, 1875, and 1876, as stated already. These taxes had been previously anticipated and converted into revenue by the District authorities and had been used by them to discharge certain obligations of the District of Columbia. This was done through the issue of these certificates, and it was determined that a sale of such property as was in arrears and should not be redeemed within one year should be made upon application of the holders of the certificates. By an act of the legislative assembly in June, 1873, because the city of Washington then had a local government, the governor of the District had authority to anticipate these revenues from taxes in arrears in the District after July, 1873. Under the statutes, without going into detail and taking up the time of the House in stating what took place between that time and the decision of the court, the certificates were issued. Then the courts passed on the question of the legality of the certificates and decided that they were not legal. In this case the courts held that the requirement was mandatory—that is, the requirement that the officer should make the returns to the recorder, and the failure to do so would render void the deed of a purchaser at such sale—and for that reason, no doubt, the purchasers referred to in the bill failed to call for their deeds.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the statement of the Commissioners.

Mr. HULICK. Now, the question is, Why did not they proceed to protect their rights by an action of law? The committee—for I personally could not see what right they had to sue the Government or bring action at law to obtain judgment—the committee thought that if they had any remedy at all it was a remedy in equity. You must remember that these parties attended the sale and made the purchases just as they are in the habit of doing when property is offered at tax sales and a speculation is in sight.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will my colleague on the committee yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. HULICK. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri, I wish to say to him that the legal remedy which the Commissioners say in Mr. Ross's report that these parties failed to pursue was not a remedy to get their money back, as the gentleman seems to imply. Let me quote the language:

> The object of these suggested modifications is to restrict the interest-bearing period from the date of the issue of the certificates to the time when the holders thereon were entitled to deeds for the property. When these holders were entitled to the deeds, they should have demanded them, and failing to get them, should have sought their remedy at law. As they failed to resort to their legal remedy, they are not entitled to interest after that period.

Not that they were not entitled to their money, not that they did not pursue the remedy that they had to recover their money, but that the interest ought to be stopped at that time, and that is a reference to the question of interest upon the purchase money paid by them, as the gentleman will see.

Mr. HULICK. Now, let me propound the same inquiry to the gentleman from Tennessee: What was their remedy?

Mr. RICHARDSON. They had no remedy. I do not claim that they had, but the gentleman from Missouri says that Mr. Ross intimates that they had a remedy for the recovery of the money. That was not the question at all considered by Mr. Ross, as this extract from his letter shows. He had reference to the interest.

Mr. HULICK. But what remedy did they have, or had they any at all?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not say that they had any. I agree with the gentleman from Ohio in that regard, and we acted on the bill on the assumption that they had no remedy.

But the gentleman from Missouri, I think, misunderstands the suggestion of the District Commissioners; not that they had a remedy for the money paid, but that they failed to pursue some remedy which would give them additional interest.

Mr. HULICK. My judgment is, and my attempt to answer the gentleman from Missouri was, to say that they had no remedy at all.

Now, let us see what equities they have. We concluded that they had a right to the money actually paid by them into the treasury. They purchased these certificates as a matter of investment or speculation; there was a high penalty upon the holders of the property who failed to pay the taxes; and this bill, if adopted, will give to these parties the actual money paid out, and that would be evidenced by certificates to be issued by the holders in the payment of the taxes here.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to pursue this subject further than to suggest that this bill seems to establish a dangerous precedent. The beneficiaries of this bill invested in tax-sale certificates—a speculative venture—and by the failure of the officer required to perform a certain duty in respect to them they were invalidated. In Missouri we had a similar statute some years since, authorizing delinquent property to be sold for taxes and tax deeds to be issued. A great many persons purchased land under this law, and subsequent to the time of the purchase the supreme court decided that the law was invalid. But I never heard that the State of Missouri refunded the money to the holders of tax deeds.

Mr. HULICK. Now, it appears, Mr. Speaker, that this remedy may have been the one in the minds of the Commissioners, that the legal remedy of the party was against the officer for violating the law in failing to perform his duty. I do not know but that would have been a cause of action upon his bond for damages. It was incumbent upon him to make returns of the sale in order to validate the certificates under the law, and these parties might possibly have had a just cause of action against the officer for failing to do his duty. But the committee considered that these parties were purchasers for speculative purposes, and that in order to protect themselves they should have gone and inquired about whether the report of the sale was properly certified or not; that it was their duty and incumbent upon them to see that the certificates were properly made out.

Mr. DOCKERY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HULICK. And the purchasers, on the rule of caveat emptor, were required to see that the officer did his official duty. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask to print this report as a part of my remarks. If there are no further questions, I will call for the third reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the report be printed as a part of his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. HULICK) is as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom House bill No. 3610 was referred, have considered the same and respectfully submit the following report:

There are 56 tax-sale certificates embraced in this bill which the owners ask to have redeemed, amounting in the aggregate to $1,559.04, exclusive of interest.

These certificates were issued by the District of Columbia to purchasers at tax sales held in 1874, 1875, and 1876, of property on which certain arrears of taxes were then due and unpaid.

These arrears of taxes had been previously anticipated and converted into revenue by the District of Columbia and had been used to discharge its current obligations, through the issue of lien certificates for the amount of such arrears and their payment as money to the creditors of the District.

By act of the legislative assembly approved June 25, 1873, the governor was authorized to anticipate the revenue from all taxes that may be in arrears to the District of Columbia on or after July 1, 1873, by issuing certificates therefor and disposing of the same; and it was provided in said act that to enforce the collection of these lien certificates a sale of such property as shall not be redeemed within one year should be made upon application of the holders of these lien certificates.

Lien certificates were issued as provided in said act against the various pieces of property described in this bill and paid out and utilized by the District of Columbia in discharge of its monetary obligations, and in default of their being redeemed by the respective property owners within one year sales were made upon application in 1874, 1875, and 1876, to enforce their collection as provided in said act, and at such sales the original lien certificates were surrendered and tax-sale certificates drawing 15 per cent interest per annum (those embraced in this bill) were issued. Thus the District of Columbia in effect issued its own scrip secured upon the lots mentioned in the bill and paid it out to its creditors in satisfaction of its just debts, dollar for dollar, and when this scrip became due or overdue and not redeemed, it made sale of the pledged security (the property) and issued to the holder tax-sale certificates in its place.

As no other relief to the holder was obtainable, the rule of caveat emptor would not apply to the purchaser at such sale, since the sale served the purpose only of converting the lien certificates into tax-sale certificates upon the same property.

It appears, however, that the purchaser at these tax sales or the holder of these tax-sale certificates acquired no advantage, but rather lost everything by reason of the tax-sale certificates themselves proving invalid through the negligence of the District in not perfecting the sale as required by law.

The statute (R. S. D. C., section 175) required the collector of taxes when he made a sale for taxes to report it to the recorder of deeds of the District, and by him it was to be recorded among the land records. That was not done in the present case, and the courts in this District have held that this requirement was mandatory and the failure to make such a report on the part of the District authorities would render void any tax deed of a purchaser at a sale not so reported. (MacArthur and Mackey, 56, and 6 Mackey, 574.) These 56 certificates are therefore unconvertible and worthless. By reason of these decisions no tax deeds have been issued upon these tax-sale certificates, since if issued they would be null and void and create no lien upon the property, so that the holders of these 56 certificates of sale are as great losers and as effectually without remedy as if they held tax deeds in their place.

The committee are of opinion that, as the lien of these certificates has been lost by the neglect of the District officials, and as the certificates have thus become invalid and uncollectible (this through no fault of the present holders thereof), and as the District has had the benefit of the holders' money, they should have the opportunity to convert these certificates into drawbacks receivable for general taxes, as provided by this bill.

The following letter from the assessor of the District of Columbia is referred to as a part of this report:

"OFFICE OF THE ASSESSOR, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
"Washington, February 5, 1896.

"MY DEAR SIR: I beg to call your attention to the bill forwarded to you by the Commissioners some time ago 'In relation to taxes and tax sales in the District of Columbia.' We consider this a very important measure, and hope for prompt action. On page 7 of my annual report, herewith inclosed,

I call special attention to the matter and give a few reasons for its passage. If you desire any information on the subject please inform the collector of taxes or myself, and oblige,

"Yours, very truly,
MATTHEW TRIMBLE,
"Assessor, District of Columbia.

"Hon. J. W. BABCOCK,
"Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia."

The following is that part of the annual report of the assessor referred to:

"CANCELLATION OF TAXES.

"I deem it my duty to call attention to my report of last year on the subject of cancellation of taxes, as follows:

"'For some years past it has been customary for the Commissioners, on request of the party holding the tax-title deed, to issue orders directing this office to cancel all taxes due and unpaid prior to the date of the sale of the property. These orders are based on decisions of the supreme court of this District in the Brewer and Pilling cases, and since those decisions have been rendered a great many thousand dollars have been lost to the District revenues.

"'As the full force and effect of the ruling in this matter is becoming better known many are taking advantage of it, and, instead of paying their taxes promptly, are letting the various payments go by default, looking forward to the fact that each year as it passes with the taxes unpaid only adds to the amount to be subsequently canceled, and thereby adding additional burdens of expense upon the prompt taxpayer in order to make up deficiencies caused by these orders of cancellation.

"'Under the provisions of the act approved March 19, 1890, property which has once been advertised and sold for nonpayment of taxes can not be again advertised for the same tax, and consequently when a party other than the District is the purchaser the certificate of sale is for the tax of one year only, although twenty years and more of arrears may have been due and unpaid. After the lapse of two years the holder of the certificate is entitled to a deed, and here, I think, the issue should be made. When the deed is issued all preexisting liens or titles of every description up to the date of the sale upon which the deed is made are extinguished, so far as the District is concerned, and the beneficiary under the deed is legally entitled to the cancellation of all unpaid taxes prior to the date of the sale under which he holds title. A bill (H. R. 3293) was introduced in the House of Representatives under date of September 21, 1893, which, with some amendments, would correct the evil complained of, and I trust the Commissioners will urge its passage.'"

The Commissioners of the District have expressed their views of this bill in a letter of February 18 last:

"OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
"Washington, February 18, 1896.

"DEAR SIR: * * * The tax-sale certificates embraced in said bill were issued to purchasers of property in arrears for general taxes at the annual sales held in the District of Columbia in the years 1872, 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876. The amount in each certificate represents the sum paid by the purchaser to the District upon each piece thus sold. These certificates were by law convertible into tax deeds after the expiration of two years from the date of sale. The owners of property were allowed that length of time in which to redeem the property from said sales. By section 175 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia, the collector of taxes was required to report such sales when made to the recorder of deeds for record among the land records of the District. It appears that such report was not made as to the sales represented by the present certificates, and that this omission has invalidated the certificates in the hands of the present holders.

"The supreme court of the District of Columbia, in MacArthur and Mackey, 56, and Beale vs. Brown, 6 Mackey, 574, has decided that such report was 'an essential requirement * * * and unless it has been complied with any tax deed taken by a party is void, because the District of Columbia has not done that which justified it in proceeding to give a tax deed to the party.' Thus no valid tax deed could issue to the purchaser upon any of the certificates embraced in this bill, and the District is unable on its part to complete the terms of sale. So that the holders of these certificates have nothing for their purchase money except invalid, uncollectible, and inconvertible certificates, which, by reason of this failure on the part of the collector of taxes to report these sales to the recorder of deeds as required by law, constitute no lien upon the property sold.

"While the Commissioners are of the opinion that the holders of these certificates could not collect the amounts they paid for them through the courts of law, they believe that these owners are equitably entitled to a refund of the purchase money with reasonable interest thereon. They therefore recommend the enactment of the bill with the following modifications:

"After the word 'interest,' in line 14, section 1, insert the words 'at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.' After the word 'thereon,' in the same line, insert 'for two years from the dates on which said certificates were respectively issued.' Same line, strike out the words 'to the date of this act.'

"The object of these suggested modifications is to restrict the interest-bearing period from the date of the issue of the certificates to the time when the holders thereon were entitled to deeds for the property. When these holders were entitled to the deeds they should have demanded them, and failing to get them, should have sought their remedy at law. As they failed to resort to their legal remedy they are not entitled to interest after that period.

"The Commissioners have recommended 6 per cent interest as being a fair rate in view of all the circumstances aforesaid and the policy of Congress on the subject of interest on claims against the District, as indicated in the following limitation placed by it upon the rate of interest to be allowed on judgments against the District of Columbia (U. S. Stats., volume 26, page 514): 'That hereafter interest, when authorized by law, on judgments against the District of Columbia, in suits begun after the passage of this act, shall be at the rate of not exceeding 4 per cent per annum.'

"The Commissioners recommend that the bill be further amended by striking out the word 'succeeding,' in lines 24 and 25, on page 8, and inserting the word 'preceding' in lieu thereof.

"Very respectfully,
JOHN W. ROSS,
"President Board of Commissioners District of Columbia.

"Hon. J. W. BABCOCK,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia,
House of Representatives."

The committee can not indorse the suggestion of the Commissioners as to the allowance of interest to these claimants. The equities are not in their favor. It was the incumbent duty of these purchasers at tax sales to see that the collector of taxes reported such sales to the recorder of deeds for record, as required by law. They were voluntary bidders at such sales for profit and speculation.

At law these holders of said tax certificates could not, in the opinion of the committee, collect the money paid therefor in the courts of law. And while they may be equitably entitled to a refund of the money actually paid, there is no equity in allowing them interest thereon.

Failing to see that the sales were duly certified to the recorder at the time, at the end of two years they should have demanded their deeds, and, as the Commissioners say, "failing to get them, they should have sought their remedy at law." In no respect have they exercised due diligence in looking after their interests.

The committee therefore suggest an amendment, by striking out, in line 14, first page, the words "including interest thereon to the date of this act."

The following amendment is also recommended, by striking out the word "succeeding," in line 24, page 8, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "preceding."

And with these amendments the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONNOLLY. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, why should a different rule be applied to these purchasers from that which applies to purchasers at ordinary tax sales or judicial sales of any kind? It is well known that everybody who buys at sales of that kind buys at his own risk. If he gets nothing, why there is no mode of relief. That is the general rule which obtains in all the States in sales of this kind. Now, why should a different rule be applied to these individuals?

Mr. HULICK. The cases cited by the gentleman are not parallel to the one under consideration. Here is a public official who has certain duties incumbent upon him, to make certificate of the sales. Now, the sales referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] are sheriff's sales, assignee sales, trustee sales, and so forth, and in those sales the purchaser must be governed by that rule which I have just suggested, that the purchaser must beware and look out for the title to the property he is buying at an official sale.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That same rule obtains at any public sale.

Mr. HULICK. Let me go a little further. In all those cases, as far as my observation goes, when the money is paid over at an assignee's sale, sheriff's sale, trustee's sale, and other official sales, if the money is paid to the sheriff or the officer before the sale is confirmed, and it turns out that there is an imperfect sale, an illegal sale, that there are conditions precedent that have not been performed by the officers, the court as a rule always sets aside the sale and orders the money to be refunded to the purchaser; but after the sale is confirmed there is no remedy, and the purchaser must look to the property, and if he gets no title it is his misfortune—caveat emptor.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That is the general rule, is it not?

Mr. HULICK. That is the general rule.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Now, why except these people from that general rule?

Mr. HULICK. Because, as I have tried to state, this is a public sale in which a public officer has failed to do his duty, and the treasury of this District has been the beneficiary of his failure to do his duty, and has got this $1,500 and more.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Does not the purchaser take that chance of the public officer failing to do his duty when he makes the purchase and pays his money?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will pardon me, the broad distinction which the gentleman makes as a lawyer—I recognize the distinction clearly, and I think the gentleman from Illinois will—the distinction in the case he suggests is where the sale is completed and the purchaser fails to get title to the property he purchases. In that case there is no refunding, and that is the case to which the gentleman refers. There is no refunding then because the sovereign does not warrant the title to what he is selling; but in this case the difference is that the officer did not make any return of the sale at all, thereby omitting something necessary to make the sale complete.

Mr. CONNOLLY. But under the rule the purchaser takes the chance of the officer doing everything which the law requires in order to complete the sale?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman asked for the distinction and I told him.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That is not a distinction.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before the gentleman from Tennessee takes his seat I should like to say——

Mr. HULICK. I have the floor, and I do not care to yield to anybody except by request addressed to myself.

Mr. HOPKINS. As the gentleman from Tennessee was occupying the floor, I supposed he had it. But I do not care to whom I submit my question.

Mr. HULICK. I only want to know whether I retain the floor or not.

Mr. HOPKINS. I did not take you from the floor. It was the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HULICK. No one as yet has taken me from the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS. I see by the report accompanying this that Commissioner Ross says:

When these holders were entitled to the deeds, they should have demanded them, and failing to get them, should have sought their remedy at law. As they failed to resort to their legal remedy, they are not entitled to interest after that period.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We do not give it to them.

Mr. BABCOCK. We do not give them any interest after that period.

Mr. HULICK. The gentleman will observe the amendment to the bill——

Mr. HOPKINS. But you give them their money back.

Mr. HULICK. The point the Commissioner tried to make was they were not entitled to interest for the entire time, but that they should have interest from the date only on which they demanded their deeds.

Mr. HOPKINS. Not at all. The construction to be placed on the letter of the Commissioner is simply this: That these gentlemen who now seek the remedy proposed in the pending bill had an opportunity, had they exercised their rights, to have demanded these deeds, and the Commissioner expressly states in his letter that they were derelict in their duty——

Mr. HULICK. That is not the point, if the gentleman from Illinois will notice.

Mr. HOPKINS. Wait until I get my statement completed. The Commissioner states that they were derelict in their duty and failed to make application at the proper time for the execution of the deed, and he says that if they had done that, then they could have gone into court if there had been any failure. Now it seems to me——

Mr. RICHARDSON. What should they have gone into court for?

Mr. HOPKINS. It seems to me, if any credence is to be given to the letter of the Commissioner, the man who ought to know more about this than anybody else, and whose interest is certainly not to deprive any honest man of his money, that these men are at fault, and that if they have lost any money, why it is by reason of their own misconduct, and in law and in equity such men are estopped from recovering the money.

Mr. HULICK. I see the force of the gentleman's suggestion, and the committee took that into consideration in considering the letter of the Commissioner; but the committee did not agree with that view, in fact did not believe that they had any legal remedy unless, as I have just suggested, they might have had their legal action against the officer who failed to do his duty, one which was mandatory upon him in order to validate these sales.

Now, whether the Commissioner has stated a legal proposition to which we agree or disagree is not the question here. They did not demand these deeds; and if they had the deeds could not have been given, because they were based on an illegal sale.

Mr. HOPKINS. If they had demanded the deeds, then they would have discharged their duty, and they would have had some equities then to come to Congress on, if they had no legal rights; but, mark, my point is that the Commissioner says that if they had demanded the deeds then they would have had a legal remedy.

Mr. HULICK. That only bears upon the question of interest.

Mr. HOPKINS. That bears upon the question of the allowance of this money.

Mr. HULICK. We do not so understand it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Commissioner does not say that.

Mr. HULICK. The Commissioner is there offering an argument why these tax-sale purchasers should not have interest from the day of sale up to the end of the two years in which they had the right to demand their deeds; and he said they should not have interest from that time, but that the interest to be paid to them should be after the time they were entitled to the deeds and up to the present time. The committee did not look at it in that way; and we thought that so many years had been allowed to pass, while these persons have slept upon their rights, that they could not in equity demand interest. We therefore recommended against the allowance of interest on their claim.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then your purpose is to refund the money actually paid, without any interest at all?

Mr. HULICK. Yes, sir; to refund the money without a cent of interest. That the Government having received the money from these persons, they had the right to have it refunded and to use these certificates that were given for taxes when they came to pay the taxes upon their property.

Mr. TRACEY. Have all these sales been canceled?

Mr. HULICK. They have all been canceled and declared illegal by the court of this District. They are held to be illegal and void on the theory that it was the duty of this officer—the mandatory duty—to make reports of the sales, so that there would be notice of the sales to innocent parties, and it was decided that these tax sales were not a lien upon the property.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DINGLEY). The question is on the amendment reported by the committee. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 2, page 2, strike out the words "including interest thereon to the date of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, page 9, strike out the word "succeeding" and insert the word "proceeding."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let us have a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 11.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point of no quorum. [After a pause.] Does the gentleman insist upon the point of no quorum?

Mr. HULICK. If the gentleman from South Carolina has any reason why the bill should not pass, I should like to hear it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of no quorum?

Mr. TALBERT. I do not withdraw the point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count.

A count was taken.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of no quorum is withdrawn. The ayes have it, and the bill is passed.

Mr. HULICK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 1306) to authorize and encourage the holding of a transmississippi and international exposition at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1898—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

A bill (S. 1468) extending the time allowed the Blue Mountain Irrigation and Improvement Company for the construction of its reservoir and canal in and through the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MARRIAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1904) to regulate marriages in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That if any male person intending to marry in the District of Columbia be under 21 years of age, and if a female under 18 years of age, and have not been previously married, the consent of the father or guardian, or, if there be none, of the mother of such person, shall be given either personally to the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia or his deputy, or in writing subscribed by a witness, who shall make oath before the clerk of said court that said writing was signed or acknowledged in the presence of said witness, by such father, guardian, or mother, as the case may be.

SEC. 2. That marriages in the District of Columbia may be celebrated by the judge of any court of record or any justice of the peace. When any minister or other person, appointed or ordained according to the rites and ceremonies of his church, shall, before the supreme court of the District of Columbia, produce proof that he is duly appointed or ordained as such, and that he is in regular communion with the religious society of which he is a member, and give bond in the penalty of $500 to comply with the conditions of this act, such court may make an order authorizing him to celebrate the rites of marriage in the District of Columbia. Marriages between persons belonging to any religious society which has no ordained minister may be solemnized by the person appointed and in the manner prescribed by and practiced in any such society.

SEC. 3. That no one but a minister or other person authorized by this act shall hereafter celebrate the rites of marriage in this District, anything in any law now in force in said District to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 4. That no marriage heretofore or hereafter solemnized shall be deemed or adjudged to be invalid, nor shall the validity thereof be in any way affected, on account of any want of authority in any person solemnizing the same, if consummated with a full belief on the part of the persons so married, or either of them, that they were lawfully joined in marriage.

SEC. 5. That no license for any marriage shall hereafter be issued to which any citizen of a foreign country shall be a party until a minister or consul representing such foreign country in the United States shall certify that the conditions to the validity of the marriage of the laws of such country shall have been complied with.

SEC. 6. That any person authorized to celebrate the rites of marriage shall be paid by the husband a fee of at least $1 in each case.

SEC. 7. That if any minister or other person who has executed bond under section 2 of this act and is authorized to celebrate marriages in this District shall fail to comply with the provisions of section 8 of this act, the condition of such bond shall be deemed to be thereby broken; and if a justice of the peace shall fail to comply with the provisions of section 8 of this act he shall, upon conviction, be fined, in the discretion of the court, not exceeding $500.

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the clerk to examine and ascertain the full names, ages, color, whether married previously or single, whether related or not, and, if so, in what degrees, of the parties desiring to marry, which facts shall appear on the face of the application, and shall be in the following form:

Number ——. Application for license. Date, ——; names of parties, ——; age, —; color, ——; relationship, ——; whether he or she is a citizen of the United States or of a foreign country, ——; if a citizen of a foreign

—— ——.
—— ——.

Licenses shall be in the following form:

To any minister or other person authorized to celebrate marriages in the District of Columbia, greeting:

You are hereby authorized to solemnize the rites of marriage between ——, of ——, and ——, of ——, and, having done so, you are commanded to make return of the same to the clerk's office of the supreme court of the said District within ten days, as the law directs.

Witness my hand and seal of said court this —— day of ——, A. D. ——.
—— ——, Clerk.
By —— ——, Assistant Clerk.

Said return shall be made in person or by mail on a coupon attached to and issued with said license and bearing a corresponding number therewith, within ten days from the time of said ceremony, and shall be in the following form:

SEC. 9. That the clerk shall provide a record book of his office, consisting of applications for and of licenses in the forms prescribed in the preceding section, printed in blank, to be filled by him in accordance with said forms, and said blank applications, licenses, and certificates of the officiating minister or other person authorized to celebrate the rite of marriage shall be numbered correspondingly and consecutively from one upward.

And the said license when produced shall be full authority to any minister or other person authorized to marry receiving the same to proceed with the marriage of the parties named therein.

SEC. 12. That this act take effect from and after thirty days from the approval thereof.

SEC. 13. That sections 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, and 10 of the Maryland act of 1777, chapter 12, and sections 720, 721, and 722 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, now in force in this District, are hereby repealed, and all laws or parts of laws heretofore in force in this District inconsistent with or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, this is a pretty important matter, and I should like to hear an explanation of it. Why should this measure be passed? What is the trouble with the existing law?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to occupy the time of the House longer than may be necessary to explain briefly the provisions of this bill as it is proposed to be amended by the committee. All will concede, Mr. Speaker, that there are no laws more important than the marriage laws. They are the foundation of our society. Upon them rest not only legitimacy, but the right of property. This bill having passed the Senate and containing many important provisions not incorporated in the House bill, which the Committee on the District of Columbia had under consideration at the same time, the committee, after very mature deliberation, unanimously recommend the Senate bill, with amendments, for passage, believing that when the members upon this floor understand the provisions of this bill and its necessity as the members of the committee understand it, they will permit the bill to pass without prejudice.

Mr. HULICK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Just one moment, and then I will answer any question the gentleman desires to ask.

Mr. HULICK. I do not desire to ask a question. I just want to make a statement. The bill as reported was not the unanimous report of the committee. While a unanimous report was made, it was not the unanimous judgment of every member of the committee. It would be mine with one amendment, which I would like to have introduced.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. If the gentleman will excuse me, I will reach that feature to which he refers and give him ample opportunity to be heard.

This proposed measure was prepared and presented for the purpose of removing many of the absurdities and doubts in the present law, many of the provisions of the law being obscure, obsolete, and to a large majority of the people of this District are entirely unknown. I am informed that under a strict interpretation of the law, or in conformity with the law as it now exists, there has not been celebrated or solemnized a marriage in the District of Columbia for more than fifty years.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Does the gentleman mean to say that there have been no marriages performed in the District of Columbia for the last fifty years?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I do not believe there has been one performed in strict conformity to the provisions of the Maryland act of 1877; at least I am so informed. The statement has been publicly made.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Then all of the marriages that have taken place have been defective and irregular?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I am not raising any question as to their legality, but I am informed that there have not been any marriages celebrated in this District in strict conformity with that law; and that is my opinion.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman state in what particulars they have failed to conform to the law?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I will, directly. The courts have wisely held such marriages to be valid under the common law, but at the same time I have serious doubts as to whether or not those who have violated the provisions of the statute are not subject to some extent to its penalty. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there has been recently, in the Senate and elsewhere, much discussion with respect to the marriage laws of the District of Columbia, thus publicly directing attention to their obscurity and uncertainty.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What is the Edmunds Act? Does this bill interfere with the Edmunds Act at all?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I think not. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, there has been much recent discussion of the marriage laws of the District, by reason of which their obsolete and antiquated character have become known, hence the seeming great importance that the law be speedily amended and certain sections repealed, thus protecting an innocent public against the possible malicious persecution of the blackmailer.

As will be seen by section 1 of this bill, the age of consent is fixed at 21 years for males and 18 for females, which I believe is in exact accord with the law in nearly every State in the Union—certainly in a large majority of them. The present law treats marriage in the District of Columbia as wholly a religious rite. It provides that marriage may be solemnized only by a clergyman representing the Church of England, a dissenter from that church, a Romish priest, or a representative of the Quaker Society in accordance with the rules of that society. Under this bill it is proposed to recognize marriage as a civil as well as a religious contract or rite, and the bill provides that marriage may be celebrated by the judge of any court of record or by any justice of the peace, as well as by any minister regularly ordained according to the rites and ceremonies of his church. Section 5 of the bill is important, inasmuch as it very wisely protects our American girls (than whom there are certainly none more beautiful or attractive) from what I may perhaps call the unholy ambition of the foreign adventurer, no matter whether he be titled or untitled. I think that the laws of foreign countries with respect to marriages are not generally understood—I, at least, have known very little about them.

Mr. TALBERT. I understand that this bill applies only to the District of Columbia?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. It applies only to the District of Columbia. In most foreign countries, Mr. Speaker, a lawful marriage can not be contracted by a person under 25 years of age without the consent of his parents, and if he be over 25 years of age he must still notify his parents in writing of the proposed marriage, if they be living, in order that they may have an opportunity to file objections, even though their consent may not be necessary.

Gentlemen can readily see that many injustices have occurred in this country by reason of ignorance on the part of our people of these foreign laws in relation to marriage. While this bill was under discussion in the Senate the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] presented a communication from Mr. Wilson, formerly, I believe, our consul at Nice, supplying much valuable information on this subject and setting forth the necessity for the enactment of this section of the pending bill. Should there be serious opposition to this section, I shall ask the privilege of having Mr. Wilson's communication read from the Clerk's desk for the information of the House.

A MEMBER. What section is that?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Section 5.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What is the present age of consent in the District?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Twenty-one and sixteen are the ages, respectively.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. And you now propose to raise the limit to 18?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Yes, sir; to 18.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Suppose the consent of the parents has not been obtained, what effect does that have on the marriage?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I do not understand that under the common law it would invalidate the marriage at all.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. But you are inserting a provision in your bill that consent must be given. Now, suppose the consent is refused and yet the ceremony takes place, what then?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Well, under the common law the marriage, as I understand, would not be invalid. The courts have so held.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Then what effect does your provision have?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. The bill provides that a judge, or justice of the peace, minister, or other person authorized to perform marriage, shall not solemnize or celebrate any marriage unless the license is produced, and the clerk of the court will not have authority to issue a license to persons under the age of 21 and 18, respectively, unless the consent of the parents or guardian has been obtained.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Suppose a young girl says she is 18 years of age when she is not, and upon her statement a license is issued, then what happens? If she makes the statement that she is of legal age when she is not is the subsequent marriage void or voidable or regular?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I do not understand that the marriage is void or voidable. The proposed law provides that the clerk shall examine the applicant for license under oath; and he would be authorized to refuse a license if satisfied in his own mind that the statements made to him were not true. The gentleman from New York is a lawyer, and I am not. He no doubt understands questions of this kind better than I do.

Mr. MEREDITH. In such a case a penalty might be inflicted upon the clerk for granting a license, if he did so knowing that either party was not of legal age; but the marriage would not be void.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. The gentleman from Iowa holds, as I understand, that such a marriage would hold good.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I think so—at common law.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Then it would not be void or even voidable?

Mr. MEREDITH. Certainly not.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I think that would be a question for the courts to decide.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. One other question. Why do you impose on the husband the necessity of paying $1. Suppose a young man wants to be married and does not care to pay a dollar. Why make the payment obligatory upon him? Or, if any payment is required, why should it not be $5 or $10 just as well as $1?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. There are many people in the District of Columbia, I presume, who would not have the necessary $5 or $10.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. If a man is so poor as that, why should he pay anything?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. It is within the power of the person celebrating the marriage to remit the fee.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman might reply to the question of the gentleman from New York by asking, what business has a man to get married if he can not pay so small a fee as $1?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that the evidence as to the validity of the proposed marriage must be filed with the clerk of the court, without which he is not authorized to issue a license.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will not such a law as this make marriage very difficult in the District of Columbia?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I think not.

Now, let me say that section 8 of this bill is important also, from the fact that it provides that the minister, judge, justice of the peace, or other person authorized to perform this ceremony shall file the certificate of such marriage with the clerk of the court, to become a part of the records of his office. This, Mr. Speaker, is one of the important features of the bill. Its importance has been urged upon the committee not only of the House but of the Senate.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Urged by whom?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. By the judges of the supreme court and by the clerk of the court of record. These persons have represented to the committees that less than one-half of the marriages celebrated or solemnized in the District of Columbia are of record in the office of the court. I call the attention of members to this provision as being, in my opinion, one of the important features of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is there only one penalty imposed—that is, the fine of $25—for violating the provisions of the act?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. A failure to comply with this section—section 8—will subject the minister or other person performing the ceremony to a fine, as provided for in section 7, of not less than $50 nor more than $250, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. TERRY. I should like to ask the gentleman what is the object of section 5, in relation to persons who are not citizens of this country? Suppose a lady should come here from France, where, as I understand, the legal age for marriage is about 25. Would she be obliged to get a certificate of the French consul before she could get married in the District of Columbia? A similar question might be put with regard to persons from other Continental nations where the legal age for marriage is 25 or in that neighborhood.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I will refer again to this section briefly, although it was discussed only a few moments ago. Let me give the gentleman as an example a case that happened in the State of Illinois. A German residing in that State was married and continued to live there for eight or ten years, having several children. He then went to his original home, taking this woman with him, and lived with her in Germany as his wife a little while. Then he married another woman, his American wife being still living; but the American marriage was held to be void.

Mr. TERRY. That may be true; but I think the general rule is that a marriage valid where performed is valid the world over. Of course there may be exceptions.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I will read from the French law upon the subject of marriage.

Mr. TERRY. I say that the statement of the gentleman may be true as to some particular case, but I believe the weight of authority is decidedly the other way.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. A man in any foreign army can not marry except with the consent of his Government. No citizen of France can lawfully marry, whether at home or abroad, if under 25 years of age, without the consent of his parents. Such a marriage will not be recognized in his own country as legal.

Mr. TERRY. In regard to that, if the gentleman will permit me, I will state that this is the rule in the United States. Suppose, for instance, in the State of New York there is a law fixing the age at 21 years, and a man not that old, but 19, which we will suppose is the lawful age in the State of New Jersey—if he goes out of the State of New York with the intention of violating and evading its law, and marries in New Jersey and then comes back to New York—I understand it has been held that the marriage in such State is not a valid one. But unless it is shown that he went outside of his own State for the purpose of perpetrating a fraud on its laws and a marriage followed, being duly celebrated under the laws of the other State, such marriage is valid the world over.

The committee has doubtless examined the matter, but you can readily see how a lady, say from France or Germany, coming here, who had not acquired citizenship, would be placed in a very difficult situation by the enactment of such a provision. See the hardships to which she would be subjected even though she never intended to go back to the other country at all. Such hardships should be guarded against.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit me, I will state that in so far as the New York law goes, it has been decided by our court of appeals that when you go out of the State, intending to violate the prohibition in a decree of divorce, and a marriage takes place contrary to such decree, the marriage will be good—that is, if a man be the offender; and if a decree of divorce against him provides that he shall not marry again, he can go into the State of Connecticut or New Jersey and violate the decree or order of the court, and although he is in contempt of court, the marriage is good, if it is a legal marriage according to the lex loci contractus, or the law of the place where the marriage takes place.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. It will be seen that this bill does not seek to protect the people of the District of Columbia against the laws of other States of this country, but only against the enactments of foreign Governments and foreign marriage laws, which are not in harmony with our own.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. If the gentleman will permit me a question just there, according to the New York decisions, where it is illegal for a girl to marry until she is of a certain age, if she violates the statute and does marry she can be taken from her husband and consigned to prison. Will not that be the effect of this enactment?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. No, sir; not at all. If such were the case, the committee would be against the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Now, let me call your attention to one defect which it seems to me appears in the first section of the bill. You provide if a girl be under 18 years and a man under 21, that consent must first be obtained. Consent of whom? Of the father, the mother, or the guardian. Now, let us suppose a case where the father is dead and the mother is dead and no guardian exists. Who is to give consent? If consent can not be obtained under this bill the parties can not marry.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Well, I think it would be competent to create a guardian or secure the appointment of a guardian for the minor.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Does the gentleman know of a procedure in any court or the statute of any State providing for an application for the appointment of a guardian to permit a minor to marry?

Mr. HULICK. Oh, I think there are many such.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would suggest in a case of that kind, where the father, mother, and guardian are all dead, that perhaps they had better have a wake instead of a wedding. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. This bill does not seek to interfere with existing law in that regard. It may perhaps not go as far as it should in this direction. But it seems to me, and your committee believes it to be, a step in the right direction. It is a good bill, and I believe, with the committee, that the bill should be allowed to pass.

There are some amendments, Mr. Speaker, that I ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if in order, I desire to say a few words upon the bill at this time.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; the gentleman is in order. Does the gentleman desire to oppose the amendments or to favor them?

Mr. WALSH. I shall oppose the amendments; but would rather hear them read first.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read, after which the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read the amendments proposed by the committee, as follows:

In section 2, strike out all after the word "member," in the eighth line, to and including the word "act," in the tenth line.

In section 4, line 1, strike out the words "or hereafter."

Strike out all of section 7 and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 7. That if any minister, justice of the peace, or other person who is authorized to celebrate marriages in the District of Columbia shall fail to comply with the provisions of section 8 of this act he shall upon conviction be fined for each and every offense, in the discretion of the court, not less than fifty nor more than two hundred and fifty dollars."

In section 8 insert after the word "ascertain," in line 2, the words "under oath"; and after the word "relationship," in line 8, the words "number of marriage."

Strike out all of section 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 13. That sections 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 15, 16, and 17, in chapter 30, of the compiled statutes now in force in the District of Columbia, and all laws or parts of laws heretofore in force in this District inconsistent with or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is a very serious matter. I believe in throwing around the marriage tie all of the safeguards that we can, because I am a firm believer in the principle that once a marriage has taken place no power on earth should dissolve it. In other words, I believe in the biblical maxim, that "what God hath joined together let no man put asunder."

At the same time I recognize the fact that diverse laws are in operation in nearly every State of the Union on that subject and that an age of consent is established by nearly every State. I think the age of consent is founded on the deliberate judgment and the best opinion of ages, and has been fixed at a period when the male and female are best supposed to understand the contract into which they are to enter.

Most of the States of this Union have fixed the age of 16 for a girl. It is a matter that should be regulated to some extent by nature. Nature can dictate better than any statute or the deliberations of any men, outside of the persons interested, what is the proper age. I think nature can tell better than any statute or the deliberations of anybody, outside of the person interested, to whom the marriage should take place, when, and under what circumstances it should occur. So I say that when a marriage is contemplated by the individuals who desire to be married, the State does an injustice if it puts any impediment or any obstruction in the way of carrying out that contract.

But this is not all. In one of the provisions of this bill it is required that—

When any minister or other person appointed or ordained according to the rites and ceremonies of his church shall, before the supreme court of the District of Columbia, produce proof that he is duly appointed or ordained as such, and that he is in regular communion with the religious society of which he is a member, such court may make an order authorizing him to celebrate the rites of marriage in the District of Columbia.

Now, that is a provision that is not, I am sure, in the statutes of as many as five States in this Union. To compel a minister of religion to furnish the court with proof of his right to act as minister of that religion, and to compel him to wait for a decree of that court allowing him authority to solemnize marriage—I do not feel there is any such provision in five of the States represented here. I do not know that such a provision exists in any State; but from my knowledge of the statutes I will say I am sure it does not exist in as many as five States. Section 3 provides that—

No one but a minister or other person authorized by this act shall hereafter celebrate the rites of marriage in this District, anything in any law now in force in said District to the contrary notwithstanding.

So that, unless a minister does get that privilege through the supreme court, unless he goes to the trouble—and sometimes the extraordinary difficulty—of furnishing proof, notwithstanding his own church, his own denomination, recognizes him as a minister, he is debarred from performing the marriage ceremony. He may be established beyond all question, recognized by his supporters, recognized by his congregation as one who, from his calling, has authority to perform the marriage ceremony. Notwithstanding that, he must go to the trouble of satisfying a court that he has been regularly ordained, and must get a decree from that court before he can solemnize a marriage.

Now, what is the trouble besides? Section 3 subjects a minister to the penalty provided in section 7. Section 7 says:

That if any minister, justice of the peace, or other person who is authorized to celebrate marriages in the District of Columbia shall fail to comply with the provisions of section 8 of this act, he shall, upon conviction, be fined for each and every offense, in the discretion of the court, not less than fifty nor more than two hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Section 7 only provides the penalty on condition that the minister or other person performing the ceremony shall fail to comply with the conditions of section 8.

Mr. WALSH. Let us see what section 8 says.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. That he shall file with the clerk of the court a certificate of such marriage. It is merely a police regulation.

Mr. WALSH. That provision is in force in most of the States, but I do not even agree that that is a wise provision. It may be for the purpose of keeping statistics of marriages and statistics regarding the legitimacy and illegitimacy of children, but frequently it has a very bad effect. Where a young boy and a young girl have made a serious mistake, and want to rectify that mistake by marriage, the case arises very often where it would publish to the world the disgrace of the boy or the disgrace of the girl by the very filing of those certificates, and perhaps thereby prevent what religion and law both agree is best to be done under the circumstances. I say religion requires that these things should be looked upon with a charitable eye, and there are often very good reasons why even that provision should not be in the statute.

But the main thing is this: You should not impede or obstruct the accomplishment of something that we all recognize as a step in civilization. Marriage is a great factor in civilization. The greatest factor, in my judgment, for I believe the family is the unit of society. The freer we make it, the better, where the conditions are such that the persons entering into the contract understand it. We can not fix the age at which it is proper for a person to enter into the marriage contract minus the consent of some other person without invading individual liberty and perhaps the sanctity of a sacrament. The persons marrying are those most concerned. Theirs is the happiness involved. Theirs is the progeny which will possibly affect generations afterwards; and we can not go so far as to say that every marriage between a girl of 16 or 17 and a young man under 21 is not a proper marriage. And while I would advise all young couples to get the consent of their parents or guardians before taking such a solemn step, I think that we should, as I said before, leave the question to those concerned, except in so far as the statutes already regulate it. The statutes go far enough to prevent what it is intended by the law to prevent, and I think we should leave this now as it is upon the statute books, or, if circumstances required it, that we should even repeal the statutes as they now exist and lower the age of consent, so far as marriage is concerned, under some conditions.

Now, another thing: Here in the District of Columbia, where this bill is to operate exclusively, we have a population that comes from the South—I refer to the negro population. They mature more rapidly than the whites. They are physically fit for marriage earlier than the whites; and when they are fit by nature for marriage, and feel inclined to enter into that state, you can see yourselves it is much better to allow them permission than to discourage them by such acts as this and tempt them in some way to enter into a condition which is unlawful. Of course, morality has a great deal to do with all of these questions. It must be taken into account; and I do not impute to the colored man any immorality that I would not impute to his white brother existing under like conditions. They are just the same to me. They have both a human soul, and in that respect there is no distinction between them; but at the same time it is a physical fact, recognized by all students of sociology, that people coming from a southern or warm climate will develop earlier than those from the north. You will see, therefore, for that, as well as the other reasons I have given, we should hesitate about changing the age of consent in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks upon this bill—about five or ten minutes.

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer some amendments to this bill, if the gentleman will permit me to offer them now.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I will, if it will not deprive me of the right to debate the bill generally.

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. HULICK. I send to the Clerk's desk the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. There are two committee amendments already pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in section 1, on page 1, all of lines 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, to and including the word "person," and insert the following: "Male persons of the age of 18 years and female persons of the age of 16 years not nearer of kin than second cousins, and not having a husband or wife living, may be joined in marriage: Provided always, That male persons under the age of 21 years and female persons under the age of 18 years who have not been previously married shall first obtain the consent of the father or guardian, or, if there be neither of those, then of the mother of such person, which."

Mr. HULICK. I also send to the Clerk the following, which I offer as an amendment to section 13.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 13 by inserting in line 10, page 7, after word "section," the word "to"; and insert in line 12, after the word "Columbia," the following: "And sections 721 and 722 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia now in force in the District."

Mr. HULICK. Does the gentleman propose to speak now? If the gentleman does not——

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I wish to oppose the amendments and the bill.

Mr. HULICK. I am in favor of the bill with the amendments I have offered.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, there are certain practical reasons why this bill should not become a law. We have a certain compilation of the statutes here referring to the District of Columbia, which has been edited by Messrs. Lovejoy and Abert, and purports to contain all the laws in force governing the District of Columbia. The measure now under consideration proposes to wipe out some nine or ten of the forty-five sections contained in chapter 30, the chapter controlling the relations of husband and wife. Now, I agree with my colleague from the city of New York in the view that no human relation is of graver importance than that of husband and wife. The other relations of guardian and ward, of parent and child, of master and servant—all the old subdivisions—are of far less importance; and yet we propose now, without any consideration, to amend, to change, to alter all existing laws. I think this is too important a matter to be disposed of in this way, and I think it should be recommitted and sent to the Committee on Judiciary; and then, after careful consideration, it can be brought before this House at some later day in the session.

The measure proposed contains some manifest absurdities on its face. One is the imposition of a tax on the husband for marriage. Does the legality, the validity, of the marriage ceremony depend upon the fee which is paid to the minister or clergyman? In a case where a man is worth thousands and thousands of dollars the clergyman is often paid little or nothing, and yet here it is to be prescribed that in every case, in order to give a sort of cachet to the importance of the ceremony, why there must be paid at least $1! Is this measure seriously proposed in the interest of the clergy of the District? Do they want a dollar for each ceremony; and will they say to the expectant parties, when they appear before them: "Have you your dollar with you?" And if the intended husband says, "Nay, not so," must the ceremony cease, or will its validity be affected? Now, is it the right thing, in so sacred a law as this, to inject provisions which are thoroughly absurd; or, if not absurd, absolutely nugatory?

Mr. ODELL. Does the gentleman think the marriage should not take place unless the money is paid?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should not declare that a penalty should be imposed on a man who desires to marry. I think he should receive some reward.

Mr. BABCOCK. Would the gentleman from New York undertake a contract to solemnize the marriages in the District of Columbia for less than $1 apiece?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. If I were a judge of a court of record in this District, or a justice of the peace, or a minister of the gospel, or a priest, I should say: "Come one, come all; I will marry you for nothing. I do not want your dollar as a penalty." Of course if a man, in the fullness of his heart, chooses to pay $50 or $100 or $1,000 to the clergyman who marries him, it is money well spent; but I say that I have never yet seen in any statute of any State a provision making it obligatory to pay $1, or any fixed sum, as the value of the marriage rite.

Mr. HULICK. How would it be to amend the bill by giving the person officiating the privilege of kissing the bride in lieu of the dollar? [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. That is the old common-law privilege. There is no need of any legislative enactment on that subject. That can be settled by the clergyman and the bride. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I wish to correct the gentleman on one point. In the State of Iowa a justice of the peace is permitted to charge $2 for performing the marriage ceremony. He is not compelled to charge $2, but he may do so if he chooses. Now, this bill provides that the minister or the justice of the peace may charge $1, but there is nothing in the bill to prevent him from rebating the charge if he likes.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. In answer to the position taken by the gentleman from Iowa, let me call attention to the words of the section. They are not permissive or directory; they are mandatory:

SEC. 6. That any person authorized to celebrate the rites of marriage shall be paid by the husband a fee of at least $1 in each case.

"Shall" be paid, not "may" be paid. It seems to me that that would give a right of action against the husband. It would be a contract which could be enforced as soon as the ceremony was performed.

A MEMBER. And cheap at that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Now, who determines the magnitude of the fee? Is it determinable upon the basis of the wealth of the husband or of the bride? What is to be the test? Let us look at the bill seriatim. In the first section it provides—

That if any male person intending to marry in the District of Columbia be under 21 years of age, and if a female under 18 years of age, and has not been previously married, the consent of the father or guardian, or, if there be none, of the mother of such person, shall be given, etc.

As I indicated in a question a few moments ago, if there be no parents living or no guardian, you must wait until the lady attains the age of 18 or the man attains the age of 21 before the marriage ceremony can take place. Is not that manifestly absurd on its face? There is no provision, practically, in this District, under any existing law coming down from Maryland, or in the form of a statutory enactment, for an application to the court for the appointment of a guardian—not even a guardian ad litem—but a sort of special guardian for the purpose of giving consent to the ceremony.

Mr. FISCHER. Does not my colleague consider that this is liberal enough? If he will look at the language in the sixth line he will find that special privileges are given to bigamous women who have been previously married, while no provision is made for the death of previous husbands. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I shall not address myself to that question. I can not answer these somewhat jocular remarks or adopt this method of treating the question. I am considering it from a serious standpoint, from the standpoint of a lawyer and a man, who, as a Representative, is interested in the well-being of this District. In everything that concerns the welfare of the District of Columbia I am interested, as I showed the other day by voting for the free-library bill. Now, it is useless to insert a provision such as this, requiring consent, if there be no way to enforce it, if it is to be simply a brutum fulmen. It is certainly a peculiar spectacle to see the Congress of the United States passing a bill to amend the marriage law of this District which can not be enforced. We have here a very serious chapter relating to the relations of husband and wife, a law which comes down to us from the time when the District of Columbia was first formed, in 1801. Here is a part of the old Maryland law, and although some gentlemen have said that it is antiquated, yet there are some very salutary provisions in it. We find in the first section a list of the degrees of kindred or affinity within which marriage shall not be contracted, and later on there is a penalty imposed for marrying persons who come within the specified degrees.

Mr. BABCOCK. We do not repeal those provisions.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. You repeal the penalty. More than that, you repeal the penalty now imposed for celebrating a marriage when the parties are under the age of consent.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think the gentleman is in error about that. If the gentleman will look at section 13 he will discover that those sections of the law are not repealed.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Let us see. Section 13 says that sections 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 15, 16, and 17, in chapter 30 of the compiled statutes now in force in the District of Columbia, are repealed. Now, section 5 is one that imposes a penalty for marrying within certain degrees of kindred or affinity——

Mr. BABCOCK. Is it?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. And section 10 is the section which imposes a penalty for marrying persons when they are under age. Now, is it wise to abolish those penalties?

Mr. MILNES. Will the gentleman inform us who can perform the marriage ceremony in the District of Columbia under the existing law?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Ministers of the Church of England, ministers dissenting therefrom (which would cover nearly all the others), and priests of the Roman Catholic or Romish Church.

Mr. MILNES. So that marriage is recognized under the present law as entirely a religious ceremony, not as a civil ceremony?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Section 718 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia also provides that—

For the purpose of preserving the evidence of marriages in the District every minister of the gospel appointed or ordained according to the rites and ceremonies of his church, whether his residence be in the District or elsewhere in the United States or its Territories, may be licensed to celebrate marriages in the District.

So we see that under the Maryland law ministers of the Church of England, ministers of all churches dissenting therefrom, and ministers of the Romish Church can celebrate marriages, whereas in the Revised Statutes the old Maryland provision is enlarged so as to embrace all ministers of whatever religious denomination.

If you want to amend the marriage law of the District and authorize marriage by a justice of the peace or a judge of a court of record, propose such a provision and I will vote for it. But why change the existing law in what seems to me this absurd manner?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. The gentleman, I presume, recognizes the fact that there are many good, moral people who refuse to recognize marriage as other than a civil contract, and who would insist upon being married by a judge or a justice of the peace. I believe that every State in the Union allows this ceremony to be performed by a court of record or a justice of the peace. We in this bill propose to adopt that provision with reference to the celebration of marriage in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Now, the answer to that is simply this: A bill should have been brought in to amend section 718 of the Revised Statutes by adding the following words:

Marriages within the District of Columbia may be celebrated by the judge of any court of record or a justice of the peace.

That is the only sensible provision in this whole bill—the only wise provision. The imposition of a fee of $1 is an absurdity; it is ridiculous on its face; and it might well excite the risibilities of the whole United States to say that we measure the value of marriage by the imposition of a fee of $1.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Then let the gentleman offer an amendment to make the fee larger.

Mr. BABCOCK. Or less. Suppose the gentleman makes it 90 cents.

A MEMBER. Or let the man who wants to get married give his due bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. If the existing law is to be changed—if we are to have a more modern marriage law—why should it not conform to the statutes in force in the various States? If a man be a minister of any religion and is empowered to perform the marriage ceremony, why should he be obliged to apply to the court for an order—an order—that he be permitted to perform the ceremony? That is absurd. If a man is a minister of any established church, or if he is authorized by the existing provision of the Revised Statutes to perform the marriage ceremony, why do you want to abridge or take away his power? He may apply for a license now; but why should a minister apply to the court for an order directing that he be allowed to unite persons in the bonds of wedlock?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me to answer his question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. The committee were informed that there are in the District of Columbia many irresponsible individuals assuming to be ministers of the gospel; and therefore this section was regarded as important by all the ministers who were heard before the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. It certainly would be a grave offense for anyone to assume without authority to be a minister of the gospel and to undertake as such to perform the marriage ceremony; and if that offense is likely to occur, there ought to be some penalty provided. But this bill provides no penalty of imprisonment for a person who is so base as to undertake to perform the marriage ceremony when he has no authority so to do.

Mr. TALBERT. I think I agree in general with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT]; but I would like to ask him this question: When two persons agree in the presence of witnesses to become man and wife, without any ceremony by any officer of the law, is not that a valid marriage at common law? And is it not so recognized in all the States?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. It is, provided the marriage be consummated.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have in the fourth section of this bill this provision:

That no marriage heretofore solemnized shall be deemed or adjudged to be invalid, nor shall the validity thereof be in any way affected, on account of any want of authority in any person solemnizing the same, if consummated, with a full belief on the part of the persons so married, or either of them, that they were lawfully joined in marriage.

Now, that is all right with reference to marriages heretofore solemnized; and I see that the words "or hereafter," which were originally in the bill, have been stricken out by the committee. But there is no provision made in reference to marriages which are not solemnized in conformity to the provisions of this act. How can you enforce your act? What does it amount to? What need is there of legislation such as this? It seems to me, gentlemen, in all seriousness, that this is too grave a matter to be disposed of in this way without careful consideration. I submit that the proper course of proceeding—one which certainly must commend itself to every lawyer in this body—would be to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary and let that committee bring in a complete, logical, well-arranged marriage law for the District of Columbia.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT]. I have no doubt but that the Judiciary Committee would have proven competent in the consideration and preparation of this bill, but unfortunately, by reason of the character of the legislation proposed, under the rules of the House the bill went to the Committee on the District of Columbia for its action.

I wish to say this, that this bill was considered in the Senate by the Committee on the District of Columbia there, and by such able lawyers as Senators FAULKNER, HOAR, and others; was considered on the floor of the Senate for two consecutive days, and finally passed that body. It came before the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House and meets their approval in the shape presented here.

Three or four hearings were given to individual ministers and others in reference to the matter embodied in the bill, together with the House bill, which we had before us, both of which were considered by the committee at the same time.

I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the only objection interposed by the ministers, who came before the committee in considerable force, was with reference to sections 2 and 7, which provide for the bond; and after giving that matter careful attention, at the suggestions of the ministers themselves, the bond feature was eliminated, and the penalties provided for, which have been made to apply to judges of the court and justices of the peace as well as to the ministers. I believe that this bill must necessarily pass if there is to be any legislation here in this Congress on the subject, and I trust that the gentleman will withhold his objection.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. I wanted to ask the gentleman why it was made discretionary in the court of the District of Columbia to grant a license to any minister under the terms of this bill? You say such court "may" make an order. Even though he proves that he is a qualified minister, you leave the matter entirely in the discretion of the court.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I think, under the interpretation of the language of the section, the court would construe it as a duty to grant such authority, if the person applying was suitable and presented good and sufficient proof to the court.

Mr. WALSH. The language of your statute is against you.

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Speaker, I have offered an amendment to the bill which I trust will receive the consideration and approval of the House.

It has been stated that this is a very important measure. That I concede, and I approve of the bill most heartily as it comes from the committee, with the adoption of the amendments I have already proposed. I hope to be able in a very brief time to present reasons why these amendments should be adopted by the House and made a part of the bill.

There is great necessity for legislation in this respect, as has been suggested, and while we are considering the marriage laws for the District, it is very important that we have a bill that will commend itself to the citizens of the District of Columbia and the bar, as well as to all interested in such legislation.

The first section of the bill provides—

That if any male person intending to marry in the District of Columbia be under 21 years of age, and if a female under 18 years of age, and has not been previously married, the consent of the father or guardian, or, if there be none, of the mother of such person, shall be given either personally to the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia or his deputy, or in writing, subscribed by a witness, who shall make oath before the clerk of said court that said writing was signed or acknowledged in the presence of said witness by such father, guardian, or mother, as the case may be.

Now, I ask to have the first part of this section stricken out down to and including the word "person," in the seventh line, and have it declared specifically in the bill who can marry in the District; not such persons as are intending to marry, but let it designate who may be married or be permitted to marry in the District. The amendment I offered is to strike out all of that portion of the first section——

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman allow me a question? How many amendments have you?

Mr. HULICK. Two. The other is merely formal, and will follow the adoption of the first. This is to amend the section, the first section, of the bill, so as to provide who may marry in the District of Columbia.

I propose to strike out, then, all of lines 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, down to and including the word "person," and insert the following:

Male persons of the age of 18 years and female persons of the age of 16 years, not nearer of kin than second cousins and not having a husband or wife living, may be joined in marriage, providing always that male persons under the age of 21 and female persons under the age of 18 years, who have not been previously married, shall first obtain the consent of the father or guardian, and if there be neither of these, then of the mother of such person, which shall be given either personally to the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia or his deputy, etc.

This defines and declares who may be married in the District. This bill, as it is offered by the committee, does not. I will here say, as a member of the committee, that the amendment was offered in the committee, and I thought until to-day that it was carried in the bill—that it met the approval of the subcommittee. But I find that it is not included. I do not know the reason why. We should declare who are the persons authorized to be married in the District.

Now, male persons of the age of 18 years can be lawfully married under this amendment, and female persons of the age of 16 years can be lawfully married. At present male persons under 18 and female persons under 16 can not be married under the law. I believe below that age persons ought not to be permitted to marry in the District of Columbia or anywhere else.

The question was asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] a few moments since what would be the result if persons are married, and cohabited, or consummated the marriage, who were under the ages of 18 and 16, respectively? Well, now, that is a question, of course, that would have to be determined by the parties who run that risk. If, however, the marriage be consummated, while it may not be void, it is voidable only. And if the circumstances are such that the marriage ought not to be set aside, it would not be affected by this bill. Now the important question is to determine who shall marry in the District of Columbia. The other bill leaves it open entirely.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULICK. Yes; certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. If this bill is enacted into law will it have the effect of repealing all other statutes now in force in the District of Columbia, and also the provisions of the common law? Will it repeal all of these, and will this be the only law bearing upon the subject?

Mr. HULICK. It will repeal such sections as are designated in the last section of the bill—section 13—and then it provides in general terms, as most of these bills do, that all laws or parts of laws heretofore in force in this District, inconsistent with or in conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

Mr. TALBERT. It will virtually be the only law bearing upon the subject?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. It only repeals those in conflict with this statute.

Mr. HULICK. Those inconsistent with this statute are repealed; but I want to call the attention of the House now to the section that is intended to be repealed by the second amendment.

The statute in force in this District relating to marriage was enacted by the Maryland legislature in 1777. This amendment fixes not only the age but the relationship, which shall not be nearer than that of second cousin. Then the bill proposes an amendment to section 2 of the statutes in force in the District of Columbia, which now fixes the relationship which shall exist, or rather shall not exist, between parties who are determined to marry. I want to call the attention of the House to that measure. Under the law now in force, which was enacted over a hundred years ago, it is provided in section 2, which would be repealed by this amendment and which ought to be repealed, that—

If any person within this District shall hereafter marry with any person related within any of the degrees of kindred or affinity expressed in the following table, such marriage shall be void.

Then follows the table of the degrees of kindred and affinity within which no persons related shall marry. I want you to listen to this, to see the absurdity of a law, passed over a hundred years ago, which now controls the people of this District as to the relationship within which they shall not marry. A man shall not marry his grandmother——

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, why should he? [Laughter.]

Mr. MILNES. I will ask the gentleman if he wants to authorize a man to marry his grandmother? This law says he shall not do it.

Mr. HULICK. No; we want to change the law and say he shall not marry any person of a nearer relationship than second cousin, and that will keep out the grandmothers.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Does not this bill repeal that, and allow a man to marry his grandmother?

Mr. HULICK. My amendment proposes to repeal this section, but the bill as it now stands will not repeal it. Under the terms of this old statute a man shall not marry his grandmother, grandfather's wife, wife's grandmother, father's sister, mother's sister, mother, stepmother. I do not suppose anybody would want to marry his stepmother, with her reputation, but if he did, he may not marry his stepmother in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman must be reading from the Bible.

Mr. HULICK (continuing). Nor his wife's mother, daughter, wife's daughter, son's wife, sister, son's daughter, daughter's daughter, son's son's wife, daughter's son's wife, wife's son's daughter, wife's daughter's daughter, brother's daughter, sister's daughter. That is what a man can not do in the District of Columbia.

Now, I want to call your attention to what a woman can not do, and if this bill passes without the amendment which I propose this section will remain the law of the District so far as that is concerned. Now, I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether it is true that the good people of the District have to be prohibited by law from doing the things above referred to? Now, again, a woman shall not marry her grandfather, grandmother's husband, husband's grandfather, father's brother, mother's brother, father, stepfather, husband's father, son, husband's son, daughter's husband, brother, son's son, daughter's son, son's daughter's husband, daughter's daughter's husband, husband's son's son, husband's daughter's son, brother's son, sister's son.

Now, if the people of this District want such a law as this, if they are a hundred years behind the age and can not live in this year of our Lord 1896 without marrying their grandmothers and others prohibited by that antiquated law, then I pray you, Mr. Speaker, let the House reject my amendment. My amendment simply provides that no one in the District of Columbia can marry any person of nearer relationship than a second cousin. The person who goes to the clerk of the court for a license must state in an affidavit provided for in the bill, under oath, that he is of a certain age—over 21 years of age—that he is not nearer of kin to Nancy Jones than second cousin, and that she is over 18 years of age. And thereupon the clerk issues the license, the minister solemnizes the marriage, he makes his return of the marriage, the groom and his bonny bride go off on their honeymoon, and everybody is happy.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. You also stop the stepfather and stepmother from being married.

Mr. HULICK. I want seriously to ask this House whether we should leave on the statute books for the District of Columbia such a law, passed by the legislature of Maryland in 1777, over a hundred years ago? Would you leave such provisions, so ridiculously absurd, upon the statute books, and have this Congress say that such laws are needed for the people of the District of Columbia?

Now, my amendment provides for the repeal of that antiquated section of the statute, and fixes in one sentence that no one shall be married in the District of Columbia that is nearer related than second cousins.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would ask the gentleman whether, in view of the very diverse expressions of opinion that have been had on this bill, it would not be better to let it go over until the next District day, and then we can consider it.

Mr. HULICK. I do not know whether it would or not. I am not prepared to speak in behalf of the committee. I think that we ought to fully and seriously consider this important matter; and if when we get through with a consideration of all the provisions of the bill it is thought advisable to let it go over, it will be all right.

Mr. TRACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman what particular occasion there is for the passage of this bill. Has there ever been any trouble about being married or given in marriage in this District?

Mr. HULICK. Oh, yes; there is very much embarrassment under the statutes that are now in force relating to marriage.

Mr. TRACEY. I do not want to talk about the statutes, but I want to know what is the trouble about the existing law.

Mr. HULICK. I want to answer the question of the gentleman. It provides for the repeal of other sections of the statute that cause doubt.

Mr. TRACEY. I do not want the point I made lost sight of. The question is, Has there ever been any trouble in marrying or of people being married or given in marriage under the existing law? That is the question.

Mr. HULICK. No serious trouble, I apprehend, for when a marriage is consummated the common law would come in and legalize them. Another statute is proposed to be repealed that has caused some embarrassment. It is this:

SEC. 4. The rites of marriage between any white persons, subjects or inhabitants of this District (State) shall not be celebrated by any person within this District (State) unless by ministers of the Church of England, ministers dissenting from that church, or Romish priests, etc.

Now, there are Romish priests in this District that can solemnize marriages, and there are ministers dissenting from the Church of England that can solemnize marriages under that section, but Methodist and Presbyterian and other ministers can not under that section, and therefore I want it repealed.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will permit an answer right there, I will give it to him.

Mr. HULICK. If ministers belong to the Church of England they can solemnize marriage under that section. The gentleman from New Hampshire may tell you that other persons have solemnized marriages in the District since the compilation of this statute. And that is true, I admit.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will look at section 718 of the Revised Statutes of the District he will find that there was an act passed June 7, 1870, and that says that every minister of the gospel appointed or ordained according to the rites of his church as a minister of his church, whether his residence be in the District or elsewhere in the United States, may perform the marriage ceremony where the parties have been licensed. Now, what is the use of talking about Romish priests?

Mr. HULICK. I was just going to say that there is a statute authorizing ministers of the gospel to solemnize marriages. The section that I am calling your attention to never has been repealed; and under that law none but "ministers of the Church of England, dissenters from that church, and Romish priests" can solemnize marriages. An amendment is offered to repeal that statute.

Mr. TRACEY. Does not that repeal it by implication?

Mr. HULICK. We must not make laws by implication and leave the matter for the courts to construe. It is the duty of the legislator to make it so plain that "he who reads may run," and not leave it to the courts to construe.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. You ought to have it that he who marries must run.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Will you permit me a question?

Mr. HULICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. If your amendment should be adopted and the bill become a law, would it not be impossible for a male to marry at all, under any circumstances, if he were under the age of 18 years, or a female if she were under the age of 16 years, however pressing the necessity? [Laughter.] Could such a marriage be celebrated under your amendment?

Mr. HULICK. No, sir; it would be illegal. It is the opinion of the committee that there should be a limit, and if a young man is not over 18 years of age it is the opinion of the committee he should not be permitted by law to marry, and if this bill should be adopted with my amendment he can not get a license from the clerk, and of course could not get married according to law in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MILNES. He can not under the bill.

Mr. HULICK. Under my amendment a female under 16 years of age can not be married, and we think there should be a limit. My amendment fixes it by declaring by law who shall be married in the District of Columbia. We have reason and history and everything that contributes to the formation of opinion on the question of marriage that would indicate that 16 and 18 years of age, respectively, are low enough to authorize people to enter the marriage relation. Now, if the members of this House think differently, if they have any reason to say that it is too high or too low, then I would be pleased to hear their suggestion and the reasons therefor.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to lay this aside and take up some public business?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has charge of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. As soon as the gentleman yields the floor I will just say one word.

Mr. HULICK. I will yield to you for you to say a word, but I do not propose to yield the floor.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I was simply going to say——

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, would a motion to recommit this bill be in order?

The SPEAKER. Not while the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK] has the floor.

Mr. SPALDING. I understand that he has yielded the floor.

Mr. HULICK. No, sir; I have not yielded except for a moment to another member of the committee [Mr. CURTIS of Iowa] to say a word.

Mr. SPALDING. How long has the gentleman from Ohio a right to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has about fifty minutes remaining. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Speaker, there are two other amendments that must necessarily be adopted if this bill is to be perfected.

Mr. TALBERT. Let me ask the gentleman whether a demand has come from the citizens of the District of Columbia for the enactment of this bill?

Mr. HULICK. Oh, yes; and from all the ministers. The sections to be repealed imposed a penalty of £500 current money ($1,333⅓) for improperly solemnizing marriage, and for other violations of the law.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is that too high a penalty for so grave an offense?

Mr. HULICK. Well, Solomon told me a long time ago how to answer such foolish questions—according to their folly; certainly no other member in this House would say that such a penalty should remain in the law. Mr. Speaker, I now call attention to sections 721 and 722. This bill does not repeal these sections. Section 721 provides that—

> The clerk shall provide a record book of his office, consisting of licenses in the form prescribed in the preceding section, printed in blank, one of which he shall fill up with the names of the parties for whose union any license has been issued, and beneath it shall be printed a certificate to be made by the minister who solemnized the marriage.

Now, you provide in this bill for a record to be kept without repealing the old section, that provides also for a record to be kept by the clerk.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. We repeal that by the repeal of section 16 of the compiled statutes now in force in the District of Columbia, and we repeal section 722 also.

Mr. HULICK. But section 16 in the compilation is not the section of the Revised Statutes. Here is a compilation that has no more binding force than if the gentleman himself had compiled it. It is sections 721 and 722 of the Revised Statutes that should be repealed, because that is the law controlling this matter. However, that is an amendment that can be adopted without controversy later on.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no further suggestions to make except that, having stated that the most important amendment is the first one, if that be adopted the others must necessarily follow. Whether this bill should be disposed of at this time I do not know. Perhaps it would be better to have it recommitted, because this is a very important matter, and the sections are not properly numbered. On the whole, I think the bill should be recommitted to the committee for further consideration. I do not wish to move to recommit it without consulting the chairman of the committee and others of the committee, but I think the suggestion is a good one, because the bill in its present form is very imperfect and unsatisfactory.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I desire to know when a motion to recommit the bill to another committee will be in order—whether after the amendments are voted upon or before?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that motion would be in order after the third reading of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say one word with respect to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumed, in answering the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] intended to move the previous question. If the previous question is ordered, then at any time after the bill is ordered to a third reading the motion indicated by the gentleman from New York will be in order.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Some amendments have already been offered. Will other amendments be in order?

The SPEAKER. Not if the previous question is ordered. That will cut off amendments.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I have the floor, I believe, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK] was considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia at considerable length, but they were unable to agree to report it to the House, for the reason that they believed it decidedly unwise to recommend a law which would make it impossible for persons to marry under any circumstances, no matter what conditions might arise, if they were under the ages of 18 and 16 respectively.

Mr. LACEY. One question in this connection: In cases of seduction, where ordinarily marriages are encouraged, how will this proposed bill operate?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. It is provided that persons under the ages of 21 and 18, respectively, may marry with the consent of parents or guardians; and I suppose that without such consent such a marriage under the common law would not perhaps be invalid.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to say anything further on the subject, and will merely call for the previous question on the amendments and the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks the previous question, as the Chair understands, on the amendments and on the bill to its passage.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 49, noes 12.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. No quorum.

The SPEAKER (after counting the House). There are 98 members present—no quorum.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 14, 1896.

The Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, we come into Thy presence with joy and thanksgiving, as we commemorate the birthday of Thy venerable servant, the senior Senator from Vermont. We bless Thee that Thou hast brought him to his eighty-sixth birthday hale in body, clear, sound, and vigorous in intellect, happy in his family, in the warm and loving esteem of his brothers of the Senate, the people of his own State, and his fellow-citizens throughout this broad land.

We bless Thee, too, for his memorable service in the two Houses of Congress through this long stretch of years, for his noble and eminent service in behalf of the honor, safety, and welfare of our country, and we humbly pray Thee to spare him to us yet many years. And grant him, when the end of life shall come, to pass hence with a conscience void of offense, full of love to God as his life has been full of love to his fellow-men. We humbly pray, through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The VICE-PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the prayer delivered by the Chaplain this morning be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the petition of Rev. J. E. Rankin, D. D., LL. D., president of Howard University, Washington, D. C., praying that the annual appropriations for the support of that university be considered favorably by the Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of Great Bridge Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Norfolk, Va., praying for the publication of the records and papers of the Continental Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BURROWS presented a petition of the board of reference and control of the World's Columbian Commission; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

At a meeting of the board of reference and control of the World's Columbian Commission held in Washington, D. C., on the 15th day of February, A. D. 1896, a committee consisting of the president of the Commission and Commissioners P. H. Lannan, of Utah; O. V. Tousley, of Minnesota, and J. W. St. Clair, of West Virginia, were appointed a committee to present the following preamble and resolutions to the Committee on Appropriations in the two Houses of Congress and urge upon them the adoption of the suggestions therein contained:

"Whereas section 13 of the act of Congress approved July 25, 1890, entitled 'An act providing for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by holding an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and products of the soil, mines, and sea, in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois,' provides—

"'That it shall be the duty of the Commission to make report from time to time to the President of the United States of the progress of the work, and in a final report present a full exhibit of the results of the exposition'; and

"Whereas the World's Columbian Commission, created by said act of Congress, in order to secure in a proper and economic way the preparation of said final report on the 19th day of October, 1893, adopted the following:

"'Whereas under the provisions of section 13 of the act of Congress it is provided that the Commission shall make a final report to the President of the United States, in which shall be presented a full exhibit of the results of the Exposition, and in order to secure the preparation of said report in the most economic and comprehensive manner,

"'Resolved, That a special committee to consist of eight commissioners is hereby created of which the President shall be a member and chairman thereof, and the seven remaining members shall be appointed by the President, which committee, when so appointed, shall proceed to prepare for submission to this Commission for its final authoritative action the said final report referred to in section 13 of the said act of Congress.

"'Resolved, That all resolutions or orders of this Commission, in so far as they may conflict with the provisions of the foregoing resolution, are hereby repealed;' and

"Whereas on the authority of said committee on final report, a subcommittee thereof has already prepared so much of said final report as could be done without the transmission of the report of the various departments of the Exposition, and more especially that of the Director-General and the committee on awards; and

"Whereas the committee on awards has now finished its work and transmitted to the president of the Commission its report, and the Secretary of the Treasury has now about completed the medals and diplomas to be delivered to the exhibitors at the World's Columbian Exposition, and has been authorized and instructed by this board to make delivery thereof to the parties entitled thereto; and

"Whereas the World's Columbian Commission on the 3d day of November, 1893, adopted the following:

"'Whereas it is essential to the proper preparation of the final report of the result of the Exposition that the official reports of the various departments and agencies should be prepared as speedily as possible, so that the special committee charged with the duty of preparing and submitting such final report for the consideration of the Commission may have access thereto: Therefore

"'Resolved, That when and as such official reports shall be completed they shall be immediately delivered to the president of the Commission and by him submitted to the said special committee; and further, that all officers whose duty it is to make such official reports be enjoined to discharge this duty as promptly as practicable,' which was a direction to the Director-General and all chiefs of departments and other subordinate officers of the Commission to transmit to said committee on final report the final reports to be made by them, respectively; nevertheless, the said Director-General has up to this time failed to deliver to said committee his report, which necessarily incorporates the reports of the heads of all the departments of the Exposition, but, as this board is informed, has filed the same with the Congress of the United States; and

"Whereas the Senate of the United States has, by an amendment to the urgent deficiency bill now pending in Congress, provided that the 'entire compensation of the Director-General for the work of preparing his final report and for all sums expended or paid out by him upon such work, and for any sums due under agreements or contracts for assistants for such work: provided that the original typewritten or written manuscript of such work * * * all illustrations, diagrams, and plans incorporated in such work, and all plates and negatives of photographs taken therefor in the hands of the Director-General, shall be by him deposited with the Joint Committee on Printing,' which amendment, if concurred in by the House of Representatives, places said report beyond the control of this board or said committee on final report; and

"Whereas by an act of Congress approved August 18, 1894, an appropriation was made in amount and for the purpose, as follows:

"'To enable the committee on final report to arrange the reports of the various departments and prepare a synopsis of the same, $3,500, or so much as may be necessary, to be expended in the discretion of the committee; and said reports with synopsis, including index in each volume, shall not exceed ten quarto folios in all, or not exceeding 1,000 pages each;' and

"Whereas this board has taken the necessary action to finish the work of preparation of said final report as indicated by said last-mentioned act: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, memorialized and petitioned to direct and require said report of the Director-General and any and all reports which may be transmitted to the Congress and which should be properly transmitted to the president of the World's Columbian Commission to be transmitted to the president of the World's Columbian Commission, to the end that the same or so much thereof as may be necessary may be incorporated into the final report, which will be completed on the 15th day of October, 1896, and which will state, as required by section 13 of said act of Congress, the results of said exposition.

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this board that the Director-General shall be paid the sum charged by him for his services, including all the expenses incident thereto, in the preparation of said report, and it respectfully requests an appropriation to be made to pay the same."

Your petitioners would respectfully call attention to paragraphs marked on margin, respectively, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and ask consideration of the same.

In such case your petitioners believe that your honorable body will come to the conclusion that the logical method to be pursued will be that the reports of the president of the Commission, the secretary, the Director-General, the committee on awards, and the president of the board of lady managers should be made to the World's Columbian Commission, as they are all creatures of that body, and that the Commission should transmit the same to the President of the United States, in accordance with the act of 1890.

It seems to your committee that this is the only way to comply with the mandates of the law, with the legislation of the World's Columbian Commission, an agent of your own creation, and the only method by which a report worthy of the World's Columbian Commission can be made.

Any conditions, limitations, or restrictions your honorable body may see fit to impose will be observed by your petitioners.

Your petitioners would call attention to the fact that at the meeting of the board of reference and control above mentioned there were present seven out of the eight members of the Commission of which the said board is composed, and that said board will meet again on November 15, 1896, for the purpose of reviewing the several reports and ordering their transmission to the President of the United States.

The World's Columbian Commission does not expire until A. D. 1898.

The greater part of the appropriation of 1894 for the work of the committee on final report is yet unexpended, necessitating a small appropriation, if any, for the completion of the work.

I have the honor to be, for the committee, very respectfully,

T. W. PALMER,
Chairman and President of the World's Columbian Commission.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of Rev. Henry Branch, D. D., president, and Rev. W. G. Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of Erie Council, No. 92, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Huron, Ohio, remonstrating against the appropriation of money for sectarian institutions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the senate and house of representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in general court assembled, request the Senators and Representatives from this Commonwealth in the Congress of the United States to use their influence to induce the United States Government to take up the work and carry it on to completion or to secure from Congress a liberal appropriation to assist this Commonwealth in defraying the necessary expenses of the work.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, properly attested, be transmitted by the secretary of the Commonwealth to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

NATIONAL DEFENSES.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I desire to call up the bill (S. 1159) to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses, for the purpose of submitting some remarks thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill indicated by the Senator from Washington, upon which he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, what are our ideals as a nation? What is our own conception of our character and destiny? We are for peace. Are we for peace at any price? We are for independence. Are we for independence without taking steps to maintain that independence? We are for progress and advancement of the interests, not only of our own people, but of all mankind. We are full of sympathy for the oppressed and downtrodden in every part of the civilized world. We are for the "Monroe doctrine"—for the preservation of the soil inviolate from European aggression on both the American continents. Are we willing to support our belief in the "Monroe doctrine" by something more than empty declarations, which are "as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals"? Again, we are for economy in expenditures. Are we for that false economy that takes no proper thought of to-morrow and makes no provision against the greatest possible risks to our safety, dignity, and peace as a nation?

What an absurd spectacle has the Congress of the United States presented during the present session by its persistent talk in favor of the intervention by the United States in behalf of Cuba and Venezuela. How cheap is all this talk, sincere though it may be on many occasions. Every man who has informed himself on the subject of national defenses knows that as a nation we are not in condition to undertake war or suffer war. It is the very last thing we can undertake or suffer in our present condition, because it will certainly bring the greatest loss and humiliation. Our courage and numbers would not avail, and it is folly to depend upon the resources and inventions of the hour. We can talk loud and long and profess sympathy, pass resolutions, and make believe to ourselves that we are actually taking a hand in the diplomatic affairs and international questions of great moment; but those who are not self-deceived by egotistical glamour and who know the facts are perfectly aware of the painful truth that all this demonstration is mere talk and bluster and vapid sentiment, or, at most, it is a sympathy that is easily satisfied with merely verbal expressions. Not that the great body of the American people understand it so; they are not acquainted with the facts as to our absolute inability to maintain a high, dignified, honorable, intelligent stand upon a great international argument in case we should be pressed by the threat of war, the last argument of kings.

The people are cherishing the ideals of which I have spoken. They do not know how shamefully their interests are being bandied and played with by those who represent them in the Halls of Congress. They suppose, in the simplicity of their hearts, that we are prepared to protect ourselves in case of war with any of the second or third class powers, or even against a first-rate power. They know that the nation has millions of brave and patriotic men who would gather at the call to arms. But they do not know that there is no means of arming these hosts upon the emergency that may arise. They do not know that the great seacoast cities, through which extend the arteries of trade and commerce with each other and with the people of foreign lands—populous though these cities may be, and teeming with wealth—are yet exposed and defenseless against attack by foreign navies with vessels far outnumbering ours in strength. The people do not know that their commerce can be so easily ruined. They do not know that our Navy itself may be hopelessly crippled by the destruction of our undefended navy-yards, depots of supplies, dock yards, powder mills, and arsenals.

If the people understood these facts as they exist they would say, "Stop building ships—as you do not mean to protect our cities, dockyards, and bases of supplies, it is folly to spend so much money upon the Navy." If they knew the hollowness of our talk the people would cry out for shame at this travesty upon the maintenance of the "Monroe doctrine and the intervention for Cuban independence." I have no patience with the discussion that has been going on, so devoid of practical benefit to anyone. It has not only operated to make us ridiculous in the eyes of those who are well informed, but it has brought ruin and financial embarrassment upon thousands and thousands of people who have lost millions of dollars in consequence of this agitation in Congress. Nay, more, it has held out false and elusive hopes to people beyond the seas—hope of relief and assistance never to be realized in the very nature of things. It is keeping the word of promise to the ear to break it to the hope, and thus bringing untold misery upon hundreds of thousands who look to America for help in the time of their struggles with tyranny and bloody wrong. Whether all this is merely politics I know not; but it seems to me exceedingly wicked and useless. If we are in earnest and mean what we say let us show our purpose by our deeds, by preparation of a wise, prudent, and ample character to enable us to be consistent and to make good our professions.

PRESENT CONDITION OF COAST DEFENSES.

Now, what is our condition as to national defenses? How that appears to the average Englishman may be learned in the following passage from Rudyard Kipling's American Notes:

The big, fat Republic that is afraid of nothing because nothing up to the present date has happened to make her afraid is as unprotected as a jellyfish. Not internally, of course—it would be madness for any power to throw men into America; they would die—but as far as regards coast defense, from 5 miles out at sea a ship of the power of Her Majesty's ship Collingwood would wipe out every town from San Francisco to Long Branch; and three first-class ironclads would account for New York, Bartholdi's Statue, and all.

Reflect on this: 'Twould be "pay up or go up" 'round the entire coast of the United States.

The Committee on Coast Defenses received statements from the Major-General Commanding the Army, from a distinguished admiral of the Navy, from the Chief of Engineers, who has charge of the land defenses of the United States, and from the Chief of Ordnance, who has charge of the construction of the modern high-power guns and the appliances wherewith they are handled. The evidence has all gone to show that the condition of our seacoast defenses is lamentable in the extreme. The defensive works are of a character incapable of resisting modern artillery. The guns are of obsolete pattern, of very little value for service, except, perhaps, for that of a subsidiary character, but in no way fit to engage with the great armor-clad vessels of modern times and their powerful armament. The evidence is overwhelming that in case of war our whole people would suffer immeasurably; not only as to the cities on the seacoast, but as to the entire country by reason of the interruption of commerce. The evidence is also plain that several years will be required to procure the guns for the necessary armament for the fortifications on our coasts, and we are not only taking the risk for the present time but for at least eight years ahead by our failure to inaugurate this work on a suitable scale.

From such investigation as has been practicable it is evident that a large amount of destructible property, estimated at not less than $10,000,000,000 in value, is exposed to attack or at least to heavy assessment for the purpose of securing immunity from destruction. The president of the Chamber of Commerce of New York has informed me that he has given careful attention to the question of the property risks that would at present be sustained in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City. He has consulted with many of his colleagues in the great business institutions of New York and he estimates that property valued at $4,000,000,000 in those cities is subject to destruction or to the imposition of a ransom in case of capture of the port of New York by a hostile fleet. Ten per cent on that amount would not be an unreasonable tax by an enemy. The seacoast cities largely represent the wealth of the nation. They exist not for themselves alone but for the entire country that finds in them its centers of exchange. The prudence which provides for individual and collective safety by the institution and maintenance of fire departments, police protection, national guards, prisons, and hospitals, besides the premiums paid for insurance, would consistently require that provision be made for protection against invasion by a hostile fleet.

Coast defenses—

Says a distinguished military writer—

using the word in the proper sense, may be divided into two distinct elements, namely: First, the means adopted to deny certain waters to an enemy's vessels; second, the resources, men, organization, supplies, and land fortifications, temporary and permanent, available to resist the attack of forces landed outside the zone of protected water.

It is with the first of these elements we now have to deal. First, because greater interests are involved in a sudden blow easily administered by a hostile fleet, and, second, because greater time is required to make suitable preparation for resistance. What do we depend upon as to the first? We have a fairly good navy and eth advantage of the great distance to be traversed by a foreign eflet to reach our shores, which is a principal element of strength in our favor as to all possible foreign foes excepting one nation. England has great fortified bases of supplies in our immediate vicinity, on both the Pacific and Atiantic oceans. That is, she has the coal supply which is absolutely essential for naval operations.

In the first place, as to the size of our Navy, that has already been discussed by the Senator from Vermont; but it may not be amiss for me in passing to present briefly the comparison of the navies of the world with our own, as brought out before the Committee on Coast Defenses, especially in comparing our Navy with that of Great Britain. It was stated that we were sixth; but Admiral Walker afterwards qualified this statement by saying that the navies of Spain and Holland, in some respects, were superior to ours, taking into consideration the number of men and the torpedo boats, the latter being an important arm of the modern naval service. The Secretary of the Navy has presented in his annual report some very instructive tables showing the general condition of foreign navies and their building programmes.

As to the comparison of our Navy with that of England, I present a very excellent résumé, which Admiral Walker in his statement to the committee said was practically correct. The article containing this in the Scientific American is so good that I venture to incorporate the whole of it in my remarks:

THE NAVAL RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE BRITISH EMPIRE—A COMPARISON.

Capt. A. Mahan, of the United States Navy, has pointed out in his celebrated work on the influence of sea power in history, that a preponderance of naval power has been the controlling element which has ultimately brought victory to the nation that possessed it. His conclusions are largely based upon the European wars of the time of Nelson and the late civil war in America.

In view of recent startling and ominous developments in the diplomatic relations of this country and Great Britain, it will be, we think, timely and interesting to inquire into the present status of the navies of the two countries, and also to inquire as to what are the battle-ship building resources possessed by each. It should be noted that in the subjoined tables no account is taken of ships that possess a speed of less than 7½ knots per hour or that are armed with obsolete smooth-bore guns. Ships that are building, but within measurable distance of completion—such, for instance, as the Iowa—are included in the following tabulation:

First-class battle ships of the line.

Country.	Total number of ships.	Average displacement.	Average speed.	Belt armor.	Total displacement.
		Tons.	Knots.	Inches.	Tons.
United States	4	10,568	16.42	18	42,274
Great Britain	29	13,000	17.47	18	376,900
Second-class battle ships.
United States	3	5,703	16.7	12	17,110
Great Britain	12	9,502	13.63	14 to 24	114,030
Third-class battle ships.
United States	5	4,404	11.9	7 to 12	22,020
Great Britain	11	7,075	13.43	8 to 12	77,820

Coast-defense battle ships.

United States: The 6-knot boats, armed with smoothbore guns, are reckoned as obsolete.

Great Britain: 13 ships; 4,040 tons; 11 knots; 8 to 12 inches; 52,530 tons.

Total battle ships of all classes.

United States: 12 ships, with a total displacement of 81,404 tons.

Great Britain: 65 ships, with a total displacement of 621,280 tons.

In estimating the relative strength of the two navies from the above table it must be borne in mind that the basis for comparison should be the total displacement rather than the total number of ships. Displacement is the capital which the naval designer has to go upon; and if he make a judicious distribution of weights he will always produce the more effective fighting machine out of the bigger ship. If a 10,000-ton and a 15,000-ton ship carry the same armament, the larger vessel will carry that armament more steadily, more speedily, with greater command, and, owing to the wider separation of the individual gun stations, with less exposure to disablement of guns and crew. Estimated on this basis, Great Britain possesses a superiority of fighting power in first-class ships of the line of 9 to 1. In battle ships of all classes the superiority is 7½ to 1.

First-class armored and protected cruisers.

Great Britain	34	841	19	28,580

Total cruisers of all classes.

United States: 31 ships, with a total displacement of 99,421 tons.

Great Britain: 143 ships, with a total displacement of 536,725 tons.

Estimated, as before, on the basis of displacement, this table shows a preponderance for Great Britain in cruisers of 5½ to 1.

Of merchant steamers which are built to meet the naval requirements for conversion into cruisers, the United States have 4 and Great Britain 26.

Torpedo-boat destroyers built and building.

	Number.	Displacement.	Speed.
		Tons.	Knots.
United States
Great Britain	62	250	28

Torpedo boats.

United States	10
Great Britain	166

By displacement the preponderance in torpedo boats is 40 to 1.

Summing up the totals for battle ships and cruisers combined, we get:

United States: 43 ships, with a total displacement of 180,825 tons.

Great Britain: 208 ships, with a total displacement of 1,158,005 tons.

Which shows Great Britain to possess a superiority in fighting ships of all descriptions of 6 4/5 to 1.

In the event of a war with that country, these are the odds against which we should have to contend at the outset.

As against this unpromising opening it will be urged that we are a resourceful and energetic people, and that we should quickly create a navy. To this it must be answered that modern navies are of slow growth—they are not created. The modern battle ship, costly and intricate, puts a heavy discount upon mere resourcefulness and energy, of which we have abundance, and a heavy premium upon gun, ship, and armor building plant, of which, for the magnitude of the task in hand, we should find that we possessed an altogether inadequate supply. With every factory, mill, and shipyard working at full blast, it would take from seven to ten years to cancel that preponderance of 6 4/5 to 1.

There is no sentiment in statistics.

It is certain, moreover, that Great Britain would steadily add to her fleets as the war progressed; and with her great shipbuilding facilities she could float six ships to our one, as the following facts will show: In reply to inquiries instituted by the British Admiralty last year to ascertain the extreme war-ship building capacity of the private yards, it was found that if these firms were given a free hand as to the details of the designs they could build another navy equal in fighting strength to the whole existing British navy in from two to three years. To this must be added the building capacity of the Government dockyards and shops. The astounding resources revealed by this investigation call for no elaboration on our part to show that Great Britain could rapidly increase her preponderance of naval strength if challenged to do so.

The fact that European diplomats seem disposed to take the British view of the question at issue makes it highly probable that in the event of hostilities we should have to engage this colossal navy, with the power of reduplication which lies behind it, unaided.

Incidentally, in closing, we would remark that the ink is scarce dry upon the paper in which our General-in-Chief, Nelson Miles, has just told us that the very opening of hostilities with a great naval power would see every seacoast city on the Atlantic and Pacific subject either to the humiliation of an indemnity or to the horrors of bombardment.

In making the foregoing comparison it is assumed that the United States would not submit to a conflict merely defensive; that her enterprise would soon cause the field of naval operation to become conterminous with the shore lines of both hemispheres. The estimate consequently assumes that the total force of both fleets would be available.

In this connection I present a statement of all the steel vessels in the American Navy, showing their character, tonnage, cost, speed, and their battery. This list includes all that are authorized by law, as well as those already constructed. Several years will be required to complete them.

This list does not include the cost of armaments of the ships, which would nearly equal the cost of the ships without armaments. Thus we see in detail the extent to which the United States has already committed itself on the question of new naval construction.

Now, after all this outlay and authorization up to date, without counting the outlay proposed by the bill recently reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, what is our situation as compared with the other great naval powers of the world?

I have examined a book that has recently been issued, entitled The Naval Pocket Book, by W. Laird Clowes, in which the author, who is deemed reliable, as I learn at the Navy Department, presents a comparative summary of the fleets of the world, dividing the vessels according to their strength to resist and their power to attack.

The New York World of April 8, under the head of "Naval fighting strength," referring to the same book, gives the substance of these data as follows:

Those "for lines of battle" are divided into five classes:

Country.	A.	B.	C.	D.	F.	Total.
Great Britain	29	12	11	5	18	75
France	15	4	5	12	13	49
Russia	14	4	0	7	14	39
Germany	6	7	3	8	7	31
Italy	8	2	0	7	8	25
United States	6	0	1	6	3	16
Turkey	1	1	7	6	0	15
Spain	1	0	2	0	8	11

These are the real fighting vessels, including three classes of battle ships (A, B, and C), seagoing coast-defense ironclads (D), and armored cruisers (F), that could fight against battle ships. Only its armored cruisers put the United States ahead of Turkey, to which it is inferior in battle ships. The summary includes not only all vessels built or building, but all projected to February 1, since which time the British Government has ordered an addition of 11 to its present fleet of 75.

For the protection or destruction of commerce, "scouting and looking out," which will be the chief work of the cruisers, the United States is not quite so badly off. There are six classes, according to size and weight of guns, of which G, H, and J are protected by some armor, K partially protected, and I and L unprotected.

Country.	G.	H.	I.	J.	K.	L.	Total.
Great Britain	17	46	11	22	27	3	126
France	5	18	6	18	0	14	61

For coast defense Great Britain leads, with 53 vessels; Holland has 52, Russia 33, France 28, Sweden 23, China 16, Norway 16, Germany 13, United States 13, and Spain 12.

This summary is believed to be the most favorable to the United States that can be made from the records, and still it shows this country to be far behind the great nations of the world in naval strength. Moreover, it leaves out of sight our deficiency in torpedo boats and torpedo-boat destroyers, of which latter we have to-day only one small vessel in commission, whereas Great Britain has 131, Germany 116, France 108, Italy 106, Russia 78, and even Spain has 36, torpedo vessels; all in the list I have given being 115 feet in length and over. Sixty-two of the British vessels are torpedo-boat destroyers, having superior tonnage and speed.

RELATIVE ECONOMY—COST OF OUR NEW NAVY.

The question naturally arises as to the relative efficiency and economy of land defenses and ships of war. Our people have shown their disposition not to neglect the Navy. They have bestowed upon it generous appropriations, as follows:

Appropriations for "Increase of the Navy."

Fiscal year—
1886	$1,895,000
1887	3,595,861
1888	11,098,362
1889	5,760,000
1890	7,230,000
1891	9,120,000
1892	16,607,000
1893	9,460,000
1894	7,125,000
1895	9,955,025
1896	13,327,521
Total	95,173,769
If to this amount there be added the cost of the Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and Dolphin, authorized by the act of March 3, 1883	2,440,000
The total becomes	97,613,769

The appropriations for "Increase of the Navy" have aggregated $95,173,769, which amount includes all the appropriations made for the fiscal year 1886 to that for the fiscal year 1897. This sum has therefore been expended during eleven years in the armament and construction of the ships of our new Navy. If we also take into consideration the sums which have previously been spent in rebuilding the double-turret monitors, the total amount spent in forming the fleets of steel war vessels will exceed $100,000,000. The battle ships Kearsarge and Kentucky have also been contracted for, and an additional $10,000,000 will be required to put these vessels in commission.

The several Congresses have therefore averaged an authorization of $10,000,000 per year in building up our Navy. The question naturally suggests itself: What have we to show for this expenditure in the shape of ships which could be of service in the defense of our coast or seaports? We have, of course, cruisers and gunboats, which may do great injury to the enemy's commerce, but these ships, with little armor, will play a very unimportant part in the defense of our harbors.

At the present time we have actually ready for service 1 battle ship (Indiana), 2 armored cruisers (Maine and New York), 5 monitors (Monterey, Amphitrite, Miantonomoh, Terror, and Monadnoc), and 1 ram (Katahdin). These ships mount 4 13-inch, 2 12-inch, 16 10-inch, and 10 8-inch guns, or 32 armor-piercing guns in 8 ships. When all the vessels now building shall have been completed, we shall have afloat in armored ships 20 13-inch, 12 12-inch, 20 10-inch, and 42 8-inch guns.

These 94 guns will be distributed in 16 ships. In other words, each gun that we have afloat in an armored vessel of and above a caliber of 8 inches represents an expenditure of $1,000,000. This is merely the expenditure to place the guns afloat.

This startling fact shows that if we regard the Navy as a shield it is the most expensive fortification and defense that even a military man, who takes no account of cost, can conceive of.

The expense of maintaining one of these floating forts in commission is very great, the last report of the Secretary of the Navy showing (page 446) an expenditure of $438,101 during the year ended June 30, 1895, for the lightest armed and armored of the ships I have considered, the armored cruiser New York. Probably the annual expense of each battle ship in commission will not be less than $500,000 a year.

As a weapon the Navy is more useful, for in considering its power of offense we should then take into consideration the usefulness of the gunboats and the cruisers.

There is such a wide diversity of opinion in regard to the efficiency of torpedo boats that I have not considered them in connection with the armored vessels. Personally I believe in their usefulness and fully indorse a statement made to me to-day by a high naval authority, that we ought to have 100 of these vessels to render our present and prospective Navy efficient in accordance with modern developments. In this line of construction foreign governments have made wonderful progress, and have gone on increasing the size of their boats until they now build no more small ones, but confine themselves almost exclusively to what are called "torpedo-boat destroyers," the latest types of which in the British navy are of about 300 tons displacement and have a speed of as much as 31 knots.

Battle ships are believed to be a necessity despite their great cost, for we must be prepared to take advantage of any circumstance which would permit us to overcome the enemy before he reaches our coast. We need more of them to maintain with dignity our national honor and our proper place among the great nations; but we must not forget that not only will the depreciation of guns and their mounts be greater when placed on one of these floating bases, but that the repairs to the ships themselves will be very great. The cost of maintaining a proper system of coast fortifications will be far less than is now annually spent in maintaining our small Navy.

The guns mounted on floating fortresses have the gear connected with the gun carriages almost incessantly under repair. At times these guns will be far from home; those mounted in our fortifications will always be at hand for a defense to the country. As a shield, the expenditure of $100,000,000 upon coast defenses will be worth five times the amount of money spent in ships.

It may be asked, Why does England spend such an enormous amount upon her fleets? The answer is plain. Because she has distant colonies to defend, and it may be necessary for her to attack an enemy in almost any portion of the globe. It is therefore essential to that nation that she provide herself with a weapon rather than with a shield. On the other hand, it has been the policy of America not to enter upon any colonial acquisitions, and public sentiment has justified large expenditures for defensive purposes, while the appropriation of large sums for anticipated aggressive work has never been commended.

The suggestion to defend our coasts and seaport cities by fleets is impracticable, for it will require expenditures running up into several hundred million dollars to do the work effectively.

The Navy is designed for aggressive operations. To retain its mobility and its power to make offensive return it should not be fettered to our great cities for the purpose of protecting them.

Before continuing indefinitely to spend great sums upon our

Navy, it is essential that the strategists and the various construction boards should settle upon some definite line of policy and determine the value for offensive and defensive purposes of the various classes of vessels.

The usefulness of the armored cruiser is yet an undetermined question, and her right employment has not yet been satisfactorily settled.

Admiral Jouett commends the building of vessels of the monitor type for coast defense pure and simple. Other authorities see very little merit in this class of ships. Admiral Ammen is a distinguished advocate of the usefulness of the ram.

Then, again, the question of homogeneity of construction of vessels must be determined before we should enter upon a great naval policy. All these undetermined questions make the building up of our Navy expensive. While they are being solved our coast should at least be placed in a condition of safety, particularly as the cost is but a fraction of 1 per cent of the injury that could be inflicted by a foreign foe, being only one-tenth of 1 per cent, annually, for eight years, upon the destructible property directly exposed at the ports.

The vessels authorized or proposed to be authorized by Congress during the month will cost not less than $25,000,000. Before the end of the year we shall therefore have provided for $135,000,000 worth of ships, but this does not include all the sums which will be required to carry out the policy outlined in the construction of these fleets. Besides all the private or commercial shipyards and dry docks, we have now eleven United States navy docks, at eight different places, viz: Portsmouth, N. H.; Boston, New York, Philadelphia Norfolk, Port Royal, San Francisco, and Puget Sound. It is vitally important that these docks be protected. But these docks are not sufficient for military purposes. Officers of the Navy state that it will be an imperative necessity to provide eventually for four great stone docks—at Boston, Port Royal, San Francisco, and Puget Sound—for we must be prepared to place these four stations in such condition that each can be made a base of operation for our naval fleets.

Environing these docks must be engineering and repair shops, so that the full measure of usefulness of these great basins can be secured.

At this time it is impossible to tell in detail the military reasons why such docks will be eventually built at the four places I have mentioned, but that they will be constructed within a few years is pronounced a certainty.

A proper system of land defenses is essential to the protection of these additional dock structures and possibly to the ships themselves.

The construction of these four docks, the building of necessary sea walls, the dredging of channels leading to the docks, the establishment of machine and repair shops, and the supplemental small docks for the use of lighter crafts will probably necessitate an expenditure of $20,000,000 more.

The more carefully one inquires into the cost of constructing a fleet for defensive purposes the more amazed he becomes at the enormity of the expenditure.

Our naval service is small compared with what it will eventually be, but I unreservedly declare that the time has now come when the construction of forts and land defenses is of such vital importance that if funds can not be found in any other way the building of ships must be postponed. Reluctantly would I favor such a measure, for I am ready to vote, not only for coast defenses, but for stronger fleets. If the policy of building up the Navy is to be continued at the expense of having defenseless shores, then the time has come when a change of policy must be made. There is no doubt that the money expended for coast defenses will bring a better return in protecting our country than the same amount of money appropriated for ships. At the present time I am more interested in protecting our own shores than I am in providing for a fleet which could operate either in the West Indies or along the coast of South America. In other words, I am more desirous of appropriating money for the protection of this land than I am for expending sums in preparing to attack some one else.

It can not be too strongly insisted upon that, while an adequate appropriation for land defenses now will add many millions to the effective value of our Navy without spending an additional penny on it, by enabling it to operate unhampered by the necessity of coast and harbor defense, the failure to provide these defenses actually invites attack before we are ready to repel it and subjects us to the risk of losing the Navy that we have. It is not to be supposed that foreign countries are looking on undisturbed as we prepare ourselves, like a mighty athlete, to enter the arena and contest with them for the prizes that are in view. They know that every addition to our force brings them nearer to the day when our just claims will be backed by the power to enforce them. There is, therefore, continually present with them the temptation, in the conduct of diplomatic negotiations, to force an issue with us at a time when they may well hope to crush this growing power.

The capture or destruction of only a part of our fleet, the destruction of our docks and our great shipyards (more to be feared than a barbarous bombardment of our cities) will check our progress for many years to come. And to prevent this nothing will answer but well-planned and well-armed fortifications. It is true that it will require eight years, with ample appropriation, to complete such a system in its entirety. But long before the expiration of that time a large part of the work will be done and we will have obtained a very satisfactory degree of protection. With sufficient appropriations now there is no reason why every dock and shipyard should not be perfectly secured before the battle ships about to be provided for will be ready for the sea. Our present position, however, is like that of a man who, with a costly house approaching completion, refuses to insure it until ready for occupancy. The individual position of some of us is worse than that, for it is that of a man who thinks that the nearer his house is ready for occupancy the less need is there to insure it.

CONSISTENCY AS TO OTHER ELEMENTS OF DEFENSE.

Does not consistency require a reasonable appropriation for the land defenses?

Why do we continue to lay stress upon one of the accepted elements of national defense without connecting therewith the one remaining element which is lacking to such a lamentable degree, thus weakening our entire system of defense, which is of necessity correlated, one element depending upon and assisting the other?

This system in its entirety is well established in the policy of our Government from the commencement of its existence down through successive reports of its highest officials, as well of the Navy as of the Army, and of the eminent statesmen who have held the portfolio of the governmental administration. Poinsett, Cass, and Webster have added their weighty words to those of Totten and Bernard, of the Army, and those of Morris and Dupont, of the Navy.

The logical relation of these different elements of defense is practically the same to-day as it was in 1826, when Totten and Bernard made the "revised report of the Board of Engineers on the defense of the seaboard."

If there be any difference, it is more favorable to modern land defenses.

It has been generally admitted by military and naval experts that one gun mounted suitably on shore is equal in efficiency to several guns on ship. General Miles places the proportion of superiority at 1 to 5; Admiral Walker, at 1 to 3. Elevated locations for guns, thick parapets, disappearing gun carriages, and concealed mortar pits give the land force many advantages. Observations can be taken on land at many points clear of smoke and can be communicated instantly by wire to the officer directing the battery. The ship has one advantage in that she can choose her position, but she is a frailer fortification, with more complex elements and more points of exposure. One fortunate shot might sink her. Her capacity for carrying ammunition and supplies is limited, and she is liable to besetment with accidents.

The percentage of destructive hits, disablement of guns, and loss of life is greater on ship. And most important of all is the disinclination of ships to attack well-appointed forts with their modern accessories of torpedo mines and other obstructions to the channels of ports. Thus they dare not attack where torpedo mines such as I propose are efficiently protected by guns. The argument as to fleets and fortifications runs back hundreds, yes, thousands, of years in history.

POLICY OF OUR GOVERNMENT.

It is not my intention to review this argument from the first siege of Syracuse, 414 B. C., under Nicias and Alcibiades down through the stories of Rhodes, Malta, Gibraltar, and, more recently, Sebastopol, Lissa, Drewrys Bluff, Charleston, and Fort Fisher, and still later Alexandria and Port Arthur, all showing that "where the task lies outside of the sphere of purely naval action there will be failure" on the part of fleets—that is, as against fortifications. It is the rather to refer to the fact that under the time-honored policy adopted by our Government there was no antagonism between the two elements of defense. There are admitted to be four elements in all, each considered of great importance: First, the Navy; second, fortifications; third, interior communications by land and water; fourth, the Army and militia.

In the language of the official report of 1826—

> Our system of defense is composed of elements whose numerous reciprocal relations with each other and with the whole constitute its excellence; one element is scarcely more dependent on another than the whole system is on any one. Withdraw the Navy, and the defense becomes merely passive; withdraw interior communications from the system, and the Navy must cease in a measure to be active for want of supplies; and the fortifications can offer but a feeble resistance for want of timely reenforcements; withdraw fortifications, and there remains only a scattered and naked Navy.

Our Government has never receded from the system our fathers adopted. General Grant and Admiral Ammen advocated it. Why do we ignore it in part to-day?

The great leaders of our military and naval thought urge us to push forward the land defenses of our seaboard without delay. Rear-Admiral Jouett agrees with Lieutenant-General Schofield, and Rear-Admiral Walker concurs with Major-General Miles, commanding the Army. They all practically agree that "the relation of fortifications to the Navy is that of a sheltering, succoring power, while the relation of the latter to the former is that of an active and powerful auxiliary, and that the latter ceases to be efficient as a member of the system the moment it becomes passive, and should in no case be relied upon as a substitute for fortifications."

I do not wish it to be supposed that I am opposed to the increase of the Navy. On the contrary, I am in favor of such increase. At present I would not have the fleets less, but I would have the fortifications more, simply because of the lack of the latter—the two go well together, especially for defense. This is well brought out in the following paragraph of the report:

If our Navy be inferior to that of the enemy it can afford, of course, unaided by fortifications, but a feeble resistance, single ships being assailed by whole fleets. If it be equal or superior, having numerous points along an extended frontier to protect, and being unable to concentrate because ignorant of the selected point of attack, every point must be simultaneously guarded. Our separate squadrons may therefore be captured in detail by the concentrated fleet of the attacking power. If we attempt to concentrate under an idea that a favorite object of the enemy is foreseen, he will not fail to push his forces upon the places thus left without protection. This mode of defense is liable to the further objections of being exposed to fatal disasters, although not engaged with an enemy, and of leaving the issue of conflict often to be determined by accident, in spite of all the efforts of courage and skill. If it were attempted to improve upon this mode by adding temporary batteries and fieldworks it would be found that because being weak and inadequate from their nature the most suitable positions for these works must often be neglected under a necessary condition of the plan that the ships themselves be defended. Otherwise, they must either take no part in the contest or be destroyed by the superior adversary.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SQUIRE. With pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator spoke of the increase of the Navy. I desire to inquire of him whether the bill to which he refers contemplates any increase of the Army, and if so, to what extent?

Mr. SQUIRE. I shall be glad to answer that question, although I had not included any reference to it in my remarks. The War Department has made a careful examination of this subject, and the statement has emanated from that Department that the increase in the Army necessary in time of peace for manning all the coast defenses contemplated by the Endicott Board and by the subsequent boards of engineers who have been occupied on this subject, when the entire system shall have been completed, will amount to 70 foot batteries. A foot battery is at present composed of 64 enlisted men and 4 officers, there being 3 lieutenants to a foot battery. In what I now say I refer to the establishment in time of peace. In time of war, of course the number of men and of officers would have to be increased. It is estimated that under such circumstances the full complement would amount to 25,000. It will, however, take us many years to complete these works of defense and to manufacture the necessary guns, so that if we should enter in full upon the work contemplated by the bill now before the Senate the increase immediately in prospect would be very small. I understand that an increase of two regiments of foot batteries would be sufficient for the immediately prospective requirements.

HISTORICAL GROWTH OF OUR SYSTEM.

A glance at the historical development of our coast defenses will show that the question now under consideration does not indicate a new departure, but is a logical step in continuation of the settled policy of this Government since its foundation.

Strictly speaking, it is not a new system of defenses that we are seeking, but an adaptation of the existing system to meet new conditions. It is true that, due to our long delay while these new conditions were being fully determined, so many new constructions are now required as to make the proposed system, by itself considered, practically a new one. But that indicates no change in policy. It only means that we have "skipped" some of the steps in the process of evolution, to the great advantage of the taxpayer. Instead of costly experiments with new machinery before we knew just what work that machinery must perform, we have waited until some of the conditions have settled into comparative permanency or until all probable new conditions can be foreseen and can be anticipated before they occur.

Even if we could suppose the most radical improvements in naval construction to-morrow, it would be many years before the navies of the world would be readapted so as to embody them. But it is now as certain as anything human can be that these improvements will be slowly made and will occur along lines already marked out. They will be in the direction of armor of greater resistance, of guns of greater penetration, and of explosives of higher power. But all of these conditions have been anticipated in the plans upon which we are already working. Our parapets and magazines are being built to resist the assault of far heavier shells charged with more powerful explosives than any now foreseen and fired from guns far more powerful than any now afloat. And the guns to be mounted behind these parapets are more powerful, caliber for caliber, than those carried by any battle ship or cruiser that sails the seas.

Therefore, while it may have been wise to delay this work so long, there can now be no question as to the propriety, not of taking a new step in a new direction, but of completing the step already commenced in the direction of the well-established policy of this nation.

The system of defenses now proposed and already partially completed may for convenience be called "the fourth system," to distinguish it from the three preceding ones out of which it has grown.

Prior to the Revolution there were along our maritime frontier no dockyards, no arsenals, or other depots of military or naval stores. Cities which now lay the world under tribute for their wealth were then inconsiderable towns or mere fishers' hamlets. But even then such harbors as those of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Charleston, etc., were protected by small works. These, however, were of little use during our first war. England, with her all-powerful navy, taking advantage of the long coast line, the sparseness of population, and the absence of roads, which made it impossible for us to meet her with an armed force at all points, could and did use the ocean for her base and landed troops where she pleased.

Even under these adverse circumstances there was one brilliant event which thrilled the hearts of our forefathers and taught them their first lesson in the value of fortifications. In 1776 the gallant Moultrie, behind a parapet of sand and palmetto logs, defended the harbor of Charleston against the attack of a British fleet of 2 frigates and 6 sloops of war. There were 270 guns afloat against 30 on shore; yet after an action of more than ten hours the fleet was decisively repulsed, and with great comparative loss—an event which gave that part of the country absolute rest from the calamities of war for the next two and one-half years.

After the establishment of our independence Washington urged the necessity of proper land defenses for our coast, and after the outbreak of the French Revolution in 1789 most of the Atlantic and Gulf ports were defended by small works. These formed what the engineers have called the "first system" of defenses.

Continued friction with the French and English Governments led to further appropriations for defense, resulting by 1812 in what is known as the "second system." These works were not only small and weak, but being built, for the sake of economy, of cheap material and workmanship, were very perishable, as shown by General Totten:

The Government, aware of this weakness, called out to their support during the war vast bodies of militia at enormous expense, covering these troops with extensive lines of fieldworks.

Bad as it was, this system was not without its value. It protected New York and Boston from capture, but nearly the whole of the New England coast was kept in constant terror by marauding expeditions, while the shores of Long Island Sound and Chesapeake Bay were ravaged by the British fleets.

It was a lesson taught by costly experience and learned in bitter humiliation. This experience and humiliation bore speedy fruit in the steps taken by the first Congress which met after our second war with England, toward the creation of the "third system" of coast defenses. It is this system which we are now slowly, too slowly, replacing, as it replaced its predecessors. It is represented by those magnificent granite fortresses which still rise out of the lagoons of the Mississippi; which from the Tortugas and the reefs of Florida frown over the blue waters of the Gulf; which for three generations have stood guard at the entrance to every harbor on our coast from Louisiana to the farthest frontier of Maine, and for half a century made our seacoast cities and dockyards and arsenals as safe from attack as an inland city on the banks of the Ohio. The black muzzles which fringed their parapets and were thrust through their embrasures spoke silently but eloquently in support of the diplomacy that guided us to more than one peaceful treaty, and, in conjunction with a still formidable Navy, had their due influence on the measures culminating in the arbitration of Geneva.

The third system—our first permanent one—originated with the board of engineers constituted by the Government in 1816. With this board were associated navy officers of rank and experience whenever their examinations included the sites of dockyards, naval depots, etc.

The board devoted several years of unremitted labor to this duty, and to carry out their plans Congress annually gave grants for fortifications until our coast was admittedly the best defended of any in the world.

The principles established and defined by this board have been, and, so long as fortifications are needed, will remain the guide for their construction. And, as I have already shown, any one who cares to study in detail their reports, extending over a period of many years, and the opinions of naval officers which were solicited by the War Department, will be struck by the unanimity with which they concur in the belief that strong fortifications are indispensable for the well-being of a Navy, no matter how powerful the latter may be. It may be well to further amplify the showing on this point for the benefit of any doubting Thomas, if such there be. Not long before the outbreak of our civil war a distinguished officer of the Navy (Dupont) wrote to the Secretary of War in strong advocacy of land coast defenses from the naval point of view. He said:

In truth it can not be questioned that our principal seaports, naval depots, and all important points on our seaboard should receive commensurate protection; neither should there be, in our judgment, a question as to the mode in which this protection should be given. It would seem unnecessary to set forth the advantages for such purposes of fixed defenses of fortifications. These advantages have been shown over and over again by our distinguished engineers and never controverted. To run over some of these once more—

Once more, as I have done to-day—it may be said of forts that they are the only permanent defenses, and the most economical. * * * Forts offer means by which a small force is enabled to resist a large one, a small number of men a large army. In the event of an attack by a competent power upon a place liable to be put under contribution the injury might be accomplished before sufficient means of resistance could be assembled. Forts can be made impregnable against any naval force that could be brought against them, and are needed for the protection of our own fleets while preparing for hostilities upon the ocean. They secure depots for munitions of war, and render defense certain and easy, and above all a defense which rarely involves the loss of life, leaving the ordinary state of society undisturbed.

Again he says:

To employ our active Navy, in whole or in part, to the entire or partial abandonment of our system of fortifications, would be to supplant impregnable bulwarks by pregnable ones—a fixed security by a changeable one; it would be exposing ourselves to the chance of being suddenly left for a time without defense, through new discoveries in the art of war; it would be opening the way to expenditures of money of which no estimates could count the sums; it would be depriving our commerce of its legitimate protection, and would be resigning our sense of security, peace of mind, and continuance in our pursuits without interruption, in the event of war.

In conclusion—

He said—

whatever may be decided in relation to the national defense by fortifications, I beg leave to express an emphatic dissent from all theories having for their object the substitution of active ships of war for permanent works. This would be placing the Navy in a false position before the country; giving it duties to perform for which its organization is inapplicable; preparing for its future discredit and loss, through failures to execute that which should never have been undertaken, which is not embraced in the general scope and design of a naval establishment.

The plan to retain the Navy for harbor defense was entertained as the commencement of the last war with England; the proposition to do so sprung from the apprehension that it could not compete with the vastly superior English forces upon the ocean. But at that time some brave and sagacious officers in the high ranks saved the Navy from the fate which threatened it, and to those gentlemen it owes all its subsequent honors, usefulness, and prosperity. If any such ideas prevail at this day, in or out of the profession, those holding them would do well to pause and consider what the Navy would have lost if our ships of war had, at that eventful period, been deprived of the opportunity of filling so bright a page in the Nation's history by their achievements upon the ocean.

In this connection an eloquent passage in the speech of a great statesman is recalled, delivered in the Senate of the United States in 1838. After alluding to our being at war with England at a moment when she had gained an ascendency on the seas over the whole combined powers of Europe, and quoting the familiar verses of her poet—

Her march is o'er the mountain wave,
Her home is on the deep—

Mr. Webster says:

Now, sir, since we are at war with her, I was for intercepting this march; I was for calling upon her and paying our respects to her at home; I was for giving her to know that we, too, had a right of way over the seas, and that our officers and our sailors were not entire strangers on the bosom of the deep; I was for doing something more with our Navy than to keep it on our shores for the protection of our own coasts and our own harbors; I was for giving play to its gallant and burning spirit; for allowing it to go forth upon the seas, and to encounter upon an open and an equal field whatever the proudest or the bravest of the enemy could bring against it. The ocean, therefore, was the proper theater for deciding this controversy with our enemy; and on that theater my ardent wish was that our own power should be concentrated to the utmost.

In commenting upon these words of Webster, Dupont adds:

It would be ill-suited, indeed, to the spirit of this nation to retain its naval forces in its own waters during a war, especially if that war was with a naval power. Steam, this new element in the affairs of the world, has very materially changed our position with reference to other nations. Our distance from Europe, measured in time, is now reduced to a brief period of ten days. These United States have hitherto been advancing the general cause of human liberty by an active and progressive peace; but do not events abroad more and more indicate that we may, at no distant day, be forced into our defense—to aid this cause of freedom by an active war?

Similar views were expressed by such officers as Morris, Perry, Stewart, Maury, Dahlgren, and others. Those who deprecated the idea of very elaborate fortifications did so in the expressed belief that it would lull the nation into an undue sense of security and lead to the neglect of the Navy which must be our offensive arm in a foreign war.

I have already referred to the true relation of fortifications and the Navy to each other, and to the general system of defense, as well set forth in the earlier reports of the Board of Engineers.

The coast being properly fortified, the Board adds:

The Navy, no longer needed for passive defense, will move out upon its proper theater of action, though inferior to the enemy, with confidence; knowing that, whether victorious or whether endangered by the vicinity or the pursuit of a superior force, they can strike the extended coast of their country at numerous points, where succor and protection await them. Hovering around the flanks and rear of blockading fleets, and recapturing their prizes; falling upon portions of these fleets, separated for minor objects or by stress of weather; watching the movements of convoys; breaking up or restraining the enemy's commerce in distant seas; meeting by concert at distant points and falling in mass upon his smaller squadrons or upon his colonial possessions, and even laying contributions in the unprotected ports; blockading for a time the narrow seas and harassing the coasting commerce of the enemy's home—these are objects which our own history shows may be accomplished, although contending against a nation whose marine has never been paralleled as to force and efficiency, with a navy apparently, as to numbers, insignificant. Our own history shows that the reason why our infant Navy did not accomplish still more was that the enemy, being able to occupy unfortified harbors, was enabled to enforce a blockade so strict as to confine a portion within our waters. That this portion was not captured is to be attributed solely to a respect, so misplaced that it could only have been the fruit of ignorance, for the then existing fortifications, a result amply compensating the nation for the cost of these works.

It would be difficult—nay, impossible—to estimate the full value of the results following the career of our Navy when it shall have attained its state of manhood under the favorable conditions heretofore indicated; i. e., with well-fortified coasts.

We shall find the war and all its terrors shut out from our territory by our fortresses and transferred by our Navy to the bosom of the ocean, or even to the country of the enemy, should he, relying on a different system, have neglected to fortify the avenues by which he is assailable. Our wars, thus becoming maritime, will be less costly in men and money, and more in unison with our great institutions, leaving untouched our domestic relations, our industry, and our internal financial resources.

Secretary of War Cass, in a report to President Jackson, said:

I consider the duty of the Government to afford adequate protection to the seacoast a subject of paramount obligation, and I believe we are called upon by every consideration of policy to push the necessary arrangements as rapidly as the circumstances of the country and the proper execution of the work will allow.

Secretary of War Poinsett, in a letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives transmitting the report of a board of officers on the subject of coast defenses, said:

After a careful and anxious investigation of a subject involving in so high a degree the safety and honor of the country, I fully concur in the opinions expressed by the board of the superiority of permanent works of defense over all other expedients that have yet been devised, and of their absolute necessity if we would avoid the danger of defeat and disgrace. It would, in my opinion, prove a most fatal error to dispense with them and to rely upon our Navy alone, aided by the number, strength, and valor of the people, to protect the country against the attacks of an enemy possessing great naval means. To defend a line of coast 3,000 miles in extent and effectually to guard all the avenues to our great commercial cities and important naval depots the Navy of the United States must be very superior to the means of attack of the most powerful powers in the world; and this large naval armament, instead of performing its proper function as the sword of the State in time of war, and sweeping the enemy's commerce from the seas, must be chained to the coast or keep within the harbors.

These opinions and many others which might be quoted show the universal belief among military and naval men that the fortifications and a navy are indispensable complements in any well-considered system of defense, neither of which can be employed to the exclusion of the other. Fortifications protect our harbors from occupation and our seaport cities from bombardment and capture. But to protect the incoming and outgoing commerce a fleet is necessary that can move with freedom to any point that may be desired. Let us suppose, as many naval authorities do, that a fleet of 12 battle ships, with its proper complement of armored cruisers, torpedo boats, etc., will be sufficient for this purpose on our Atlantic and Gulf coasts, and that 4 battle ships, with cruisers, etc., will be sufficient for the Pacific coast. It is evident that this number is based upon the supposition that the vessels shall not be confined in their work to mere coast-defense duty. In the latter case some one port must be selected for defense, leaving the others exposed, or the fleet must be scattered and liable to annihilation in detail. United it may easily be able to destroy any fleet likely to attempt the blockade of our coasts. And this freedom of action for the Navy can only be secured by a sufficient system of land fortifications. At this moment our Navy is not able, and unless it should be made more powerful than even that of England it never will be able, to protect our scattered dockyards. Its only chance of saving itself from destruction by a powerful enemy will lie in its ability to concentrate to meet the attack. From this point of view it is not too much to say that the immediate erection of suitable fortifications will add many millions of dollars to the effective value of our fleet without spending an additional penny for ships.

COAST DEFENSES OF EUROPEAN POWERS.

And if this view be correct we should naturally expect to find that the great naval powers of the world have acted and are acting in accordance therewith. Let us scan for a moment the coasts of Europe.

The authority for the following statements is the standard work published in 1894 by Carl Didelot, lieutenant de vaisseau, entitled "La Défense des Côtes d'Europe; étude descriptive au double point de vue militaire et maritime" (the defense of the seacoasts of Europe; a descriptive study from both the military and the naval point of view).

There are now upon the maritime frontiers of Europe, including Malta, 139 fortified seaports, besides a number of others where the modern conditions have made it unnecessary or inexpedient to maintain the fortifications which, though still existing, are now more or less out of date. Of these ports 35 are known as ports de guerre (war ports), where are concentrated the dockyards, the arsenals, the depots of supplies, and the other establishments indispensable to the naval services of the countries to which they belong. These ports in particular have received every attention that the art of the engineer can bestow, and have been fortified at lavish expense.

England has in Europe alone 21 fortified ports, including two in the Channel Islands and Gibraltar and Malta. Seven of these, Plymouth, Portsmouth, Sheerness, Milford-Haven, Queenstown, Gibraltar, and Malta, are military ports fortified with especial care and great expense.

If there be any nation that could safely rely upon its fleet alone for the protection of its coasts, it certainly is Great Britain. It will therefore be both interesting and instructive to note in a few cases what she has deemed necessary, in the way of fortifications, for the defense of her principal ports.

England has now mounted in her coast defenses 920 heavy guns, as compared with the 517 which we propose for our system. Some of the English guns are still of the older and weaker models.

Their number will doubtless be reduced when these are replaced by the best modern guns. Their calibers are 6, 7, 9, 10, 12, 16, and 17.72 inches, as compared with our 5, 8, 10, 12, and possibly in future years 16 inches.

The naval port of Plymouth and Davenport is defended against attack by sea or land by four great groups of works. Limiting our attention solely to the defenses of the water approaches, we find for this one purpose that 15 powerful forts and batteries have been constructed for 232 heavy rifled guns of from 8 to 12 inches caliber, besides mortars. The most important of these are entirely plated with armor.

For the defense of Portsmouth and Southampton, at Spithead and the Needles, against attack by sea there are 20 forts and batteries, most of them completed within the last few years. Four of these forts are entirely plated with armor, and are designed for 130 guns of from 8 to 12 inches caliber. The total defense against sea attack contemplates over 300 heavy guns, besides mortars.

Dover, which is not a naval port, is defended against the sea by three powerful works, one of which is armored and mounts 16-inch guns.

Sheerness and Chatham are defended by 10 works, some of them armored, mounting at least 86 heavy guns. The armament of these works is not generally known.

Those who desire may easily pursue this subject into the greatest detail, in order to see how much thought and money has been expended upon her fortifications by the nation which might be supposed to have the least need to rely upon them.

Across the channel her neighbor and rival for naval supremacy possesses on her continental coast alone 28 fortified ports, of which 5 are "war ports." Germany has 11, with 2 "war ports." Russia has 14, with 4 "war ports" of the first class and 4 of the second class. Italy has 20, with 4 "war ports." Spain has 10, with 3 "war ports." Denmark has 7, with 1 "war port." Sweden and Norway have 9, with 3 "war ports."

Upon the coast of Europe, excluding Turkey, but including England, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Russia, Sweden and Norway, Denmark, Spain, Portugal, Italy, and Greece, there are now 139 strongly fortified seaports, of which 34 are the great military-naval ports, fortified with all the skill of the engineer's art.

There is no information available as to the amount of money expended upon these works, but a description of them as given in the work from which the preceding data have been compiled leaves no doubt that many of them have been fortified with a degree of elaborateness and expense far beyond what is now contemplated for any of our own ports.

Thus we see what the wisdom of all these enlightened nations has led them to provide for their home seacoast defenses in addition to their powerful navies.

If we are to consider the fortified ports of England throughout the world it would appear that the number of guns she has mounted is much greater than I have described relative to her own home defenses.

Take the English fortified posts in the immediate vicinity of the United States, as at Halifax, Bermuda, Kingston, Santa Lucia, and at Esquimalt. These alone far exceed all the land defenses at present existing in the United States. It is reported from time to time that Great Britain is now increasing her fortifications and heavy armament in Canada on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Thus, for the defense of Halifax there are 8 powerful works mounting at least 62 guns of from 7 to 12 inches caliber, besides rapid-fire guns, mortars, and a most complete system of submarine defenses. At Esquimalt an elaborate system of land defenses is being rapidly pushed to completion, but details as to the works and their armaments are not available. However, from what England has done and is doing at other places of equal importance we may infer what she is doing here. At the Bermudas, for the defense of her two harbors and the dockyards, she has 13 forts. In 7 of these there are mounted 78 heavy guns, the total armament being probably more than 100.

So it is, we are encircled as a nation with a chain of foreign fortresses and coaling stations impervious to attack, while our rich seacoast cities and ports, commencing at Portland, Me., near to fortified Halifax, in Canada, continuing down the coast, Portsmouth, Boston, New Bedford, Providence and Narragansett Bay, New London, New Haven and Bridgeport, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Wilmington, Del., Norfolk, Wilmington, N. C., Charleston, Port Royal, Savannah, Pensacola, Key West, Mobile, New Orleans, and Galveston, within a few hours' rapid steaming from the foreign fortified ports of Bermuda, Nassau, Habana, and Kingston; and again, on the Pacific coast, San Diego, San Francisco, Portland, Oreg., and Puget Sound, with its United States dry dock, coaling places, and cities, some of them within sound of British cannon at Esquimalt, all lay dominated, exposed, and helpless against the attack of any foreign power that possesses a navy.

Fabulous wealth lies at the mercy of a freebooting enemy if such shall at any time elude our small and scattered Navy.

Our foreign commerce and coasting trade are alike without harbors of refuge behind land defenses. Our great dry docks and shipbuilding yards, our arms factories and powder mills near the coast, are subject to easy destruction, and our Navy is without protected bases for receiving supplies and effecting the repairs that are constantly required. And yet we plume ourselves on our diplomacy!

Inasmuch as we are taking lessons of England and imitating her as best we can in the increase of our Navy, and in our naval architecture, it may also be well to consider to what extent we should imitate her in the policy of constructing land defenses, at least for home protection on our own shores. True wisdom will not be satisfied with an unequal and "lopsided" system of defenses. Whatever there is in our position and character as a nation that calls for a navy also calls in equal if not louder tones for land defenses. If we are to neglect the one because of its expense, or because of the assumed lack of its necessity, then to be consistent we should omit the other. To build up a magnificent navy, or even a fairly good navy, without the use of fortifications, is but to invite disaster at the first shock of arms, and is the height of folly.

EVANGELIZATION.

Much has been said in regard to the ameliorating influence which advancing Christianity and civilization are affecting among the great nations of the times. It is occasionally said in answer to the demand for defensive works that the spirit and tendency of the age is toward peaceful progress and the avoidance of wars and conflicts, and toward the agency of arbitration and mediation to effect wise and pacific settlements of vexed questions between nations. We hope and long for this to be true, and the wish may be father to the thought in this as in many other things.

I remember that this doctrine was very prevalent many years ago when the celebrated International Peace Conference at Geneva took place. All the world was then in profound peace and seemed likely to remain so, yet within comparatively few years since that great International Peace Conference have occurred some of the most terrific, destructive, and bloody wars ever known in history. Several other international conferences have convened. Such bodies carry no international authority. It has been said that "war can not at all times be avoided, however pacific and forbearing our policy; that nothing will conduce more to an uninterrupted peace than that state of preparation which exposes no weak points to the hostility, and offers no gratification to the cupidity, of the other nations of the earth."

The influences of ambition and commercial and manufacturing rivalry will continue to exert much influence upon the minds of those who control human governments. The wisest nations of our day do not disregard these conditions. Procrastination and weak credulity as to our fancied moral and physical strength have been carried too far in our case, leading us to neglect such preparations as are in accordance with the matured opinions of the wisest and soundest thinkers.

In the language of the report from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. F. P. Blair, jr., in 1862:

> Congress must not only make appropriations, but make them at suitable times and in sufficient amounts; to be most effective, appropriations must be not only adequate but also timely and consecutive; else idle hands and waste of materials will result, as heretofore, in unnecessary losses. In the construction of ships and fortifications delays increase their cost. Forethought and promptitude, faithfulness and integrity, will, at an early day, at reasonable cost, call into existence admirable defenses, of the excellence of which our nation will be proud.

EXPLANATION OF THE BILL.

Mr. President, I desire in conclusion to make a few words of explanation of the bill. The bill presented by the Committee on Coast Defenses is intended to meet the wants of the nation in this respect. It has received the approval of the Secretary of War and of the Chiefs of the two great Departments of Engineers and Ordnance. If it shall be adopted, provision will be made for the construction of the fortifications necessary for the defense of the principal seacoast cities of the United States.

The situation and armament of these fortifications has in each case been the subject of study by the Board of United States Engineers, whose plans have been approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War.

The aggregate number of direct-fire high-power guns of all calibers required is 517; the aggregate number of mortars is 1,056. For the construction of these guns, emplacements, and carriages about eight years will be required and the sum of at least $80,000,000. This sum can not be judiciously expended in a less time except under great stress and at additional cost to the Government; and even in that case it will be very difficult to complete the armament in a much shorter period.

It is provided in the bill that the sum of only $10,000,000 be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and that an expenditure be authorized of $10,000,000 for each of the succeeding seven fiscal years, ending June 30, 1904; thus the tax would be comparatively light for each year, not equaling that of the river and harbor bill, which for the past ten years has averaged annually between thirteen and fourteen million dollars. Think of it! $279,916,317.69 has been appropriated since 1872 for the improvement of rivers and harbors, that is, for the benefit of commerce; and yet we have been so afflicted with "coast-defense blindness" that we have expended only ten or eleven million dollars for the protection of these harbors during the same period.

It is also provided in the bill that the expenditures are to be made proportionately to the estimated cost of the defenses at each of the ports to be defended, so that so far as practicable all the principal seaport cities in the Union may be equitably and contemporaneously benefited by the outlay. This is intended to avoid favoritism and the protection of the country from undue expenditure at some ports to the exclusion of expenditures at other important places. It is proposed to leave this outlay to the great departments of the engineers and ordnance, under the provisions of existing law especially made and adapted to the purpose.

If any additional safeguard shall hereafter be deemed necessary in the working out of the present system it can easily be added by subsequent legislation. It has not been thought advisable to present in connection with this bill any method of raising the money proposed to be expended. The amount to be expended per annum under the provisions of the bill does not seem to be so great as to render necessary any departure from the established methods of raising the revenue of the Government, and it has been feared that if an effort be made to raise the money for this purpose by any specific device of legislation, differences of views as to the best method of raising this money may cause injurious delays in securing the legislation necessary for defenses.

I therefore hope that the bill will be adopted without serious modification, either as a separate measure or in the fortifications appropriation bill. An economic, sound system of national defense is the rock upon which rests permanent safety and successful diplomacy.

Since the people have commenced to receive information on this subject they are being heard from in no uncertain tones, and the indications are that they expect this Congress to act.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call up the resolution declaring Henry A. Du Pont entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon from the Committee on Privileges and Elections February 18, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, this is certainly a case of new impressions. Delaware has treated the country to a novel sight. This Government has existed under its present Constitution more than one hundred years. During that period probably 1,000 Senators have been elected. This, so far as we are aware, is the first case in which a governor of a State voted for a United States Senator. It has generally been supposed that the governor belonged to the executive branch of government and not to its legislative. Here, however, being the executive, he leaps over into the legislature and votes for Senator; and the question is whether in this case Governor Watson could do that thing while he was governor.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] was impressed with the humor of the case, because he said that if the contention of the advocates of the admission of Mr. Du Pont is correct, then Mr. Du Pont was elected Senator twenty-eight times on the same day. The Senator said that ordinarily it was an honor for any one person to be elected Senator three or four times in the course of three or four times six years; but here, he said, Mr. Du Pont was elected, if at all, twenty-eight times, which the Senator thought was extraordinary, and, with humor somewhat grim, he commented upon that curious circumstance.

Mr. President, it was curious, and yet it was true. Mr. Du Pont was elected on the 9th day of May United States Senator twenty-eight times, but the difficulty was to get the election declared. If at the end of any one balloting he had been declared elected, the subsequent ballotings would not have taken place. But here was Watson. The trouble was, as has been the trouble all through, too much Watson. There firmly stood the governor of the State. Delaware is an anomalous State under any legislative conditions, because she has but 9 senators and 21 representatives. Thirty men in two little rooms constitute the legislature of Delaware.

Mr. GRAY (in his seat). How many senators has New Hampshire?

Mr. CHANDLER. Ordinarily I should ask the Senator from Delaware, if he addressed a remark to me, for which I would yield, to rise; but I will answer without the Senator doing that.

Mr. GRAY. I will do so, Mr. President. With the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire, if I have his permission——

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I ask him how many senators the State of New Hampshire has?

Mr. CHANDLER. Twenty-four, and nearly 400 representatives—a State quite as small in all other respects as Delaware, and yet it has 24 senators and nearly 400 representatives, while Delaware has 9 senators and 21 representatives, and when they elected a Senator 15 to 14, behold there was Watson among them, the governor of the State, trying to make the thirtieth, and voting.

Mr. GRAY. The constitution of New Hampshire, which I have here in a publication—of course I shall be glad to be corrected—says that New Hampshire has 12 senators.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is delving in antiquities. There were but 12 under the original constitution. About a dozen years ago we changed it to 24. But we always had, I will say to the Senator, a very large body of representatives, varying from 300 up to 400.

Now, I repeat, Mr. President, that the trouble in Delaware was that there was Watson, the governor, presiding, and he would not declare an election; and so the ballotings went on all day on the 9th of May until the time came when the law adjourned the legislature; and during that whole period the joint assembly was compelled to go on electing Mr. Du Pont over and over again because it had then present the governor of the State sitting as a member of the legislature, and not only, as we contend, thrusting his vote illegally into the balloting, but presiding and declaring that there was no choice.

Mr. President, there he was, and the legislature could not get rid of him. They were in the predicament of Sindbad the Sailor:

> The Old Man of the Sea on the neck of him
> Who seven times crossed the deep,
> Twined closely each lean and withered limb,
> Like the nightmare in one's sleep.

Watson was the nightmare, the incubus, the terror, the usurper, that hindered the declaration of the election of a Senator and made it necessary for the legislature to keep electing over and over again this Senator whom they had once chosen.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I understood the Senator to say that there was an election on these various ballots, but that Mr. Watson declared that no one was elected. Did any Republican senator request the governor to declare an election?

Mr. CHANDLER. There was, as the ballotings went on, a protest against the governor's right to vote.

Mr. HILL. That is not the question I asked. Did anybody at that time make the point that there was an election and request the governor to declare an election?

Mr. CHANDLER. I think there was no request that the governor should declare an election. There was at some time a protest against the right of Watson to vote, and I think a claim that Du Pont was elected.

Mr. HILL. That was after all the votes had been taken, was it not?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am not certain whether it was after all the votes had been taken or not.

Mr. GRAY. Yes; it was after.

Mr. CHANDLER. But here was this incubus, here was Watson, William T. Watson, Senator Watson, President of the Senate Watson, Governor Watson, Pooh-Bah Watson, the executive of the State of Delaware, possessed with all the executive power of that State. There he stood, and it was, I think, to the credit of the State of Delaware and to its representatives that no effort was made to thrust him from the legislative halls back into the executive chamber, and that the representatives and senators chose to appeal from his declaration and the apparent result of his vote to the Senate of the United States, as they do now appeal.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Fifteen Senators protested in writing.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Oregon calls my attention to the fact that 15 senators at that time made a protest in writing against what was going on. But, Mr. President, it affected no legal right whatever. It is admitted that Governor Watson went in, that he presided and voted, and it was not until the close of the balloting that protest was made, and then it was made in a peaceful and dignified manner.

Mr. HILL. Was there any protest made during the balloting at all?

Mr. GRAY. None whatever.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from New York asks whether there was any protest made during the balloting, and the Senator from Delaware, in his seat, says there was none; and unless I was very sure I was right I should not think of contradicting both those Senators.

Mr. HILL. I asked the question. I did not make an assertion.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know.

Mr. HILL. I understood the Senator to say a minute ago that during the balloting they contented themselves in a dignified, quiet way with protesting. That is the point I wanted to know about.

Mr. CHANDLER. It was during this anomalous proceeding.

Mr. HILL. I asked whether it was the fact.

Mr. CHANDLER. Whether it was while the balloting was going on or at the close I do not undertake to say, nor does it make any difference.

Mr. HILL. I understood that the Senator had undertaken to say it was during the balloting. I ask whether it was not in fact after the balloting had been finished?

Mr. CHANDLER. It was during the proceedings which were going on. There were no proceedings, as I remember, except the ballotings, and as soon as the hour came when it was incumbent upon the governor to declare the legislature adjourned it did adjourn.

Mr. HILL. The journal does not show that there was any protest at all presented.

Mr. CHANDLER. Probably not. It was presented as a matter of fact.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will state, if the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, that it was conceded in the affidavit, I think of Governor Watson himself, that the protest was made; at all events, it was conceded in certain affidavits filed in opposition to Mr. Du Pont.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am very willing to have these points made, because it is very clear to my mind that the fact makes no difference whatever; that if Governor Watson's vote was illegal, if it was absolutely null and void, as we contend, then no rights were lost even if there was a failure to object or to protest.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me, I think the affidavits of both Senator Records and Mr. Watson show conclusively that no protest was made until after the last ballot and just before the final adjournment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senators may be right. My point is distinct, that it makes no difference whatever.

The arithmetic of this case is simple. The Senators have also seen some humor in the claim which they say is made by us that 15 is a majority of 30. No, Mr. President, we have not put forth any such arithmetic. We have put forth the proposition that 15 is a majority of 29, and that when 30 votes are nominally and apparently cast, but one of them is a void vote, then it does not count, and 15 is more than 14. Our whole case rests upon the simple proposition that Governor Watson could not lawfully, while he was governor, enter the joint assembly and vote as a senator; that the vote which he did cast was null and void. His conduct was usurpation. We admit that the burden of proof is upon us to establish the proposition that in the vote of 15 to 15 one vote not cast for Du Pont was void, absolutely null and void.

Now, Mr. President, was Watson's vote null and void? I have settled my mind upon the question by asking another question, which is this:

Can the Vice-President of the United States become President upon the happening of a vacancy, take the oath of office as President and perform his duties at the Executive Mansion, keep watch of the proceedings of the Senate, and, finding an important House bill about to be defeated by a tie vote, come from the Executive Mansion to the Senate Chamber, crowd from his seat the President pro tempore and preside himself, declare the vote a tie, give his casting vote in the affirmative, securing the passage of the bill, and then return to the Executive Mansion and sign the bill and make it a law?

Mr. President, I am willing now to have an answer, yea or nay, to that proposition. I have written it out, three or four copies, and they will be enough for all my auditors, unless I secure more than did the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] the other day, to whom I send my last remaining copy.

If the Vice-President can do this, then William T. Watson, who had become a State senator in Delaware and speaker of the senate, had upon Governor Marvil's death surrendered the chair of the senate to a president pro tempore and succeeded to the office of governor, performing the duties of the executive office, could keep watch of the proceedings of the legislature, and finding it about to elect a United States Senator by 1 majority, could go from the executive office to the legislative hall, crowd from his seat the president pro tempore, preside himself, vote for a Senator, thereby apparently defeating the choice, declare that no election had taken place, again vacate the speaker's chair, and return to the executive office and go on with his functions as governor. On the other hand, if the Vice-President of the United States can not lawfully do the acts first described, then William T. Watson, of Delaware, could not lawfully do the acts next described.

Let us see exactly what the case is which I have supposed. We will take the case of President Arthur, who, as Vice-President, succeeded to the Presidency upon the death of President Garfield. He left this Chamber, he took the oath of office as President, he began performing the functions of President at the Executive Mansion, and he remained there for over three years, and the Senate chose a President pro tempore. Suppose exactly the case I have stated in the clause which I have read. Suppose the Vice-President, having thus become President, became interested in the passage of a bill. Suppose that bill which he desired to have become a law had passed the House of Representatives and came to the Senate, where it was supposed to have a majority. President Arthur, however, learning that some Senators supposed to be in favor of the bill had concluded to vote against it, and learning that in all probability the vote would be a tie, comes to the Capitol. The bill is about to be voted upon. The President pro tempore is in the chair. The door opens just before the vote is to be taken. The President of the United States thereupon goes to the chair, ousts the President pro tempore, takes the gavel of the Senate, the result of the tie vote is announced, he declares it a tie, votes in the affirmative, declares the bill to have passed, retires from the chair, goes out the door, returns to the Executive Mansion, and again begins the performance of the functions of President.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And signs the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. And signs, as I have suggested, the very bill which he, by his vote, had thus forced through the Senate of the United States. Mr. President, can a President of the United States do that thing?

Mr. GRAY. Not unless he remains Vice-President.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does he remain Vice-President for that purpose?

Mr. GRAY. Do you want an answer?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am willing to have a direct answer, yea or nay.

Mr. GRAY. If the Vice-President, in the contingency assumed by the Senator from New Hampshire, becomes President of the United States, then he ceases to be Vice-President and can not preside in the Senate. He can not be Vice-President to himself.

Mr. CHANDLER. Could President Arthur have done that thing? I do not think any Senator will undertake to say that he could have done that thing, or that any Vice-President can become President and take upon himself the performance of the executive duties, and then watch his chance when there is to be a tie vote in the Senate and come back here and thrust himself into the chair, ejecting therefrom the President pro tempore, and vote when there is a tie upon the passage of a bill.

Mr. President, if he could not do that, I say Governor Watson could not do what he did. Governor Watson had succeeded to the executive power of the State of Delaware. The elected governor had died. Watson had taken the oath of office. He had left the senate and had gone to the executive office. As a senator he had voted for United States Senator for some two or three months whenever a vote was taken. When he became governor he ceased to vote for United States Senator. He ceased to vote in any way; he severed himself from the senate, and for thirty days the senate and the house in joint assembly went on voting for United States Senator and Governor Watson did not come there. But on the last day of the session, or on the last half of the last day of the session, when Governor Watson heard that probably a Senator would be elected on that last half day, he leaves the executive office a little before 12 o'clock at noon, goes to the senate chamber, thrusts out Mr. Records, the speaker pro tempore of the senate, and at the head of the 8 senators marches to the other room, where were 21 representatives, and there presides at this joint assembly, and the vote which he gives—if it is a valid vote—prevents the election of a United States Senator. I say that can not be done, unless by an equal authority the Vice-President of the United States, after he has become President, can do the acts which I have described.

It may be said that the two constitutions are different. It may be said that the Constitution of the United States is different from the constitution of Delaware. I read from the Constitution of the United States everything that is material to this question. I read from Article I, section 3:

4. The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.

5. The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF BOND SALES.

Mr. PEFFER (at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.). I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that a unanimous-consent agreement was entered into some days ago that at this hour Order of Business 332, in reference to bond sales, should be laid before the Senate for consideration. I ask that that may be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the order of business indicated, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution (by Mr. PEFFER) providing for a committee of five Senators to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator whether he desires to go on with that resolution to-day?

Mr. PEFFER. I do not desire to take the Senator from New Hampshire from the floor, and therefore will yield to the Senator until he concludes his remarks. After he has concluded, however, I shall insist on the regular order.

Mr. GRAY. Perhaps I ought to state in the hearing of the Senator from Kansas, if my friend will give me his attention for a moment, that when the Senator from New Hampshire gave notice that he would address the Senate to-day on the Du Pont case I also gave notice that I should, if the Senate would permit me, follow him. I think, so far as this side is concerned, we are approaching the close of the debate upon that question, and I hope the Senator from Kansas will allow me to take the floor at the close of the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. PEFFER. With the understanding that it shall not displace the bond-sale resolution, I should not object to that at all. I see the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] is present. He has taken a more active part in opposition to the resolution than any other Senator, and if there is no objection on the part of that Senator I should make none. I only want to have this matter kept before the Senate that it may be disposed of at the present session, at least.

Mr. CULLOM. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I will say that I hope this privileged question will not occupy the attention of the Senate so much and so long that we shall get no appropriations this year.

Mr. GRAY. So far as I am concerned, I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I shall not obstruct other business unreasonably. I shall not occupy a great deal of time.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not referring to the Senator's speech.

Mr. GRAY. I thought there was an understanding that I should follow the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. There was that understanding, but I had forgotton at the time that the Senator from Kansas had procured this special assignment by unanimous agreement.

Mr. CULLOM. The Indian appropriation bill seems to have been laid aside for some reason, I suppose to accommodate Senators who desire to speak. When two appropriation bills are waiting, I hope there will be no arrangement made which will keep them back.

Mr. STEWART. I hope there will be an arrangement whereby this resolution, which I regard as far more important than the appropriation bills——

Mr. CULLOM. To which resolution does the Senator refer?

Mr. STEWART. I refer to the resolution in regard to bond sales, which ought to be disposed of, for if we are to have a policy of constantly selling bonds, and if that policy is to be pursued regularly, it will have a very material influence upon appropriations, and we shall need almost unlimited appropriations. If the country is going to be involved in two or three hundred million dollars a year, we want to get the money out. Before the appropriation bills are disposed of the country ought to know what extent of money we are going to have. If this business of piling up money in the Treasury is to continue, we shall have to rely on the good offices of the Committee on Appropriations to get it out. So we shall need liberal appropriations. There is $300,000,000 now in the Treasury which ought to be in circulation.

Mr. CULLOM. The money will get out fast enough. I hope the Senator will not be worried about getting it out. It is going out fast enough.

Mr. STEWART. The trouble is that the people can not get it.

Mr. CULLOM. The trouble is that it does not come in.

Mr. STEWART. My dear sir, please listen to what I have to say. With $300,000,000 in the Treasury, taken out of circulation and piled up there, the country feels the pressure of the want of money, whether the Senator from Illinois does or not.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Illinois has always felt the want of money. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. Then you are in the same condition as the American people, and you ought to be willing that it should be brought out of the Treasury.

Mr. HILL. If the bond resolution is up, I want to take a hand in this discussion myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOM. I only wanted to call attention to the appropriation bills which are awaiting the action of the Senate, and all I desired was that there should not be a policy adopted here which would indefinitely keep them back. I did not know what the Senator's resolution was. So I hope he will understand that I am not trying to interfere with the discussion and disposition of that subject.

Mr. STEWART. I want the Senator from Illinois and the Senate to understand that the bond-sale resolution is the special order for this hour, and while courtesy is my nature and practice, if there is any design to prevent action on that resolution I shall object right now, even at the risk of being discourteous to my friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not know what the resolution was, so there was no design on my part.

Mr. STEWART. I am glad to hear the Senator from Illinois say that, and I hope he will facilitate the disposition of the resolution.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know the nature of the resolution, and I should like to know before I make any agreement about it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will be allowed to finish his speech.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from New York to rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HILL. The suggestion I was going to make was that if the bond resolution is now up for consideration and discussion, I desire to be heard before it is terminated; that is all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Kansas indicate his request?

Mr. PEFFER. It is that the Senator from New Hampshire may be permitted to proceed with his remarks with the understanding that so soon as he has concluded we shall then go on with the bond resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. GRAY. I object to that.

Mr. HILL. What is the request?

Mr. PEFFER. If that request is objected to, then I see no other way than to go ahead with the resolution and let the Senator from New Hampshire address his remarks to the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether he expects his resolution to be voted on without debate?

Mr. HILL. If he does, he will be disappointed.

Mr. MORRILL. I make the point of order that there is now under consideration a question of privilege of the highest character, and therefore no agreement in relation to considering another subject by unanimous consent can displace a question of that kind.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The point is well made.

Mr. CHANDLER. While I think the point taken by the Senator from Vermont is correct, yet I wish to say that if I had known of this unanimous-consent agreement and the anxiety of the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from New York to discuss the bond resolution, as they have done many times hitherto, I should not have undertaken to address the Senate.

Mr. HILL. There is no special anxiety to discuss it on my part, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should not have taken the floor on the Du Pont case at this time had I known of the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. The Chair sustains the point of order. It is for the Senate to determine whether the agreemant shall be carried into effect.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I understand that the proceeding to take up the bond-sale resolution at a quarter past 2 o'clock was by unanimous consent. If we are proceeding by unanimous consent, of course a point of order does not affect the unanimous consent. If it were upon a request of the Senator from Kansas to take up the resolution investigating the bond sale, and if the point of order were made by the Senator from Vermont, that would be one thing; but if we are proceeding by unanimous consent to take it up, that certainly is superior to and beyond any question of order which can be raised. I apprehend the Chair, in determining the point of order, did not consider the fact that there had been unanimous consent that at this hour the resolution should be taken up.

Before I leave the floor I should like to say a word as to the convenience of Senators. Certainly no one would desire to interrupt the progress of the remarks which are being made by the Senator from New Hampshire, unless he desires that his remarks should be interrupted, because of the unanimous consent, but if the resolution is not to be taken up now, at the time we all had agreed it should be taken up, I think there should be unanimous consent to take it up at some other time, or else it ought not to lose its place before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. My point of order amounts to this, that the Senator from New Hampshire was on the floor on a question of the highest privilege, and therefore no Senator could take him off the floor until he got through with his remarks.

Mr. CHANDLER. As I said, I think the point of order was well ruled by the Chair. I do not myself wish to interfere with the unanimous-consent agreement in which so many Senators participated who are now here desirous of going on with the discussion, and yet I should prefer to go on at this time and finish my remarks.

Mr. PEFFER. My desire is to accommodate the Senator from New Hampshire. I have never yet seen a unanimous-consent agreement broken under any circumstances since I have been a member of this body, and I feel that it is discourteous upon the part of Senators to insist that it shall be broken at this time. I know very well what the rules of the Senate are, that the Chair can not enforce a unanimous-consent agreement, can not enforce anything that proceeds by unanimous consent. The Senate goes along at random in such cases.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. PEFFER. I will yield in a moment. I want this resolution to retain its place according to this unanimous consent. At the same time I want the Senator from New Hampshire to be permitted to conclude his remarks, but if it is necessary, and absolutely necessary—if it is forced upon me by the Senate that the Senator from New Hampshire should lose his place upon the floor in order to continue the consideration of the bond resolution, then I shall insist upon it. I have been put off from time to time on account of accommodating other Senators until I am tired, and do not propose to be taken off the floor again if it can be avoided under the rule.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. PEFFER. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has determined the point of order raised by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PEFFER. I so understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is for the Senate to take any further action.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not wish to interfere with the proposition of the Senator from Kansas; I only insist that he can not take the Senator from New Hampshire off the floor.

Mr. PEFFER. I understand that very well. We are proceeding here by unanimous consent. I think the Chair is exactly right and that the point raised by the Senator from Vermont is a correct one. I do not understand, however, that the Senator insists that our unanimous-consent agreement should not be kept in good faith.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. On yesterday, not having in mind, I presume, the unanimous consent given to the Senator from Kansas, an understanding was arrived at between certain Senators, including the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Delaware, that they should speak to-day on the privileged question, the Senator from New Hampshire to speak first and to be followed by the Senator from Delaware, who was very anxious to go on.

Now, my suggestion is that the Senator from Kansas ask unanimous consent that after the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Delaware shall have concluded their speeches on the privileged question now pending the resolution to which he refers shall come up by unanimous consent.

Mr. PEFFER. I shall not object to that at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] is entitled to the floor.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CHANDLER. The question being whether the Vice-President, having become President, could return to the Senate and preside and give the casting vote while President, I was reading from the Constitution of the United States the clauses applicable. Article II, section 1, provides:

> The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice-President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows.

Then follows the provision as to the election:

> 6. In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President; and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President; and such officer shall act accordingly until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected.

Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that there is no express provision whatever declaring that the Vice-President, when he has become President, shall not continue to act as Vice-President. There may be that inference from the provision that a President pro tempore shall be chosen; there is no declaration that the Vice-President shall become President; there is no declaration that the Vice-President shall hold the office of President The language is substantially the same as that which is to be found in all State constitutions. It is of the same general character.

> In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President.

That is, the powers and the duties of the office shall devolve upon him; but it does not say that he shall cease to be Vice-President.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Vice-President may act in case of a temporary disability of the President and later return to the Senate and preside. Suppose this case, that when the British entered this capital in 1814 they had also captured President Madison; is there any doubt that at once, within a half day after the capture, the Vice-President at that time would have been sworn in as President, would have become President, and would have performed the duties of President? And is there any doubt that if President Madison had been recaptured he would immediately have returned to the performance of the Executive duties, would have returned to the Executive office, and that the Vice-President, who had been sworn in as President, would have returned to the Vice-Presidency? Suppose that President Lincoln had been captured, as undoubtedly was the first plan of the conspirators, in a time of great war, would not Vice-President Hamlin have been sworn in as President immediately after the capture was ascertained?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator means Vice-President Johnson.

Mr. CHANDLER. Suppose Mr. Lincoln had been captured when Mr. Hamlin was Vice-President, during the first four years; or suppose he had been captured, instead of being assassinated, when President Johnson was Vice-President. Within one hour after the ascertainment of the fact the Vice-President would have been sworn in as President; and, if there had been a recapture, President Lincoln would have returned to the Executive office, and the Vice-President, whether President Hamlin or President Johnson, would have returned to the Vice-Presidential office.

Mr. President, no express provisions in reference to these contingencies are to be found in the national Constitution. The clauses of the Constitution are those which I have read, and there are no others, and nowhere, unless by inference from the fact that the Senate is to choose a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States, is there any declaration whatever that would prevent the Vice-President from acting as President and also acting as Vice-President. There is not so much in the Constitution of the United States to prevent the Vice-President who has become President from acting in both capacities as there is in the constitution of the State of Delaware tending to prevent a senator who has succeeded to the office of governor by a vacancy in the office filled by the governor elected by the people from continuing to act as senator while he is acting as governor. I send to the desk and ask to have read extracts from the Delaware constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

> From the Delaware constitution of 1776:
> "ART. 7. A president or chief magistrate shall be chosen by joint ballot of both houses, * * * who shall continue in that office three years, and until the sitting of the next general assembly, and no longer. * * * And on his death, inability, or absence from the State, the speaker of the legislative council for the time being shall be vice-president, and in case of his death, inability, or absence from the State, the speaker of the house of assembly shall have the powers of a president until a new nomination is made by the general assembly."

From the Delaware constitution of 1792:

"ARTICLE III.

"SECTION 1. The supreme executive powers of this State shall be vested in a governor.

"SEC. 14. On the death or resignation of the governor, or his removal from office on impeachment or for inability, the speaker of the senate at that time shall exercise the office of governor until a new governor shall be duly qualified, and on the death or resignation of the speaker of the senate the speaker of the house of representatives at that time shall exercise the office until it be regularly vested in a new governor." * * *

From the Delaware constitution of 1831:

"ARTICLE III.

"SECTION 1. The supreme executive powers of the State shall be vested in a governor.

"SEC. 14. Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. * * *"

In the Delaware constitutions of 1792 and 1831, Article II, section 5:

"Each house whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor may choose a speaker pro tempore."

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Delaware and also the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Delaware constitution of 1776 provides for a vice-president:

On his death, inability, or absence from the State, the speaker of the legislative council for the time being shall be vice-president.

There are no additional words to show that the vice-president shall act as governor, but the inference to be drawn, of course, from those words is that when there is a vacancy in the office of governor the speaker of the legislative council, who is declared to be vice-president, shall become the president or chief magistrate of Delaware. There is a close resemblance between the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of Delaware in the provisions which I have cited; while there is not to be found in the Constitution of the United States any one of the several provisions contained in the constitution of Delaware, about which there has been so much debate, declaring that a person holding one office shall not exercise the duties of another office. The special attention of the Senate and of Senators who are considering this question is called to the fact that none of the prohibitions that are to be found in the State constitutions are contained in the national Constitution; and yet I am sure that the Vice-President of the United States can not become President and yet continue to preside in the Senate and give the casting vote in case of a tie; no more could Governor Watson, when he was acting as governor, and had become governor under the provisions of the Delaware constitution, act as senator while he was the governor of the State and possessed of the executive power of the State.

My point now is that, so far as constitutional prohibitions are concerned, there are more clauses to prevent a senator in the Delaware legislature from acting as governor and senator at the same time than there are to prevent the Vice-President of the United States from acting as President of the United States and also as Vice-President at the same time.

Mr. PEFFER. Will the Senator allow me at that point?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. PEFFER. Does not the Senator know that in the constitution of Delaware there is a provision enumerating a certain number of offices no two of which shall be held by the same person? If the Senator is aware of that clause, does he not believe that that excludes all other offices?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not think the Senator from Kansas would argue that when the framers put the clause to which he refers in the constitution they intended to imply an exception that a senator of the State may be at the same time the presiding officer of the senate and also governor, controlling the executive power. The principle that the expression of one thing excludes another does not apply to produce any such result. The exclusions to which the Senator alludes were expressed because there was deemed to be some need of expressing them, but a provision in terms that when the speaker of the senate became governor he should not continue to act as senator was not enacted because it was entirely unnecessary that it should be enacted, as the prohibition was to be derived from another and a broader principle, to which I wish now to call attention.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Another and further answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas, if the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, is this, that the provision in the Delaware constitution to which he refers relates, as I believe, to that class of offices which are not incompatible with each other.

Mr. PEFFER. I submit that the clause refers only to such offices as have been sought or accepted, voluntary in the first instance, by the incumbents, and not to offices which are placed upon men already in office.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator may be correct. I do not think the clause throws much light one way or the other upon the question we are discussing. I proceed with my argument. When the President is dead, or when the President has been captured, or has been disabled by sickness, why can not the Vice-President become the President of the United States, invested with all the Executive power, and also sit here as Vice-President and give the casting vote in case of a tie? I submit to my Populist friends, whom I am now addressing, that they will find it very difficult to say that he can not, unless they also say that Watson could not be governor and senator at the same time.

Mr. PEFFER. Then, Mr. President, if the theory of the Senator from New Hampshire is correct, in case of death or other disability of the President of the United States, and the Vice-President exercises the duties of that office, and the Vice-President should die, and the duties of the office devolve upon the Secretary of State, the same rule would hold good as to the Secretary of State that held as to the Vice-President. Will the Senator hold that the Secretary of State, when he becomes President, may send in a nomination to the Senate here of another gentleman to fill the office of Secretary of State, and so on and so on down to the end of the line?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes; I think so. But the question is not the same. The Secretary of State and the President of the United States belong to the executive department of the Government, and what I am now arguing is in favor of the American principle that a person can not exercise the functions of two offices in two branches of the Government at the same time. That is the question that I wish to bring to the comprehension and apprehension and acceptance of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PEFFER. When the constitutional provision or statutory provision comes in between the Senator's theory and the situation, it seems to me that the law ought to prevail as against the opinion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. There are no such provisions; but the constitutional law is the other way. The Senator's claim is an introduction to the propositions which I am now going to make. The reason why the Vice-President can not be Vice-President and President at the same time, the reason why Senator Watson could not be senator and governor at the same time, is because of a fundamental principle of American constitutional law. I have written out my propositions under that head, and it pleases me to present them in my handwriting to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], while I will read from a typewritten copy.

Mr. President, as I see near me the three judges whom I ought to convince, the Chair will pardon me if I occasionally turn to the left. These, I think, are impregnable propositions which I submit to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. At any rate, they are satisfactory to myself.

1. In the United States all the governments, one national and forty-five State governments, are divided, each one into three branches—legislative, executive, and judicial.

2. It is a universal, fundamental principle of American constitutional law that no officer of one branch of a government can exercise the functions of any other branch of that government. Any attempt to do so is a usurpation, and any act done is null and void.

3. There is one exception to this broad general principle: Where an officer in the legislative branch is compelled to proceed to perform the functions of an officer in the executive branch suddenly made permanently or temporarily vacant.

4. This exception exists only by virtue of provisions of written constitutions, and the fundamental principle has been disregarded only in the manner and to the extent required by the express words of the constitution, or by necessary and unavoidable inference therefrom.

5. In no such case happening under the national or any State constitution can an officer of the legislative branch of a government, called to perform the functions of an office vacant in the executive branch of the government, continue while so employed to perform the functions of his legislative office. The simultaneous exercise of both offices is impossible. It is authorized by no express language, nor by any necessary inference. It is prohibited in some cases by express words; in all cases by fair and reasonable inference.

To prove that these are sound propositions of American public law I desire to exhibit to the Senate the various American constitutions. I find that the constitutions of thirty-nine States have each a clause prohibiting persons in one branch from exercising the functions of another branch. Those which have not that clause are Delaware, Louisiana, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin, making six. So thirty-nine out of forty-five State constitutions have expressly declared this incompatibility of functions, and have enacted that no person connected with one branch of a government shall perform the functions of another branch of the government.

Mr. ALLEN. At this point I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. If the State constitutions to which he refers had not made that declaration, would not the States have possessed the power to devolve the duties of two or more officers upon the same individual, notwithstanding incompatibility?

Mr. CHANDLER. That would have depended upon how the United States concluded to construe its constitutional law. My belief is that in the absence of express authority given in the State constitution the point that I am now arguing would be sound, and that it would be held that as a fundamental principle of American constitutional law no law could be passed giving any person authority to exercise the functions of two branches of the government at the same time.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will allow me at this point—I shall not trouble him any further—I wish to call his attention to the fact that every State constitution is a limitation upon power that is otherwise unlimited. So, if a State has not limited its power, the power exists and may be exercised. On the other hand, there is a distinction, to which I wish to call attention, between State constitutions and the national Constitution. The national Constitution is a mere grant of power. Without expressly or impliedly granting power the sovereignty exercised does not exist and can not be exercised. Therefore, when the Constitution devolves the duties of President of the United States upon the Vice-President in case of the death or removal of the President, there is no provision in the national Constitution that he may return to his seat in the Senate and occupy the Vice-Presidency.

Mr. CHANDLER. He undoubtedly may if the disability of the President of the United States is only temporary, in the cases which I have supposed. In the case which was first suggested to me by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], now in his seat, the capture of the President by a public enemy, the Vice-President, who has become President, may undoubtedly, upon the recapture and return to his functions of the President, again return to this body and become Vice-President. But the point is that it is a fundamental principle that the same person can not exercise the functions of those two offices at the same time. I say I have found this principle in thirty-nine of the State constitutions, the exceptions being Delaware, Louisiana, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin. I say further, that the principle is just as much a principle of constitutional law in those six States which have not declared it in their constitutions as it is in the thirty-nine States which have declared it.

Turning to the constitutions of the thirteen original States, we find six of those States declared this principle in their constitutions before the National Constitution was adopted. That is one reason why it was unnecessary to insert the principle in the National Constitution. That is one reason why it was unnecessary to insert it in the constitutions of Delaware, New York, Louisiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin. It was an accepted principle of constitutional law, prevailing whether expressly asserted or not.

I read from the constitution of New Hampshire of 1784, the bill of rights, part 1, Article XXXVII:

In the government of this State the three essential powers thereof, to wit, the legislative, executive, and judicial, ought to be kept as separate from and independent of each other as the nature of a free government will admit or as is consistent with that chain of connection that binds the whole fabric of the constitution in one indissoluble bond of union and amity.

The constitution of Massachusetts of 1780, part 1, says:

ART. XXX. In the government of this Commonwealth the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them; to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men.

The constitution of Maryland as early as 1776, in its declaration of rights, says:

ART. VI. That the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the government ought to be forever separate and distinct from each other.

The constitution of Maryland of 1851, declaration of rights, declares:

ART. VI. That the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of government ought to be forever separate and distinct from each other, and no person exercising the functions of one of said departments shall assume or discharge the duties of any other.

The constitution of Virginia, 1776, declaration of rights, says:

SEC. 5. That the legislative and executive powers of the State should be separate and distinct from the judiciary.

The constitution of Virginia, 1830, expanded that principle in this way:

ART. II. The legislative, executive, and judicial departments shall be separate and distinct, so that neither exercise the powers properly belonging to either of the others; nor shall any person exercise the powers of more than one of them at the same time, except that the justices of the county courts shall be eligible to either house of assembly.

The constitution of North Carolina, 1776, declaration of rights, says:

ART. IV. The legislative, executive, and supreme judicial powers of government ought to be forever separate and distinct from each other.

The constitution of Georgia, 1798, Article I, says:

SECTION 1. The legislative, executive, and judicial departments of government shall be distinct, and each department shall be confided to a separate body of magistracy; and no person or collection of persons, being of one of these departments, shall exercise any power properly attached to either of the others, except in the instances herein expressly permitted.

The constitution of South Carolina, 1868, Article I, says:

SEC. 26. In the government of this Commonwealth the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the government shall be forever separate and distinct from each other, and no person or persons exercising the functions of one of said departments shall assume or discharge the duties of any other.

The constitution of New Jersey, 1844, says:

ART. III. The powers of the government shall be divided into three distinct departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial—and no person or persons belonging to or constituting one of these departments shall exercise any of the powers properly belonging to either of the others, except as herein expressly provided.

So I repeat that before the national Constitution was adopted, in 1798, there had been in six of the original thirteen States a declaration that it was a fundamental rule of American law and was to be one of the principles upon which American governments, State and national, were to be founded, that under no circumstances should a person connected with one branch of the Government exercise the powers and functions of a person connected with another branch of the Government. I will not undertake to read to the Senate nor to incorporate in my remarks all the clauses of all the State constitutions, but I have prepared a table made up from Ben: Perley Poore's Charters and Constitutions, giving the pages of the two volumes of that work where the various constitutional provisions on this subject can be found, which I will insert:

I will also insert in my remarks the language of the clause in the constitution of the State of Utah, the last of our States to be admitted, and to send its Senators into this Chamber (Article V, section 1):

The powers of the government of the State of Utah shall be divided into three distinct departments, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial; and no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except in the cases herein expressly directed or permitted.

As I stated yesterday during the remarks of the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN], the very best expression that can be found of what I contend is, and has been for a hundred years, a principle of American constitutional law is to be found in the new constitution of the State of Mississippi, adopted November 1, 1890. That constitution was framed in part, I have no doubt in large part, by the distinguished senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], who is now in the Chamber. I find his signature annexed to the constitution. I will read part of it:

SECTION 1. The powers of the government of the State of Mississippi shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them confided to a separate magistracy, to wit: Those which are legislative to one, those which are judicial to another, and those which are executive to another.

SEC. 2. No person or collection of persons, being one or belonging to one of these departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others. The acceptance of an office in either of said departments shall of itself, and at once, vacate any and all offices held by the person so accepting in either of the other departments.

If it be argued that the insertion of the new and forcible words was making a constitutional principle instead of declaring a constitutional principle, I dissent from the assertion. It seems to me clear from an examination of all the constitutional provisions, beginning with the State constitutions of 1776, coming down to the constitution of Utah of two years ago and the constitution of Mississippi of 1890, that here is a principle of American constitutional law, a well-established declaration made on many proper occasions, which has become as fixed a part of our constitutional law as if it had been written in the plainest possible language in every single one of the State constitutions, including the constitution of the State of Delaware.

Mr. President, that this is a fundamental principle of American constitutional law is not only proved by the citations which I have read from written constitutions, but by the actual practice under the American constitutions. President William Henry Harrison died April 4, 1841. John Tyler succeeded and held office four years, lacking one month. Zachary Taylor died July 9, 1850. Millard Fillmore succeeded and held office two years and nine months. Abraham Lincoln died April 14, 1865. Andrew Johnson succeeded and held office four years, lacking one month. James A. Garfield died September 19, 1881. Chester A. Arthur succeeded and held office three years and five months. During all the periods in which those four Vice-Presidents held the Presidential office it was never so much as dreamed that any one of them could come back into this Chamber and, under any possible circumstances or in any possible contingency, preside over the Senate and vote in case of a tie. Was it ever suggested that such a power remained in the Vice-President who had become President? Never was it imagined, never was it suggested as a debatable question; and yet there is nothing whatever expressed in the Constitution of the United States to prevent the Vice-President who has become President from doing what is suggested except the clause which is contained in the Constitution, that when the Vice-President exercises the office of President the Senate shall elect a President pro tempore. And there is in the Delaware constitution substantially the same provision, except that it says the senate may elect a speaker pro tempore of the senate when the speaker of the senate exercises the office of governor.

Now, in reiteration, I ask Senators who take the opposite view of this question to explain to me if they can what difference there is between the national Constitution and the Delaware State constitution which prevents the Vice-President after he has become President from coming back here and acting as Vice-President, and voting in case of a tie, and does not prevent the speaker of the senate of Delaware after he has become governor from coming back into the senate of that State and voting and presiding as a member of the senate of Delaware?

I say I challenge Senators to point out any material difference in the two cases, unless they base it upon the simple proposition that the Constitution of the United States says that the Senate shall elect a President pro tempore when the Vice-President exercises the office of President and that the constitution of Delaware says that the senate of Delaware may elect a speaker pro tempore when the speaker of the senate exercises the office of governor. That is all the difference, and, according to a well-known principle of law, that is not any difference at all, for the obligation upon the senate of Delaware to elect a speaker pro tempore is just as great with the word "may" before the senate as it would be if the word "shall" was before the senate.

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator from New Hampshire object to being interrupted at this point?

Mr. CHANDLER. Not at all.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from New Hampshire has challenged anyone to point out any difference between the case of the Vice-President acting as President and the speaker of the senate of Delaware acting as governor. It hardly needs to be said that a Vice-President is provided for in the Constitution of the United States expressly, and upon the death or inability of the President of the United States he may act as President. His only other function is one given him while he is Vice-President. But he is provided expressly by the Constitution that he may be ready—I speak with entire respect of the office—he is the led horse who is to be at hand when the burden drops from the shoulders of the President, in order to take it up. When he takes it, if, as the Senator contends, or as I understood him to contend, he is President to all intents and purposes, then, manifestly, he can not be Vice-President to himself.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not see the distinction. I have the two constitutions before me—the Constitution of the United States and extracts from the Delaware constitution. I study them, and I do not see why the Vice-President, after he becomes President, whether permanently, by the death of the President, or temporarily, during the temporary disability of the President, can not act as Vice-President at the same time, if the speaker of the senate of Delaware can become governor and also act as speaker of the senate when he becomes governor. There is no statement in the Constitution of the United States that the Vice-President shall become President any more than there is a statement in the constitution of Delaware that the speaker of the senate shall become governor. The Constitution says:

> In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President.

That is, the powers and duties shall devolve on the Vice-President.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from New Hampshire——

Mr. CHANDLER. Excuse me. Why can not he perform those duties and at the same time sit in the chair, Mr. President, which you now occupy, presiding over the Senate?

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from New Hampshire has all along said, unless I have misunderstood him, and his proposition is that the Vice-President becomes President to all intents and purposes. Do I misunderstand the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHANDLER. I think he does. The Senator does not misunderstand me.

Mr. GRAY. If he becomes President his function as Vice-President has ceased, and he has filled that position for which he was elected, to supply the vacancy in case of the death of the President. When he has done that he ceases to be Vice-President, because, being the man kept in reserve to perform what another is unable to perform by reason of his death or removal, he is then functus officio Vice-President, and, not to repeat myself unnecessarily, he can not be Vice-President to himself.

Mr. CHANDLER. My point is that he is not a particle more functus officio than a senator of Delaware elected speaker of the senate of Delaware is functus officio as speaker and as senator when he becomes governor. I am arguing that there is no difference in the two constitutions. I wish Senators to point out if there is any difference.

The Senator does not deny, I suppose, that the Vice-President in case of the recapture of the President could come back here and be Vice-President. Does the Senator assert that the office of Vice-President is so far vacated that if the President, who has been captured by the enemy or has been sick for a time, comes back, the Vice-President has lost his office? By no means. The Vice-President (and that is evidently the contemplation of the Constitution) in that case can come back to the Senate. The Constitution, when it authorizes Congress to declare what officer shall act as President in case the President and Vice-President both disappear, says:

> The Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected.

"Until the disability be removed" is the expression. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests to me that perhaps that is the reason why we elect a President pro tempore and not a President of the Senate eo nomine, in order that the Vice-President may return.

The new constitution of Mississippi, not making new constitutional law, but declaring existing constitutional law, contains in section 131, wherein is the provision that the lieutenant-governor shall be governor in case of vacancy, and if the lieutenant-governor is incapable or absent the president of the senate pro tempore shall act in his stead, this clause:

> Should a doubt arise as to whether a vacancy has occurred in the office of governor, or as to whether any one of the disabilities mentioned in this section exists or shall have ended, then the secretary of state shall submit the question in doubt to the judges of the supreme court, who, or a majority of whom, shall investigate and determine said question, and shall furnish to said secretary of state an opinion, in writing, determining the question submitted to them, which opinion, when rendered as aforesaid, shall be final and conclusive.

Mr. President, that is a very wise provision. It is one which might have been made by statute quite as well as by an insertion in the State constitution. It is a provision which might be made a law of the United States to-day. It is a provision which determines through the medium of the court whether the executive office is permanently or temporarily vacant, and when that question is determined, the constitution determines who shall fill it, and it also makes another very important provision, which is omitted in our Constitution and in all other State constitutions. It provides a method of determining when a temporary vacancy has ended, so that the person who has temporarily filled it shall leave it and return to his original office.

Mr. President, all these provisions are subject to and in recognition of the paramount principle that whenever the officer who has been taken from the legislative branch of the Government to perform the duties connected with the executive branch of the Government is engaged in the performance of those executive duties, he is incapable of performing any legislative duties.

As it never has been imagined during these four cases where a Vice-President has become President that the Vice-President having become President could while acting as such come into the Senate and eject from his chair the President pro tempore, preside in the Senate, and give the casting vote, so it never had been imagined in Delaware until the year 1895 that a speaker of the senate or a speaker of the house of representatives who had succeeded to the executive office could while continuing in the performance of the executive function return to the legislative body of which he was a member and then and there act as such.

I have here and will insert in the RECORD a table giving all the cases which have happened in the State of Delaware where a speaker of the senate or a speaker of the house succeeded to the office of governor, specifying the dates of their accession, the date when each ceased to be governor, and his length of service:

†Speaker of house.

Each one of five senators marked with a star seems to have resumed his senatorial office, but not his place as presiding officer, after he ceased to hold the office of governor. It is not quite clear, however, from the evidence how many of these five did resume their senatorial seats. In some of the other cases a person who became governor continued to be such after his legislative term expired.

We have, therefore, as a fact in the case that what Watson has done has never happened before in the history of the country. It never happened in the history of Delaware; it never happened in any other State. In the whole period of one hundred and eight years of national life under the Constitution, with more than a thousand Senatorial elections, no executive of a State, so far as we know, has ever cast a vote for United States Senator. No Vice-President of the United States has ever thought that he could be Vice-President and President at the same time, and no senator of the State of Delaware ever thought that he could be governor of the State of Delaware and at the same time vote as a senator of the State of Delaware.

Mr. President, that is a highly important fact. It suggests beyond doubt a consideration that should influence the opinions of Senators in determining what is the constitutional law upon this subject. Is it possible that all this time in Delaware and the other States where the president or speaker of the senate or the speaker of the house of representatives has become governor, these officers of the legislative branch of the government transferred to the executive branch of the government could, if they had so chosen, have continued to perform their legislative functions at the same time? And yet no one ever dreamed of this power until, in the year 1895, William T. Watson entered the senate of the State of Delaware for the purpose of preventing the election of a United States Senator, which he had discovered would on that day be made unless he performed this extraordinary and unheard-of act.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal of learned discussion in the reports and in the speeches of Senators of the question whether during the time when one of these legislative officers exercises the executive office, while a senator being president of the senate becomes governor and acts as governor, his original office is vacated or is suspended. It has been very well shown, as it seems to me, that this question is immaterial. I do not regard it as one of importance.

Under the present constitution of the State of Mississippi, as it was framed in 1890, there is the declaration to which I have adverted—that whenever this contingency happens the first office is of itself and at once vacated. But even that clause, as I conceive, would be so construed that although the office is vacated for the time being, yet the president of the senate of the State becoming governor during the insanity, for instance, of the governor of the State, which insanity subsequently ceased, would return to the office which he had left, and might take it up again and proceed to the performance of its duties.

Therefore I say, Mr. President, that the proposition which has satisfied my mind, the proposition upon which I think this case can be safely rested, is not affected in the slightest degree by the question whether the office which was filled first by the person who has become governor is absolutely vacated, whether it is what is called in abeyance or whether the functions of it are for the time being suspended. The principle of law for which I contend and which I think governs this case is that the person who leaves the legislative branch of the government and becomes the executive of the State, the person who leaves this Chamber and becomes the Executive of the nation, can not, while he is in the performance of executive duties, continue to perform a legislative duty. That is the proposition in the simplest form in which it can be put, and it is, as it seems to me, a proposition fairly and inevitably to be deduced from the condition of the public law of America as I understand it to have grown up during the one hundred and eight years of our national life.

As a further indication of the conviction of the American people that a member of the legislative branch of the Government can not at one and the same time act as the chief executive, I refer to the special prohibitions in some of the constitutions of the States. The one in Maine has been already alluded to and its terms somewhat discussed. In Ben: Perley Poore's Charters and Constitutions, page 795, is found the Maine proposition:

Whenever either the president of the senate or speaker of the house shall so exercise said office he shall receive only the compensation of governor, but his duties as president or speaker shall be suspended.

The construction put by the Maine supreme court upon this provision, that it suspends the president of the senate not only from his office as president of the senate, but from the exercise of his functions as senator, is to be found in 7 Greenleaf, 483.

New Hampshire was equally wise. On page 1302 of the second volume of Poore's Charters and Constitutions is to be found the New Hampshire provision, section 49, constitution of 1792:

But when the president of the senate shall exercise the office of governor he shall not hold his office in the senate.

And that clause is continued in all subsequent constitutions. At the last revision of the constitution the same provision was made, where the speaker of the house was authorized in certain cases to act as governor. That clause provides that—

Whenever the chair, both of the governor and of the president of the senate, shall become vacant, by reason of their death, absence from the State, or otherwise, the speaker of the house shall, during such vacancies, have and exercise all the powers and authorities which, by this constitution, the governor is vested with when personally present; but when the speaker of the house shall exercise the office of governor he shall not hold his office in the house.

Mississippi in one of its constitutions made the same provision. I call the attention of the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Mississippi to the following provision contained in the constitution of 1832 of the State of Mississippi, on page 1075:

SEC. 18. When either the president or speaker of the house of representatives shall so exercise said office, he shall receive the compensation of governor only, and his duties as president or speaker shall be suspended, and the senate or house of representatives, as the case may be, shall fill the vacancy until his duties as governor shall cease.

Mr. GRAY. That is in the constitution of Mississippi?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is in the Mississippi constitution of 1832, omitted in a later constitution, but in the constitution of 1890 the exceedingly drastic provision is to be found on this subject to which I have already called the attention of the Senate.

New York had a similar provision, page 1336:

XXI. That whenever the government shall be administered by the lieutenant-governor, or he shall be unable to attend as president of the senate, the senators shall have power to elect one of their own members to the office of president of the senate, which he shall exercise pro hac vice.

Pennsylvania had a still more radical provision, and that is that the seat as senator of the senator who has become governor shall become vacant. It is at page 1578:

SEC. 14. In case of a vacancy in the office of lieutenant-governor, or when the lieutenant-governor shall be impeached by the house of representatives, or shall be unable to exercise the duties of his office, the powers, duties, and emoluments thereof for the remainder of the term, or until the disability be removed, shall devolve upon the president pro tempore of the senate; and the president pro tempore of the senate shall in like manner become governor if a vacancy or disability shall occur in the office of governor; his seat as senator shall become vacant whenever he shall become governor, and shall be filled by election, as any other vacancy in the senate.

This is as strong as the new Mississippi clause of 1890.

The Vermont provision is nearly the same. I read at page 1884:

The lieutenant-governor shall be president of the senate, except when he shall exercise the office of governor or when his office shall be vacant or in his absence; in which case the senate shall appoint one of its own members to be president of the senate pro tempore.

As I read the clause of the Kansas constitution, on page 620, I construe it as an express exclusion of the president of the senate who has become governor from any right to exercise the senatorial office while he is governor:

SEC. 15. The lieutenant-governor shall be president of the senate, but shall vote only when the senate is equally divided, and shall be entitled to the same pay as the speaker of the house of representatives, and in case of his death, resignation, impeachment, removal from office, or when he shall exercise the office of governor, the senate shall choose a president pro tempore.

The constitution of the State of Colorado, on page 224 of Charters and Constitutions, provides as follows:

In case of the absence, impeachment, or disqualification from any cause of the lieutenant-governor, or when he shall hold the office of governor, then the president pro tempore of the senate shall perform the duties of the lieutenant-governor until the vacancy is filled or the disability removed.

And now I come to the Delaware constitution itself, on page 291:

SEC. 5. Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers, and also each house, whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor, may choose a speaker pro tempore.

I ask Senators upon the other side of this question how they can contend that when the speaker of the senate of Delaware is exercising the office of governor—that is to say, has become the governor of the State—and the senate has, in obedience to that constitution, elected a president pro tempore, the president of the senate who has become the governor can, while still governor, come back and oust from office the president pro tempore who has been chosen to fill the office in accordance with the constitution? I ask that question in all seriousness of the Senator from Delaware. The speaker of the senate of Delaware becomes the governor of the State, or the acting governor, or he exercises the office of governor, and the senate, under this clause in the constitution of Delaware, chooses a speaker pro tempore.

The office of presiding officer of the senate has thus been filled. The speaker of the senate has left the place and has gone to the executive office. Is it not a fair inference that the presiding officer's place is fully filled; that the framers of the Delaware constitution contemplated that it should be fully filled; and, further, that as long as the original speaker of the senate should be the governor, or perform the functions of governor, or exercise the office of governor, his first office should remain filled by the speaker pro tempore of the senate? Was it ever contemplated by the framers of the Delaware constitution that after the senate had filled that office, and while the original speaker of the senate was acting as governor, he could come back into the senate and thrust out from his place the speaker pro tempore, and while exercising the office of governor also exercise the functions of speaker of the senate?

Mr. President, I say that such was not the contemplation of the framers of the constitution of Delaware, and that it is a fair inference from all the clauses of the constitution, and especially from this clause in the constitution, that when the speaker of the senate is exercising the office of governor he can not exercise the office of speaker of the senate, and, a fortiori, can not act as a State senator.

It is entirely immaterial in this connection whether, after he has ceased to be governor, if his senatorial term has not expired, he can come back again and act as a senator, and take up that portion of the senatorial term which has not expired and go on with his senatorial functions. The proposition still remains untouched that, according to American law, and according to a fair construction of the provisions of the constitution of the State of Delaware, he can not perform the functions of the executive of the State and at the same time preside in the senate or vote as senator.

Mr. President, I do not know that I desire to argue this question any further. I certainly shall not be encouraged to argue it at such length as the Senator from Mississippi gave to it in a speech covering 36 pages of the RECORD. I have read his speech and the various speeches that were interjected into it, both in aid of the Senator and in contravention of his argument. The Senator from Delaware remarked to me that if I would read it with care I would be convinced of its soundness. I am not convinced, Mr. President, by that perusal. I believe that the provision in the constitution of the State of Mississippi made in 1890—the new provision in that constitution inserted there, as I believe, by the distinguished jurist, the Senator from Mississippi—was declaratory of the existing law, and was not the establishment for the first time of a new principle of constitutional law. That provision would absolutely prevent an acting governor from voting as State senator.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire stated a proposition rather interrogatively—I do not know whether he expected an answer at the time or no—in regard to the inference to be drawn from that provision of the constitution of Delaware which ordains that when the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office of governor the senate may elect a president pro tempore, stating his own inference very positively; but I must submit to him that he has not gone further than to state the proposition which he believes, but he does not seem to have supported that proposition by any argument or illustration drawn from any other part of the constitution or any of those sources from which argumentation is drawn. I could only answer in reply that the provision to which he refers would seem to me to indicate very clearly that the exercise of the office of governor by the speaker of the senate was of that provisional, temporary, ad interim character as to create no vacancy and no suspension of functions, but only to make it convenient, if the senate saw fit, to have another officer to take his place when he should be absent for any cause, either in the performance of an executive duty or for any other reason; and to say that when he comes back he must thrust out, as the Senator phrased it, the speaker pro tempore and assume or usurp the office of speaker, would be only saying what we might apply as well to the President pro tempore of the Senate when he exercises the office of President pro tempore, that he is thrust out on the appearance of the Vice-President or is pushed out or otherwise extruded violently or unlawfully; and that phrase is just about as applicable in the one case as in the other. On the contrary, the permissive form of that provision, "may elect a speaker pro tempore," would seem to indicate that he not only remains a senator but remains speaker, and that, therefore, being both the one and the other, his function is not vacant or suspended.

Mr. CHANDLER. I agree with the Senator that neither epithets nor rhetorical verbiage are constitutional arguments. I say it is a fair inference not only for me, but for the Senator from Delaware, if he will take a nonpartisan view of this question, from this clause in the constitution, that when the framers wrote it and provided that when the speaker of the senate should exercise the office of governor his office in the senate should be filled, they contemplated that he should stay away as long as he was governor.

I accept the criticism as a proper one of the use of the words "thrust out." If the speaker of the senate ceased to be governor and his senatorial term had not expired, then I incline to think the speaker pro tempore might properly be thrust out; but so long as the original speaker was governor he had no right to thrust out the speaker pro tempore. I think that is a fair inference from the constitution.

Of course I admit, notwithstanding this principle of American public law, which I have feebly endeavored to expound, and which provides that a person connected with one branch of the government shall not exercise the functions of another branch of the government, that if a State constitution expressly authorizes a particular officer to perform the functions of another office and also those of his original office, he may do so. There is no such express authorization here as there was in the constitution of New Hampshire from 1784 to 1792, and as there was in the constitution of the State of Rhode Island down to 1842.

If there was an express provision which said that Watson could do these things, that would prevail as against all general clauses in the constitution. There is no such express provision, and on the other hand there is no express prohibition. Therefore this case arises. If there were an express authorization, or if there were an express prohibition, as in some of the constitutions which I have cited, then this case would not have arisen. It is because there is neither an authorization nor a prohibition that this case is here; and I say that I am satisfied, and I wish Senators upon the other side of the Chamber were satisfied, that it is the true construction of the Delaware constitution, reached in the light of American public law, admitted to be such for a hundred years, that the speaker of the senate while he is governor, having become governor by the death of the governor elected by the people, can not at the same time, on the same day, on the same afternoon of the same day, perform an executive act and also perform a legislative act.

Mr. GRAY. I do not know whether the Senator is about to close or not, and I do not want to keep him on his feet longer than he wishes to be, but the Senator said just now, and repeated it several times during his interesting argument, that there is a principle of public law in the United States that no legislative officer shall ever exercise an executive function while he continues in a legislative position, and that it is the American doctrine that they can not be simultaneously exercised.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the proposition.

Mr. GRAY. Where is the evidence of that public law apart from specific constitutional ordinance?

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose the Senator will admit that there is such a thing as the constitutional law of England, and yet there is no written constitution in England.

Mr. GRAY. I ask what is the evidence of that American public law the Senator has spoken of as the American principle distinctively? To what case can the Senator refer me—because I should like to know everything about this to be known, and I do not know anywhere I could apply for recondite information better than to the Senator from New Hampshire—to what case can he refer me where there has been a suspension of a legislative function from the mere exercise of a temporary executive office?

Mr. CHANDLER. I refer the Senator to the important fact that in a hundred years no executive ever undertook to act as a member of the legislature at the same time, with the exception of the Rhode Island case and the New Hampshire case and the present case of Governor Watson in Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. That would be merely saying, perhaps, there had never been an occasion in which the President pro tempore of the Senate in a hundred years had been called upon to act as President of the United States, and that, therefore, there is no law to authorize him to act as such.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; because there has been a hundred cases——

Mr. GRAY. There has not been in a hundred years a call upon that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. CHANDLER. There have been hundreds of cases where the president of the senate of a State has become governor; and the Senator does not show one case except in the State of Delaware in the year 1895, where an officer, being governor of the State, has acted at the same time as a member of the legislature.

Mr. GRAY. That is not an answer to my question, whether there is any declaration of the principle of public law, which the Senator says is distinctively American, that upon the exercise by a legislative officer of an executive function there is a suspension of the former office.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will try to state the contention. It is a proposition deducible from all the facts which I have exhibited to the Senate, just as much as any proposition of English constitutional law is deducible from history. The Senator will admit that there is a principle in the constitutional law of England that there can be no taxes exacted from the people except in pursuance of a law of the Lords and Commons. Yet there is no written constitution of England which says that. The body of the constitutional law of England is deducible from the history of that country from its earliest days down to this time.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator will find repeated authoritative declarations of parliaments, of jurists, and writers; and those are the sources of constitutional law in England.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator in saying that vindicates my argument, which is that this American principle is deducible from declarations in six of the constitutions of the original thirteen States; from the declarations in the constitutions of thirty-nine out of the present forty-five States; from the construction of the constitutions of all the States, including that of Delaware, for over a hundred years, and it is crystallized in the enunciation of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in the constitution of Mississippi of 1890. That is where the principle of American public law comes from.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, then it would seem to follow that it would not be necessary that any other State should ever make a constitutional inhibition in this respect; and these particular constitutions of particular States having made these particular inhibitions, then it ceases to be necessary for any other State to incorporate such a provision in the constitution of that State, and that there is a general public law applicable to all constitutions established by that historical fact.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have been very dull this afternoon if I have not succeeded in making the Senator understand that such is exactly my proposition; that this principle of public law has grown up in this country in this way; and when I cite as reasons for so believing the universal custom for a hundred years, under which the executives of the States who have been called from presiding officers of the legislature have abstained from undertaking to exercise the legislative office while exercising the executive office, if I have not demonstrated my proposition, then I can not demonstrate any proposition whatever. The Senator does not understand me to contend that the constitution of Delaware says that when the speaker of the senate acts as governor he shall not act as speaker or as senator.

Mr. GRAY. Some constitutions have said so.

Mr. CHANDLER. Two or three State constitutions have said so, and the present question could not arise in those States. But the Senator will not deny, when thirty-nine States enunciate the proposition as a fundamental one that the different branches of the government are to remain distinct and no person in one branch is to exercise the powers of another branch, but Delaware, Louisiana, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin omitted to do this, that the same principle of public law does not prevail in those six States that prevails in the other thirty-nine. In the absence of an express constitutional provision the other way—I admit an express constitutional provision the other way would justify Watson's act—when we are called upon to determine what the public law of America is and what the public law of Delaware is, and we find this provision in the constitutions of thirty-nine States, we have the right to infer that it is a principle of public law in the other six States, exactly as I say it is a provision of the public law of America, applicable under the National Constitution to the Vice-President when he becomes President of the United States. It is a well-established American principle, never violated until the year 1895, when the little State of Delaware undertook to trample it down.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, as I shall have an opportunity of following him to comment somewhat upon this doctrine, but I understand that he stakes his argument here this afternoon upon the assertion that there is a principle of American public law by which it is impossible, except by virtue of an express constitutional provision, for a legislative officer to exercise the executive function and not vacate the legislative office. That, I understand, is the proposition?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is my proposition, and nobody ever dreamed that the same person could exercise both functions at the same time until an arrangement was made in Delaware by which if one more vote would prevent the election of a Senator Governor Watson should go in and cast that vote.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I do not want to go into matters dehors this question as to what occurred in Delaware, but, inasmuch as the Senator from New Hampshire has indulged in that style of argument, I want to assert that there was not a moment on that 9th of May, when that joint assembly was in session, when, if our distinguished former colleague, Mr. Higgins, had received 16 votes, it would not have been acquiesced in by every Republican and every other man in the State of Delaware that he was elected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am not aware that I made any remarks to excite the wrath of the Senator from Delaware. I said an arrangement was made. I was not arguing Senator Higgins's case. I was dealing with Mr. Du Pont's case. I simply said this thing never was dreamed of in the United States of America——

Mr. GRAY. It was dreamed of.

Mr. CHANDLER. Until 1895, after an arrangement was made by which Governor Watson's one vote was to appear to prevent an election. I said that arrangement was made. The Senator says that is a bad style of argument. I ask the Senator was it not distinctly understood that enough votes were cast and would continue to be cast for Mr. Addicks to prevent a choice if there could be one more Democratic vote?

Mr. GRAY. I know nothing about arrangements, and I am not a party to such arrangements. I know nothing about them. I will only say there was not a time during that day when there was one member of the minority or majority of the legislature of Delaware or their adherents on the outside of that assembly hall who ever dreamed that Senator Watson was not exercising his clear right and performing a manifest duty in voting in that assembly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have endeavored to argue this case as a question of constitutional law, and I had not intended to bring anything exciting into it; but I will, I think, before I finish, show the circumstances under which Governor Watson went into the joint assembly and voted. I did not suppose it was denied that Governor Watson went in at 12 o'clock on the 9th of May because it had been ascertained that his vote would prevent an election of Senator, which would otherwise be made. I did not suppose anybody denied that such was the motive and the purpose and the plan—and I simply referred to it as an arrangement; whereupon the Senator from Delaware says I am making a bad style of argument.

Mr. GRAY. No; I did not say that.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator criticised my style of argument.

Mr. GRAY. I said that what the Senator said had nothing to do with this question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I say it has something to do with this question whether my proposition is the public law of the United States and the public law of Delaware as well, that an infringement of that principle never had been dreamed of until an arrangement was made in the State of Delaware on the 9th of May, by which, if Watson would do that kind of an act, for the first time in history, the election of Mr. Du Pont could be prevented.

Mr. GRAY. The question here is whether Mr. Watson was entitled under the constitution of Delaware to vote in that joint convention. If he was he no more prevented an election than any other man of the thirty in that assembly who voted as he did. The same responsibility was on every other man if he voted rightly; and the whole question is whether he did so vote.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is so; but the Senator asked me where I found this principle of public law, and I say I inferred it from historical evidence, coupled with the fact that it never was imagined the law was otherwise until the 9th day of May, 1895.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator will not find, will he, in the Constitution of the United States or in the constitution of any State, an expression that all governmental power is divided into three branches?

Mr. GRAY. Oh, yes; in plenty of the constitutions of the States.

Mr. PLATT. He will not find it in all the constitutions.

Mr. GRAY. In a number of them, I will say to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Not in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GRAY. No; but in most of the constitutions of the States.

Mr. PLATT. It is not in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GRAY. No; that is right.

Mr. PLATT. And yet the Senator would not argue that it was not a principle of constitutional law in the United States.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is precisely what the Senator from Delaware does argue. I argue, on the other hand, from the assertion of that principle in thirty-nine States, that it is a principle which exists in the other six States, and that it is a principle of American public law applicable to the United States Constitution. That is my argument, as the Senator from Connecticut would have heard if he had been here. The Senator from Delaware infers, because these provisions do not exist in six of the States or because they have been recently inserted in an unusually emphatic form in the constitution of the State of Mississippi, that therefore they were not universally existing law. My argument is that they were declared as existing law and were not declared to make a change of law. The point is clear enough.

I call attention, Mr. President, to the ten amendments to the Constitution of the United States which were proposed by the States when they adopted the Constitution. There was no bill of rights in the United States Constitution, and these ten amendments were adopted. I ask the Senator from Delaware whether every one of those provisions changed the existing law? For instance:

ARTICLE I.

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

I ask the Senator from Delaware whether, prior to the adoption of that article, Congress had any right to make a law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or whether Congress had a right to abridge the freedom of speech or of the press, or had the right to prohibit the people from assembling and petitioning the Government for a redress of grievances?

ARTICLE II.

A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

Does that prove that before Article II was adopted Congress might prevent the people from keeping and bearing arms?

ARTICLE III.

No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

ARTICLE IV.

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.

I ask the Senator, could all those things have been done if those amendments to the constitution had not been adopted? I answer by saying that they could not have been done and that very few people believed that these clauses were necessary. The right of the people to be secure against unreasonable searches and seizures and to have searches and seizures made only upon warrants issued upon oath was a right guaranteed by the common law of England. Was it not so? These declarations were made ex gratia; they were made ex abundanti cautela; they were not made to change the constitutional law of America. So all these declarations in the thirty-nine States were made in affirmation of the existing public law, of law which existed in those six States which had made no affirmation, of law which existed and was applicable to the conduct of government under the United States Constitution, which contained no bill of rights and contained none of these declarations, because the principles which the declaration enunciated were principles of American public law from the earliest date down to the present time.

Mr. President, I will not take up the time of the Senate or of the Senator from Delaware if he proposes to speak this afternoon.

Mr. GRAY. I would rather not speak this afternoon.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will not, however, take up the time of the Senate by arguing at length against the proposition of the other side that, whether Mr. Watson had the right or not, as an original question of law, to come back and act as speaker of the senate and as senator, he yet had the right through an adjudication of the senate made on the 9th of May, when he came back. I do not like to call absurd any proposition made by the other side, but it does seem to me that this argument which they have undertaken to elaborate is absolutely destitute of any substantial foundation whatever.

There was no doubt about Watson's original election to the senate; there was no doubt that he was once senator, and elected speaker of the senate. The other side put into the record evidence that he was originally elected senator, which nobody has ever denied. The present question is, Was he entitled to vote as senator on the 9th of May, and did the senate of Delaware adjudicate that he was so entitled?

Mr. President, all that took place was this: Shortly before 12 o'clock Governor Watson came into the senate chamber, saw the speaker of the senate pro tempore, Records, in the chair, sat around a few minutes talking to various senators, and just before 12 o'clock went to the desk, and—I will not say thrust aside, but—displaced Mr. Records, and at the head of this little body of 9 men went immediately to the hall where the joint assembly to vote for a Senator was to meet. The toleration of this performance is said to be an adjudication of the senate of Delaware. I can apply no other term to it than that of a ludicrous absurdity.

I again refer to the case of the Vice-President. Suppose a Vice-President to become President by the death of the President; suppose him to claim to retain all through his Presidency the right to come into the Senate and preside. He learns that the votes of electors for President of the United States are to be counted, in accordance with the rules, in the House of Representatives. The rules provide that the President of the Senate shall preside in the joint meeting in the House of Representatives. This count is to take place on a particular day, and suppose the President of the United States under those circumstances, the former Vice-President, a few minutes before the time fixed when the Senate is to go to the House of Representatives to see the Presidential vote counted, opens the door and comes in and displaces the President pro tempore of the Senate, and at the head of the Senate goes over to the House of Representatives, where the Presidential ballots are opened and the result exhibited and declared to the two Houses. Now, suppose further that the legality or validity of his conduct is called in question afterwards—as I am entirely sure it would be—would the Senator from Delaware say that the Senate had adjudicated that the President had the right to come back and resume the functions of Vice-President because the Senators did not at once thrust the usurper from his chair, because the Senators tolerated him in the position, and went with him to the House of Representatives and saw the Presidential count take place, and then came back to this body and took such action as they might think proper under the circumstances?

Mr. President, the toleration of such an usurpation as that would not be misconceived. It would not confer any rights whatever. So also it can not be possible that there is a single Senator who really thinks it was an adjudication of the senate of Delaware when William T. Watson left the executive chamber and proceeded to the senate chamber, and a few minutes before 12 o'clock put himself at the head of the procession and went into the assembly room, because he was not immediately hurled from his seat by indignant senators.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator has said that no one would contend that any recognition by the Senate of such an act by the Vice-President would be regarded anywhere. I agree with him. But suppose that the Constitution of the United States had said that the Senate of the United States should be the judge of the propriety and the right of the Vice-President to act upon any occasion, which it has not said, would he then think that a judgment by the Senate of the United States would amount to anything?

Mr. CHANDLER. If a President of the United States who had once been Vice-President and had succeeded to the Presidency came into the Senate Chamber about five minutes before the Senate went to the House of Representatives to witness an important function in the Presidential count, I should not say that the Senate, by tolerating that act until it could get an opportunity to repudiate it, had made a solemn judgment of the Senate that he was its Vice-President, even if the law were perfectly explicit that even a recognition of the Vice-President by the Senate would be conclusive upon all the world.

The doctrine which Senators put forth tends to violence. It was becoming in the senate of Delaware to submit temporarily and to appeal to some superior authority, as it does to us now. The doctrine which Senators advocate would have made civil war in Alabama on two occasions. The senate of Delaware submitted; the assembly of Delaware submitted. It took them some time to recover from their astonishment. The bodies were too small to work up a great deal of indignation in a few moments. I do not know that anything would have been attempted even in a legislature of three or four hundred members. But here was a little senate of 9 members and a house of 21, to be sure more than are sometimes present in the Senate when great constitutional questions are argued, but not enough to get excited on any subject.

Mr. GRAY. As we do here.

Mr. CHANDLER. As we sometimes do here. The senate and the joint assembly very wisely, as I think, when they came to recover from their astonishment, conceiving it to be utterly preposterous that anybody could claim that Governor Watson could vote as senator, submitted to the indignity as long as they could and came to this body with the claim that Governor Watson's vote was void, and that therefore the result was 15 to 14, and that Mr. Du Pont was elected. There was no res adjudicata; there was no violence, and the whole case is fairly before the Senate for its deliberate judgment.

There is a moral question involved in this case, and it has been brought out by the indignation of the Senator from Delaware, who is sensitive upon the question whether or not there was an arrangement made by which Governor Watson should enter the joint assembly and vote in order to prevent the election of a Senator, which would take place if he did not enter. In this connection I shall ask to have read an extract from the affidavit of John M. C. Moore, dated January 14, 1896. It is contained in the report of the committee, in the appendix, at the bottom of page 73 and the top of page 74.

The Secretary read as follows:

The conversation which occurred between us was as follows: Governor Watson said to me, "Mr. Moore, I want to talk with you. I believe you will tell me just as it is. Is Mr. Massey out of this thing?" I said to him in reply, "Governor, he is. We are not going to cast another ballot for Mr. Massey nor no other man who has been balloted for except Henry A. Du Pont. He will be elected on the first ballot in the joint session." To which Governor Watson replied to me, "If that be the case, I shall take my seat." Against this I remonstrated, and said to him, "Governor, I hope you will not do it. I think too much of you as a man for you to do it." That was the last of our conversation. He made no reply to my remonstrance.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Secretary to read from the affidavit of George F. Pierce, dated January 13, 1896, at the middle of page 75, and also at the bottom of page 75 to the end.

The Secretary read as follows:

That about ten minutes before the hour of noon William T. Watson, governor of the State of Delaware, being in the chamber, came and took a seat alongside of this deponent, and said to him, "I am going into the joint assembly and vote for a Senator." This deponent said, "You are going to do what?" He answered, "I am going to preside over the joint assembly today, and vote for a United States Senator." This deponent then said, "Do you think that is right?" Governor Watson answered, "No, I do not; but my party has overruled me." This deponent answered, "Then I suppose there is nothing I can say now that would change your mind;" to which Watson replied, "No; my mind is fully made up."

* * * * * * *

William T. Watson took a paper out of his pocket, and, without saying anything, handed it to me. I read it and handed it back to him without saying anything. The paper, as I recollect it, to the best of my knowledge and belief, read about as follows: "We, the undersigned, pledge ourselves to vote for John Edward Addicks, first, last, and all the time." I think there was a line or two more, but I can not recollect what it was. This paper was signed by Newell Ball, Charles Moore, John Robbins, and Robert J. Hanby. The first three were members of the house of representatives, and Mr. Hanby was a member of the senate.

GEO. F. PIERCE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Secretary to read from the middle of page 78, being the affidavit of John S. Prettyman, jr., dated January 14, 1896.

The Secretary read as follows:

During this walk Governor Watson said to me that when he went to Dover on the morning of that day that he did not expect to preside as speaker of the senate, believing that he did not have a legal right to act as governor and senator. After reaching Dover, in response to the influence of party leaders, he reversed this decision, and consented to enter the senate and claim his rights as speaker. In doing this, he said, he put aside his own judgment and acted upon the judgment of those whom he regarded as well qualified to advise. He also said that if anyone would convince him that he had acted illegally in the matter that he would sign Mr. Du Pont's certificate of election.

On Friday following this conversation I met Governor Watson about 11.30 a. m. in T. F. Hammersley's drug store, in Milford. I said to him that the fact of the Speaker of the United States Senate abandoning his functions as Senator upon becoming President of the United States might have some weight with the Senate in considering the seating of Mr. Du Pont. He seemed indignant, and blurted out in an angry manner, "What's that got to do with it? If you would read a little you might know something." I replied quietly that his remark was a very foolish one; that I did not know that he had ever been credited with superior wisdom or learning; and that neither of our opinions was worth very much in the matter. He then quickly and excitedly drew from his pocket a folded piece of writing paper, and said, "Read this." I took the paper and read the writing through. It was an agreement between Robert J. Hanby, Newall Ball, Charles Moore, and John Robbins, members of the Delaware legislature, signed with their names, and to the effect that they would vote for J. Edward Addicks for United States Senator, and that they would not vote for anyone else, even though no Senator should be elected. As I passed the paper back to the governor he said, "Wouldn't you have acted as I did under such circumstances?" I evaded his question by saying, "Are the signatures genuine?" and he replied, "Of course they are; look again," and he passed the paper to me for the second time. I read it through again and examined the signatures, remarking that I was not familiar with the autographs of these men, but that the names were in different handwritings. He said that he was not familiar with the autographs of the men, but that he was sure the names were genuine. The governor also said that this agreement was brought to him to induce him to take part in the last joint assembly of the legislature, and, influenced by it, through the advice of others, he consented to preside as speaker of that body, and did so preside upon the day mentioned. He further said that the Republicans had every opportunity to elect a Senator and had failed to do so, and of course he preferred that the Democratic party should have a representative in the United States Senate from Delaware rather than the Republican party.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, the Secretary will please read from the affidavit of Frank Reedy, where I have marked it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Governor Watson said to me, "You fellows ought not to be so hard on me for not electing a United States Senator; you ought to blame those other four men." I replied, "We do not blame you altogether, but we think you ought not to have gone in there at the time you did if you had not gone before." Watson then said, "I did not go in until I had the best legal talent of the party advising me so to do, and not until I had got this"; and he handed me a paper. This paper, as well as I can remember, read about as follows: "We, the undersigned, hereby pledge ourselves to vote for John Edward Addicks first, last, and all the time." There may have been a couple more lines, but I can not remember where or what they were.

This paper was signed by Charles Moore, Newall Ball, John Robbins, and Robert J. Hanby. The first three were members of the house of representatives of the State, and the said Hanby was a member of the senate.

Squire Robert J. Beswick came up about that time and I handed the paper back to Governor Watson without anything further being said by either of us.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Delaware remarked a little while ago that he did not understand that there was any doubt in the mind of anyone in Delaware as to the right of Governor Watson to do what he did, to enter the Senate and vote. The Senator so stated, unless I am mistaken.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from New Hampshire is not mistaken.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator so stated. We have all this testimony about Governor Watson. Governor Watson may or may not always be so sound a constitutional lawyer as Chancellor Wolcott, who is said to have advised this proceeding. But on this occasion I think he was a much better constitutional lawyer than Chancellor Wolcott, as he evidently did not think he had the right to go to the senate and vote. The first discovery of this right in a hundred years was not made by Governor Watson. He himself has made an affidavit, dated January 28, 1896, which is contained in the majority report, page 88. He states his action in presiding over the senate and the joint assembly on May 9, 1895, but he does not deny any of the statements which I have put into the record, although the same were presented to the Senate on the 29th day of January, 1896, and printed.

Mr. HOAR. What is the date of Mr. Watson's affidavit?

Mr. CHANDLER. January 28, 1896. On the 29th of January these affidavits were presented and printed, and they never have been denied up to this moment.

I do not argue that these facts make any difference in the question of constitutional law. If Governor Watson voted, as I believe he did, through a conspiracy to furnish the one vote that was necessary to prevent a Senatorial election on that day, and yet had a right to vote, his vote should be counted. If he had not a right to vote, then his vote should be rejected, no matter how pure his motives may have been, no matter how pure may have been the motives of his advisers, no matter how confident his advisers may have been as to his right. These facts are only a part of the history of this case. They are a part of the history of the effort, for the first time in one hundred and eight years, on the part of a governor of a State to give a controlling vote in the election of a United States Senator.

Mr. President, I do not think Governor Watson's act was creditable to the State of Delaware; I do not think it was in accordance with the public law of the United States; I do not think it was an act which the Senate of the United States can afford to indorse with the seal of its approval.

Mr. GRAY obtained the floor.

Mr. PROCTOR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Delaware whether he wishes to proceed to-night.

Mr. GRAY. I do not wish to proceed to-night. If I may be allowed to hold the floor on this question, I will be much obliged to the Senate if they will extend to me the courtesy of allowing me to resume to-morrow morning immediately after the routine morning business is concluded.

Mr. PROCTOR. If the Senator from Delaware will yield to me, I will ask unanimous consent——

Mr. GRAY. I ask unanimous consent that I may resume the floor on this question to-morrow immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. PEFFER. There is a unanimous-consent agreement now in force in which the Senator from Delaware is interested and in which he took part. I think the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], perhaps, is not aware of it. There was a unanimous-consent agreement entered into this afternoon by which as soon as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] concluded his remarks the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] should follow him and conclude the discussion upon the Du Pont case, and that then the bond resolution which has been before the Senate should be immediately proceeded with. Unless the unanimous-consent agreement is carried over the bond resolution may lose its place, and that is what I wish to prevent.

Mr. GRAY. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, as I understood it, the bond resolution of the Senator from Kansas would have the right of way immediately after the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. PROCTOR. I will say for the benefit of the Senator from Kansas that I merely ask to call up a measure which I think will not be objected to. If there is objection, it can be withdrawn. It is a House bill of great interest to the District, and is designed to prevent litigation.

Mr. PEFFER. Then I ask unanimous consent that the agreement we entered into this afternoon may be considered as continued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. HILL. What is it?

Mr. PEFFER. That the unanimous-consent agreement shall be continued.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GRAY (to Mr. HILL). The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the bond resolution may be taken up after I shall have concluded my remarks. I asked to be permitted to speak to-morrow, and he asks that the unanimous-consent agreement may be extended.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the question before the Senate?

Mr. PEFFER. I asked unanimous consent, and I understood the Chair had asked for it and it was conceded——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, such will be the arrangement.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HILL. I should like to have the Senator from Kansas state what he asks for. He starts in and does not finish the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will restate his request.

Mr. PEFFER. What I ask is that these intermediate proceedings shall not interfere with the unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into this afternoon, that as soon as the Senator from Delaware concludes his remarks the bond resolution shall be immediately taken up.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the unanimous consent which the Senate is asked to extend?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands it is the unanimous-consent agreement entered into to-day in relation to the bond resolution. Is that correct? the Chair asks the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PEFFER. I will state the facts for the information of the Chair, as the Senator who now occupies the chair was not its occupant at the time the agreement was made. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will see by referring to the Calendar that several days ago a unanimous-consent agreement was made that at 2.15 o'clock on this day the resolution known as the bond resolution, the resolution proposing an investigation of bond sales, should be taken up. But when that hour was reached to-day it happened that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was occupying the floor in an address upon the Du Pont resolution. The unanimous-consent, agreement was then continued over by an additional consent, so that the Senator from New Hampshire might conclude his remarks.

Mr. HOAR obtained the floor.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me? I will state that I have not objected to the request of the Senator from Kansas, and I do not now object. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that a unanimous-consent agreement to take up a bill or a resolution at some future time is nothing more nor less than making a special order of the measure for a particular time. It has no solemnity or importance beyond that.

Mr. FAULKNER. Oh, yes; it has.

Mr. HILL. And it is subject to the right of the Senate to take it up or to pursue any other course in regard to it which it sees fit. If it has any other effect, then I shall desire to object to an agreement being made.

Mr. FAULKNER. I think the effect of a unanimous-consent agreement to take up a measure at a particular time is that everything yields to the unanimous-consent agreement unless at that time unanimous consent is given to avoid the previous unanimous-consent arrangement. It is a very serious proposition.

Mr. HILL. It merely makes the measure a special order; that is all.

Mr. FAULKNER. No. A special ordef comes up in its turn, but a unanimous-consent agreement to proceed to the consideration of a measure at a particular time nothing can avoid in the Senate that I have ever seen except a unanimous-consent agreement to avoid it, whereas a majority vote or other procedure can set aside a special order.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the unanimous-consent agreement carefully understood before we proceed to do anything else.

Mr. PEFFER. So would I.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair was kind enough to recognize me before. One Senator stated—I think the Senator from Kansas—that there was a unanimous-consent agreement that the remarks of the Senator from Delaware should conclude the discussion on the Du Pont case. Now, I have never consented to any such agreement.

Mr. PEFFER. That is not the state of the case at all.

Mr. GRAY. That is not concluded.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. PEFFER. If Senators will bear with me for a moment, in the first place, as I said to the Senator from Massachusetts a few minutes ago, unanimous consent was given that at 2.15 o'clock this afternoon the Senate should proceed to the consideration of the bond resolution. It happened at the time when that hour was reached, 2.15 o'clock, that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was engaged in a speech upon the Du Pont resolution, and in order to accommodate that Senator and to retain the bond resolution with its unanimous-consent agreement before the Senate the resolution at my request was laid before the Senate, and then by unanimous consent it was agreed that the Senator from New Hampshire might continue his remarks, and at the conclusion of his remarks the Senator from Delaware——

Mr. GRAY. May I interrupt the Senator from Kansas right here?

Mr. PEFFER. The Senator from Delaware should proceed, and that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Delaware——

Mr. GRAY. That is right.

Mr. PEFFER. The bond resolution should be taken up.

Mr. GRAY. May I say a word right here? I wish to state that the Senator from Kansas has stated what I understood and what I think the Senate understood to be the unanimous-consent agreement. I should regret very much indeed if the courtesy extended to me to defer my remarks until to-morrow should at all interfere with what was the understanding as to the rights of the Senator from Kansas at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. PEFFER. What I have asked for, and what I understand, and I think the Chair understands, has been conceded, is that these preliminary efforts that are now being made—the consideration of matters such as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] wishes to present to the Senate—shall not in any way interfere with this unanimous-consent agreement, and that to-morrow, when the Senator from Delaware concludes his remarks upon the Du Pont resolution, we shall proceed to the consideration of the bond resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the agreement as stated by the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and such will be the order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. 100) for the relief of the estate of John R. Bigelow;

A bill (S. 1203) granting an increase of pension to Mary Doubleday, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Abner Doubleday;

A bill (S. 1317) to grant certain lands to the city of Colorado Springs, Colo.;

A joint resolution (S. R. 104) directing the Secretary of War to transmit to Congress a report on the survey of the waterway connecting the waters of Puget Sound, at Salmon Bay, with Lakes Union and Washington, and to submit an estimate of the cost of constructing said waterway; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 123) directing the Secretary of War to submit a plan and estimate for the improvement of the Nebraska side of the Missouri River, opposite Sioux City, Iowa.

TAXATION OF PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. PROCTOR. I renew my request that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3281) to authorize reassessments for improvements and general taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. I do not desire to interpose an objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont, but I should like to have the unfinished business laid before the Senate with a view to taking it up this afternoon and concluding it. There seems to be an opportunity which has been lacking for some weeks past.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill I have indicated.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in line 24, after the word "assessments," to insert:

And any amount heretofore paid upon an assessment which has been declared void shall be credited the owner upon the reassessment made under the provisions of this bill.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That in cases where such taxes or assessments shall be quashed or declared void by said court, for the reasons hereinbefore stated, the reassessments herein provided for shall be made within ninety days after the judgment or decree of said court quashing or setting aside such taxes or assessments, and any amount heretofore paid upon an assessment which has been declared void shall be credited the owner upon the reassessment made under the provision of this bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. I will read a brief letter from one of the Commissioners to the Hon. JAMES MCMILLAN, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia:

I beg to call your special attention to the urgent necessity for an early enactment of Senate bill 1376, to authorize the reassessment for local improvements and general taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. This bill, as I remember, passed the House and only awaits action by the Senate.

Every day writs are served upon the Commissioners to set aside special assessments; and as the bill does not propose to be retroactive, but only to reassess those which are hereafter quashed or set aside, the sooner the bill is passed the greater the amount that will be saved from the wreck.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

UNCOMPAHGRE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. VILAS to add the following proviso:

Provided, That any lands containing asphaltum, gilsonite, or like substances shall be reserved for proper disposition by Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I think remarks are unnecessary on this subject further than to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the——

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] desires to be heard in regard to the joint resolution, and he was assured by the unanimous-consent arrangement that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was to speak, to be followed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], and that then the bond resolution was to be taken up. He left the Chamber with that understanding, and therefore we can not very well proceed with this measure this afternoon.

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. HILL. I ask the Senator from Utah to move to adjourn or move an executive session, whatever is proper at this time.

Mr. CANNON. I do not yield for the purpose of permitting a motion to adjourn to be made. Before this matter proceeds further I think it fair to state that on a previous occasion, the only opportunity which we have had for the consideration of this measure since its first introduction, at the solicitation of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], I waived our opportunity to be heard. The joint resolution has been pending here for three weeks, confining myself and my colleague here constantly for fear that by some unanimous-consent arrangement the unfinished business might be relegated to obscurity. I think this is a good opportunity to go on with the question. The Senator from Wisconsin has been heard at great length; we also have been heard on our side, and I believe the Senate is as well prepared to vote on the amendment and on the original measure now as if we were to wait three weeks longer for a similar opportunity.

Mr. HILL. Last Thursday afternoon both Senators from Utah sat in their seats and permitted another matter to take the place of their bill by not objecting to the making of another matter a special order for to-day.

Mr. CANNON. We have——

Mr. HILL. To-day, a few moments ago, a single objection would have interfered with the unanimous-consent agreement given about continuing another subject. We expected the Senator from Delaware to speak this afternoon, following the Senator from New Hampshire. We can not very well proceed with the joint resolution this afternoon, Mr. President.

Mr. BROWN. I wish the Senator from New York would permit me to correct him in regard to his statement that we sat in our seats when the arrangement about the bond resolution was made. I was not here, or I certainly would have objected for one, as I had before, to taking up that particular measure. I did not intend to yield and I do not really understand that we will now.

Mr. HILL. I will change my expression and say the Senator ought to have been in his seat.

Mr. BROWN. I will remark to the Senator from New York that it is merely a special order and we still have a right to the floor.

Mr. HILL. I doubt the right to have presented this afternoon at 4 o'clock an unfinished business. We can not have three or four matters of unfinished business pending at the same time, each having the right of way, to come in at any time any Senator wants one to be brought in. There must be some system about this thing. I simply suggest to the Senator from Utah that we can not dispose of the joint resolution to-night. When the Senator from Wisconsin left the Chamber he said to me, "I assume the Delaware matter will be continued all the afternoon." He has no disposition to delay the joint resolution at all.

Mr. CANNON. I think it is a poor rule which will not work both ways. The distinguished Senator from New York rebuked the Senators from Utah a few moments ago with the statement that they should have been in their places to watch that nothing should intervene. I think the Senator from Wisconsin should have been in his place, then, to see that nothing should occur here which would be detrimental to interests which he represents. I do not choose, however, to be as severe in practice as in speech, and if any interest of this country is likely to suffer through the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin I am willing to defer the consideration of the joint resolution, asking, however, that there may be some understanding on this subject. I suppose that the unfinished business has the right of way, and no unanimous consent can interfere with the unfinished business unless by distinct understanding to that effect. I arrived at that conclusion from our having risen in our places so often in the attempt to protect the unfinished business that it has become already a matter of amusement to others. Now, if the unfinished business may stand on the Calendar to be taken up at the first opportunity to be afforded, and if it should be necessary to guard ourselves not only against the loss of our right on the Calendar, but against the criticisms of Senators like the distinguished gentleman from New York for our failure to interpose every time a proposition is made here, I shall be quite willing to have the joint resolution go over, pending the return of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HILL. If it will relieve the feelings of the Senator from Utah I will say that under the rules the Senator from Wisconsin should have been here also; but he left the matter in my charge, and therefore I look after it. I will also simply suggest to the Senator from Utah that if he expects to get his joint resolution acted upon within a reasonable time in the future somebody will have to be here to prevent unanimous consent being given in regard to other measures. It has already been demonstrated that unanimous-consent agreements do take the place not only of privileged questions like the Du Pont case but matters of unfinished business. We have now pending before the Senate, first, the privileged question. What that exactly means nobody seems to know. Then we have the unfinished business; then we have two or three special orders, and then we have unanimous-consent agreements, all demanding recognition at the same time.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. And appropriation bills.

Mr. HILL. And appropriation bills, as my friend from Arkansas on my left suggests, demanding priority.

Mr. FAULKNER. With one appropriation bill half through.

Mr. HILL. Half through, and suspended between heaven and earth. Therefore, I think somebody will have to be present here to look after these bills. Now, having exhausted the time until we have reached the proper time for adjournment, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the motion to adjourn the Chair will lay before the Senate sundry House bills for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 3610) for the relief of holders of certain District of Columbia tax-sale certificates, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 4452) to amend section 416 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 5790) to permit the Pintsch Compressing Company to lay pipes in certain streets in the city of Washington;

A bill (H. R. 6104) for the relief of Anton Gloetzner;

A bill (H. R. 6666) to authorize and regulate the sale of unclaimed freight, baggage, and other property in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 7139) to authorize the Falls Church and Potomac Railway Company of Virginia to extend its line into and within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 7264) to provide for the drainage of lots in the District of Columbia.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 2412) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against George Alcott on the rolls of the War Department; and

A bill (H. R. 3771) for the relief of Stratton H. Benscoter.

The bill (H. R. 1882) for the relief of John Ruhm, sr., Nashville, Tenn., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 8043) to amend an act to provide for holding terms of the United States court at Mississippi City was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 170) to provide for the proper distribution of the publication entitled "Messages and Papers of the Presidents" was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

UNCOMPAHGRE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator from New York to withdraw his motion so as to enable me to call up a bill.

Mr. HILL. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 115. The bill has been reported in several Congresses from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me for a moment that I may make an inquiry?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah for that purpose.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Chair kindly state the status of the unfinished business at the present time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will come up to-morrow morning at the conclusion of the morning hour, at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope nothing will occur here that will push aside the unfinished business represented by the Senator from Utah, so that it will lose its right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands it, the unfinished business will come up to-morrow, provided it is not set aside by an absolute unanimous-consent agreement of the Senate, or by an appropriation bill, or by the privileged question.

Mr. HILL. Or by a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Or by a vote of the Senate. There are several contingencies.

Mr. CANNON. The exceptions, it appears, are stronger than the rule. I desire to give notice to the Senator from New York that if opportunity shall offer to-morrow for the consideration of the unfinished business, if we may have the consent of the Senator to proceed with it, we shall be compelled to do so even if the Senator from Wisconsin shall not be present.

Mr. CULLOM. The other bill will displace it unless it is laid before the Senate prior to adjournment, and the Senator will lose his right to have it considered.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to have the unfinished business hold its place, and will therefore ask that it be temporarily laid aside so that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] may call up the bill he wishes to have considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order.

ESTATE OF RAMSAY CROOKS.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask leave to call up Order of Business 622, being the bill (S. 115) for the relief of the estate of Ramsay Crooks.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from Minnesota desire to proceed with the bill this evening?

Mr. DAVIS. If it gives rise to any debate I shall not desire to proceed with it. But the bill has been reported so many times that I think it will not give rise to any discussion.

Mr. CALL. Let the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily for the purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such is the request of the Senator from Minnesota. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The preamble recites that Ramsay Crooks, late of the State of New York, was, during the years 1842 to 1847, inclusive, a duly authorized and licensed trader, doing business with the Indians of Lake Superior, during which period he furnished the Indians a large amount of supplies necessary for their subsistence, and to enable them to carry on the chase; that in the year 1848 he was succeeded by others as traders for the Indians, whereby of necessity he left an outstanding indebtedness due to him from certain bands of the Indians, which has never been paid to him nor to his legal representatives. Also, that in his lifetime he filed claims in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, showing that there was due to him from the Pillager and Lake Winnibagoshish band $6,410.80, and from a certain other band, known as the Chippewa Indians of the Mississippi, $3,308.82, making a total amount of such indebtedness of $9,719.62.

The bill proposes to pay $9,719.62, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to examine the claims and pay the amount, or so much thereof as he shall find to be due, to the administrator of the estate of Ramsay Crooks, and charge the same to any annuities or other moneys due, or to become due, from the United States to these Indians, in such proportions as shall be found to be due therefrom.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

PRACTICE OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 5731.

Mr. HILL. If that can be done without prejudice to the Du Pont case, and without prejudice to the Utah joint resolution, and without prejudice to the bond resolution, I have no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have none, if it is done without prejudice to the Senator from New York.

Mr. HARRIS. And without prejudice to the long endurance of the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. It being a medical bill, it will not prejudice anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information, and the Chair will then inquire if there is objection to its present consideration.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill (H. R. 5731) to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire not to press the passage of that bill at this time. I shall be compelled to ask that it may go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish the Senator from Florida would not oppose this bill. I have been waiting for three months to get consideration for it, and the entire medical fraternity of all schools in this District are urging me to call it up. I want very much to have it acted upon.

Mr. CALL. I dislike to oppose anything that is suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, but I have very grave doubts whether all efforts to relieve or remedy human suffering should be made a crime unless made by half a dozen individuals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just one word. I hope the Senator from Florida will withdraw his opposition to the bill. I will say to the Senator that every State and Territory in the American Union but one has passed bills very similar to this measure, including the State of Florida. I think he will not object.

Mr. CALL. I understand that, too, but at the same time I gravely question whether the poor people of this country who can not employ physicians should be prohibited from having any philanthropic efforts made to relieve them and it should be made a crime unless it be done by license.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator object?

Mr. CALL. I object.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right, Mr. President. I shall try to take care of it later on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the bill is objected to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 15, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 14, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

A. B. PEDIGO.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 1280) for the relief of A. B. Pedigo was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to A. B. Pedigo, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $331.06, the same being balance due for carrying United States mails in the State of Texas from October 1, 1860, to May 31, 1861.

Mr. PITNEY. If there is a report on this case, I should like to hear it.

The report of the Committee on Claims was read.

Mr. PITNEY. I shall have to object, I think.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection until I can present some of the evidence in this case.

Mr. PITNEY. I am willing that the right to object be reserved, in order to enable the gentleman from Texas to make a statement.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I ask that a letter from the Auditor of the Post-Office Department be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 27, 1896.

SIR: In reply to a verbal inquiry relative to the claim of Mr. A. B. Pedigo, for carrying the mail in Texas in 1860, I have the honor to inform you that the records of this office show that A. B. Pedigo was the mail contractor on route No. 8619, Woodville to Beaumont, in the State of Texas, under a contract commencing July 1, 1858; that he was paid in full to September 30, 1860, and that a balance stands to his credit for service from October 1, 1860, to May 31, 1861, the date to which service has been certified, amounting to $331.06. The record of payments made by the Confederate States government, of claims of contractors for service performed prior to June 1, 1861, is found in a register which is incomplete, there being a number of leaves and parts of leaves missing, but so far as the record goes, there is no evidence of any payment having been made to Mr. Pedigo by the Confederate States government for service under his contract with the United States.

Very respectfully,

GEO. G. HOWARD, Auditor.

Hon. S. B. COOPER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Now I ask that the other documents which I have sent to the desk be read. They are short.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE STATE OF TEXAS, County of Tyler:

I, A. B. Pedigo, a citizen of the State of Texas and county of Tyler, do solemnly swear that I have never received payment from the United States of America for carrying United States mails in the State of Texas from October 1, 1860, to May 31, 1861, and that the Confederate States government never paid me for said mail service, and that the $331.06 is a just debt, and has never been paid.

A. B. PEDIGO.

Sworn to and subscribed before me by A. B. Pedigo, well known to me, on this the 6th day of February, A. D. 1896.

W. E. ADAMS,
A Notary Public Duly Qualified and Acting in and for Tyler County, Tex.

THE STATE OF TEXAS, County of Tyler:

I, William S. Durham, a citizen of the State of Texas and county of Tyler, do solemnly swear that I am well acquainted with Mr. A. B. Pedigo, who is also a citizen of said State and county, and have been acquainted with him from the year 1860 up to the present date, and have always known him to be a loyal citizen of the United States of America.

W. S. DURHAM.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, the undersigned notary public duly qualified and acting in and for Tyler County, Tex., on this the 6th day of February, A. D. 1896.

W. E. ADAMS,
A Notary Public in and for Tyler County, Tex.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman for whose relief this bill is presented was four years ago the Republican candidate for Congress in my district. His loyalty has never been questioned. The records of the Post-Office Department show that this debt is due, and it has never been paid either by the United States Government or by the Confederate States.

Mr. CANNON. Is this one of the so-called mail contractors' claims, aggregating a large amount—something like $300,000 or $400,000 or $500,000—growing out of transactions happening about the beginning of the war?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I do not understand this to be one of the claims to which the gentleman refers. The Government contracted with this man for carrying the mail, and he performed the service. Hostilities broke out, and he never was able to get his pay, no appropriation for that purpose having heretofore been made.

Mr. CANNON. Where was this service performed?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. In Texas.

Mr. CANNON. In 1861?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Yes, sir; anterior to secession.

Mr. PITNEY. As I understood the reading of the bill, the claim covers a period ending in 1863.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. No, sir; that is incorrect.

Mr. PITNEY. Whether that be so or not, is not this a man who, having been engaged in mail transportation for the Government, entered afterwards the Confederate postal service?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. No, sir; it is not. This man has been a loyal citizen—and a loyal Republican—all the time. As I have stated, he was the Republican candidate for Congress four years ago in the district which I now represent. He was loyal during the war, and his whole family have been loyal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PITNEY. I object.

Mr. CANNON. I call for the regular order.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the reading of the conference report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

HENRY H. BINGHAM,
JNO. E. McCALL,
ALEX. M. DOCKERY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, while I think the report, together with the statement of the conferees, is ample for the information of the House, if gentlemen had been able to hear, I will submit for further information a few references to the questions which have been in contention between the two Houses upon this bill. The bill as it passed the House has substantially, with the exception of the paragraphs pertaining to marshals and district attorneys, passed the Senate. Therefore many of the matters embraced in the House bill have not been in conference between the two Houses, because, as is shown by the statement which has been read, the House bill has been substantially agreed to by the Senate. The contentions have been wholly upon the bill as reported by the Senate committee or upon the bill as amended in the Senate.

The House committee in reporting this bill followed a close, perhaps severe, line of action and determined that for the next fiscal year but few, if any, additions to the subordinate force of the different Departments of the Government was needed for the proper conduct of business. Further than that, as private enterprise and general industries are nowhere adding to the compensation of subordinate force, your committee deemed it inexpedient to allow additional compensation to clerks in the several Departments. If the line which we drew was somewhat too close and exacting, we soon discovered in our contentions with the Senate that the line drawn by that body was far too generous—not warranted either by the condition of the country or the condition of the Treasury. The Senate added to the bill 314 amendments, 159 of them pertaining to the judicial sections of the bill. And right in that connection, Mr. Speaker, permit me to state for the information of the House that the committee, in this preliminary conference report, have left in abeyance for the next report all of the paragraphs pertaining to the disagreements between the House and Senate on the matter of the fees of marshals, district attorneys, clerks, and commissioners. While there have been agreements in reference to a number of the paragraphs, it was deemed wise to leave all of them out of this report, in order that the paragraphs of the bill might be properly numbered for the second conference.

It is well for me to note also in connection with this part of the bill that your committee in conference, following the same course pursued by the House in its deliberations upon the bill, and also by the Senate when the matter was before that body for consideration, called largely to their aid the gentlemen, members of the Committee on the Judiciary, who reported and advocated that bill on the floor of the House. Thus we had the advantage of the aid of Judge UPDEGRAFF, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. CULBERSON, Senator TELLER representing the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, Senator HOAR being at that time necessarily absent from our meeting. We concluded, after several hours of discussion and consideration, to refer the entire question to these four gentlemen, to have a conference again with the Attorney-General, going over each one of the paragraphs in detail and examining the objections that had been made to them in the discussion of the matter in the two Houses, so that when the committee of conference would meet again we would have submitted to us the best judgment of the representatives of the Judiciary Committees of the House and Senate after a consultation with the Department.

The Senate added to our bill $247,229.20, of which sum $57,000 has been disposed of by the House agreeing to $37,189 and the Senate yielding $19,450, leaving $189,590 involved in the amendments disagreed to, beside the proposed increase of the salaries of the United States attorneys, amounting to $65,500, and United States marshals, the increase amounting to $71,500.

For the information again of the House, I would state that the attrition in the conference was largely with reference to the matter of additional clerks, allowances, and increases of that character for the different Departments of the Government, which were passed over after discussion for further consideration.

The Senate contention was with reference to the increase of compensation of certain of the clerical force in the Senate, that is, certain clerks of Senate committees, increased from $1,440 to $1,800, making a sum total of $7,560, and——

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania state also, for the information of the House, that the salaries of the annual clerks for Senators have been increased by the Senate?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly; I will come to that in the course of my remarks.

Mr. DOCKERY (continuing). And also the increase in the pay of certain annual clerks.

Mr. BINGHAM. As far as the clerks of Senators are concerned, they are increased from $1,200 to $1,500 a year. But I will come to that in the course of my remarks hereafter.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If my colleague will permit me, did I understand him to say that the Senate not only retain their annual clerks, but increase their salary beyond the figure they are now receiving?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What is the amount of the increase?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will come to that increase, naturally, as I proceed with this part of the bill.

I have already stated that there are certain clerks to the committees in the Senate which are increased from $1,440 to $1,800, making a total of $7,560; 10 messengers at $1,440 in lieu of 12 laborers at $1,000 each, making an increase of $2,400; 2 laborers increased from $720 to $840 each, making a total of $240.

Now we come to the provisions for clerks to Senators. Thirty-eight clerks to Senators, who are not chairmen of committees, increased from $1,200 to $1,500 each; sum total, $57,000. In other words, the Senate increased the compensation of its subordinate force in sum total $67,200.

The Capitol police is also increased and is in controversy—12 privates at $1,100 each, instead of 7 watchmen at $840, an increase of $7,320. Library of Congress, the register of copyrights increased $2,000, and 3 clerks at $900 each, an increase of $4,700. Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury, from $4,000 to $5,000, increase of $1,000.

Printing 1,000 copies Naval Records	14,000
Under the Interior Department:
Laborers to distribute Census reports	3,960

For messenger to circuit court, Eighth circuit	2,000

I submit these are the paragraphs now in contention, all of which have been added to the bill by amendments either coming from the Senate committee, or by the Senate itself in the consideration of the bill in that body, leaving, therefore, between the two Houses $189,590. With reference to the expenditures on the part of the Senate, I desire to briefly state that I have in this House heard discussed more than once the rights, privileges, and prerogatives of the respective bodies. The House has upon many occasions fought persistently and determinedly as to the large increases and the very large allowances given by the Senate to its subordinate force. I have seen this House held hour after hour in dispute upon this issue.

I have never seen but one result, and that result has been the absolute concession on the part of the House to the Senate.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. With pleasure.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will ask the gentleman if the Senate does not always concede to the House the right to determine what help they shall have, and what salaries they shall pay?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. And they simply exact——

Mr. BINGHAM. The same.

Mr. HOPKINS. They simply exact that the House shall not interfere with them in their organization.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes. I would state—it is hardly necessary for me to do it, because my remarks, I think, warrant the conclusion—that they have persistently fought for what they claim to be their rights and privileges in the control of their own body.

But I have felt it but justice to the House to state that in view of the large increases at the present time, without attempting now to express an opinion as to whether the respective bodies should absolutely control their own organization—I have my own view about it, which is that they should—I propose to enter into no debate upon the general proposition, but in view of the large increases I have deemed it just to those of us who are identified closely with the people and who are held almost directly responsible for the expenditures of the Government that we should not be held responsible for a very large sum of money that goes to the conveniences of the other body.

In that connection permit me to state that the bill as agreed on appropriates $338,162.50 for compensation of 295 officers and employees of the House, exclusive of reporters of debates and committees, and reimbursements to members for clerk hire, actual expenditures not exceeding $100 per month during the session, which is an average of about four officers and employees with average pay of $1,115 each to every five members of the House; average cost per member of the House for compensation of officers and employees, $939. That is our domestic exhibit.

The bill as it passed the Senate and as insisted on by the conferees appropriates $403,528.90 for compensation of 273 officers and employees of the Senate, exclusive of reporters of debates and committees, and clerks of Senators, $1,200 each, now increased to $1,500 each, which is an average of more than three officers and employees with average pay of $1,478 each to each Senator, while the House has four employees with an average pay of $1,115 each to every five members of the House.

Now, I do not propose to make any contention, so far as I am concerned, in this matter and in this statement to the House. The contest we make shall be made in committee; but I submit that it is but justice to the House that there should be made notorious upon the records of our Congress, in the deliberations on this bill, the fact that so far as the House administers its own affairs economy and care are exercised.

Whether there is extravagance at the other end of the Capitol I will not state nor assert. Certainly the same economy does not exist there which I think exists in this body.

With that statement, believing that the Senators will force a fight unremittingly for what they claim to be their rights and prerogatives—as I believe this House would if the balance sheet were on the other side—having made this statement to the House, I feel, as representing the conferees, that I have done full and fair justice to both Chambers.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to suggest to the gentleman that he might bring that comparison into more intelligible shape by showing what the per capita expense of the members of the House is, in contrast with the per capita expense of the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have done that, and emphasized it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman has done it in a rather bulky manner.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. The gentleman has stated that there are four House employees to every five members of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have stated it, and I will give it to you again. The average cost for each member of the House, for compensation of officers and employees, is $939. For each Senator, for compensation of officers and employees of the Senate, the cost is $4,483. That covers it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Nearly five to one.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Nearly five to one.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], if he desires any time.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] desired to submit some observations on Senate amendments numbered 39 and 40, but was compelled to leave the Hall in order to attend a session of the Committee on Elections of which he is a member; and he requested me to make that statement, and also to ask leave to print some remarks in the RECORD in respect to those amendments. I prefer that request in his behalf.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DINGLEY). The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] desires leave to print remarks on the amendments suggested by the gentleman from Missouri. Without objection, that leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that it is necessary to add a single observation to the very able statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] in charge of this conference report. He has given in detail and in aggregate not only the items upon which the conferees have agreed, but has also as to the items yet in disagreement.

It may be well to state, in addition to what he said, that substantially all the provisions, so far as they relate to the judicial paragraphs of the bill, have been informally agreed upon, except the salaries of marshals and attorneys. These are, perhaps, items that may occasion much difficulty in conference. The paragraph in reference to commissioners is also yet in disagreement. I think it is well that the House also understand the contention between the conferees in reference to the increase of force and salaries made by the Senate as to its own employees. The aggregate increase, as given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, amounts to about $67,000. The House is familiar with this old controversy. We have brought it back to the House in order that you may be advised of the situation before we recede, if such action shall be found to be wise or necessary hereafter. To speak in detail, it may be well to say that the House should know that the Senate has inserted a paragraph providing 38 annual clerks for Senators not chairmen of committees, and has also increased the salaries of those clerks from $1,200 to $1,500 each. I make this statement, in addition to what the gentleman has so well said, in order that the House may be fully advised.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I would like the gentleman to state what objection there is to the allowance of the amendment of the Senate numbered 142, providing for advance copies of the decisions of the Supreme Court for the judges of the district and circuit courts of the United States. It seems to me entirely obvious that those judges should be furnished with the decisions of the highest tribunal of the country before they are issued in the bound volume. I do not think anybody in the House would object to that if it was fully understood, and I simply wish to make this a matter of inquiry.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is one of the items in disagreement. The conferees desired some further information in respect to it. I do not think the fact that it is reported at this time as one of the disagreements necessarily means that it may not ultimately be agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state to the gentleman from New Hampshire, for his information, that the court now furnishes about 31 copies to the circuit courts, but it is not sufficient, and they have asked for this additional number. They have been paid for out of the surplus fees of the court. One of the contentions of the committee is that this should go on the sundry civil appropriation bill and should not stand upon this legislative bill, and it is a matter also on which they desire further information.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. One moment. I understand the judges of the circuit courts are now getting them, and this is to give it also to the judges of the district courts?

Mr. BINGHAM. They get 31, I understand.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania correctly, the bill as reported now by the conference committee allows clerks to Senators at a salary of $1,500 a year.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the Senate amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is a matter in disagreement.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That has not been agreed to?

Mr. BINGHAM. Correct.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Are not the Senate conferees insisting upon that amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; I have so stated.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the status of clerks to members on this bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. The clerks to members have no status whatever.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no allowance for members' clerks in the bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. The allowance for members' clerks in this bill is $100 per month, when the member certifies that he has expended that much during the month, during the session of Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, then, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he is going to recommend that the House give its assent to the proposition that Senators shall have $1,500 a year for annual clerks, and confine ourselves to this $100 a month while Congress is in session only, and then when certified only? Will the conferees recommend us to agree to that?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the paragraph providing for 38 clerks to Senators, which are clerks to Senators not chairmen of committees, is an amendment added to our bill by the Senate. There is no disagreement between the two Houses as to the allowance in the bill for clerks to members of the House. The Senate has agreed to that paragraph of the bill as the House reported it. Therefore, there is no contention as to that; but there is a contention, until we reach an agreement in final report, as to what shall be the allowance for annual clerks to Senators not chairmen of committees. There is no contention between the two Houses on that point. The paragraph covering the allowance for clerks to members has been agreed upon by the two Houses, and therefore it is not in dispute.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the question I ask is, whether the conferees on the part of the House intend to recommend to the House to agree to that difference between the compensation of Senators' clerks and the compensation of clerks to members? The Senators can not get $1,500 a year for their clerks unless the House agrees to it, I suppose.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly it can not be done unless the House agrees; but that is not a subject of contention here. That paragraph is not even under consideration.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The fact is that the Senators are claiming that the salaries of their clerks should be increased from $1,200 to $1,500 a year, is it not?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is an amendment to the bill, but we are in the House now upon our conference report.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The House conferees are disagreeing to that amendment on the part of the Senate?

Mr. BINGHAM. We are disagreeing to that—just what the gentleman desires, as I understand.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My question is, whether the conferees intend to recommend to the House to yield that point and agree to the amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. That I do not know.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that when the opportune time arrives I shall move to instruct the House conferees to recede from their disagreement, with an amendment providing for annual clerks for Members of this House and for Delegates. [Applause.]

Mr. LACEY. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BINGHAM. With pleasure.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the item numbered 142, I am not sure that I understand what it involves. I understand the gentleman to say that it is a provision to furnish advance sheets of the various law reports of the United States courts. I wish to say that the necessity for advance reports no longer exists. There is no judge who does not avail himself of the present opportunities for obtaining the published reports of Federal court proceedings through the various weekly publications, which are long ahead of any of the regular official reports, so that there will be no necessity for furnishing advance sheets from the regular reports.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is a matter for consideration by the committee. Now, there is a further question as to that paragraph—not about the substance of the paragraph, but about its relation to legislation—as to whether the paragraph should be on this bill or on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. If you are going to give these advance sheets to the circuit judges you certainly ought to give them to the district judges also.

Mr. LACEY. There is no necessity for giving them to either.

Mr. HOPKINS. But you do now allow them to the circuit judges, and you ought either to take them away from the circuit judges or else extend the allowance to the district judges.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the gentleman for the information he has given me. He understands that that matter is in controversy.

Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House until I tell what I am going to talk about, I have no fear but that I shall have it afterwards.

A MEMBER. Clerks?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; clerks. I want to talk for a few minutes about that which is in the minds of most of the members of the House, touching the transaction of their business and the proper aids thereto, especially in relation to clerks to members. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has just said that there is nothing in conference between the House and the Senate touching clerks to Representatives. There is in conference between the House and the Senate the bare question as to whether the clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees shall have an increase of compensation from $1,200 per annum to $1,500 per annum. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] gives notice that at the proper time he will move that the House recede from its disagreement to that provision for Senate clerks, with an amendment providing for clerks for members. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has well said that that is not germane, and no doubt, if necessary, he will say later on that it is subject to a point of order, as there is no existing law authorizing it. I call attention to this now for the purpose of making a suggestion to the House. If it be really the opinion of the House that clerks to members should receive pay during vacation as they now receive it during the session, there are two ways to get at it and to get at it under the rules, and only two ways.

I am in full sympathy with the practical notice which is given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in charge of this bill, that this thing can not be done out of order upon a general appropriation bill. But it can be done, it is entirely practicable, and it will be done, if the House by a majority desires it should be done, by independent legislation, the passing through this body of a bill giving the allowance to clerks for members during the vacation. I have no doubt that the Senate would make haste to pass such a bill if we should send it to them, and then we would do by right what otherwise would have to be done without law and in an irregular manner.

That is one way to do it. There is another way to do it without such independent legislation. For several years the Senate paid the clerks to Senators from the contingent fund by a resolution of the Senate. Gentlemen all understand what the contingent funds of the Senate and the House are. You can appropriate whatever amount is necessary for the business of the House or of the Senate for the contingent fund, and moneys are paid from the contingent fund of either body by resolution of that body. So that if it be really in the minds of members that this compensation should be allowed for clerks to members during vacation, it can be arrived at by the introduction of a resolution covering that authority, its reference to the Committee on Accounts, and the reporting back of that resolution by the Committee on Accounts as a matter of privilege for the consideration of the House.

Now, either of those ways is legal, and either is manly and in order. I say again that if gentlemen want this allowance in vacation and are willing to stand up and be counted and go upon the roll, and a majority of the members of the House vote for it, it can be done without any trouble in either of the ways I have named.

Mr. BINGHAM. And without any violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Without any violation of the rules of the House.

A MEMBER. And without any violation of propriety.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; without any violation of propriety. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania states (and I am in full sympathy with him), if this is to be done at all it will be done in one of those two ways.

Now, I would not be entitled to any allowance for clerk hire under such a provision, because I happen to be the chairman of a committee. Yet I did vote in the last Congress for a law to authorize it, and I went upon the record to that effect.

I think the statement that the expenditures for a member of the House are less than a thousand dollars while those for a Senator are pretty well up toward $5,000 tells one of two things: Either the expenditures for the Senate are extraordinary and extravagant or the expenditures for the House are too little. Perhaps there is some truth in both branches of the statement. I think our expenditures might well be enlarged along the line indicated for the pay of these clerks in vacation, and I am of opinion that the expenses of the Senate might well be reduced.

I have thought it proper that I should say this much, dealing with the House in perfect frankness touching the matter before it.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Can the gentleman state any way in which any separate resolution or bill for this purpose can be brought before this House without unanimous consent or through the Committee on Rules before the adjournment of the present session?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. I have already answered that question. The Committee on Rules is the creation of the House, from its chairman to all its members. I have found in this Congress and in former Congresses that the Committee on Rules was always ready, like other committees, to meet a decided wish of the majority of the House. I have no doubt that it is so now.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the gentleman suggest a petition to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; not at all. The gentleman understands that whenever there is a well-settled desire on the part of the House to consider anything the Committee on Rules, as I understand—I have not the honor to be a member of it—is now, as it has been at all times heretofore, ready to respond, because the House is greater than any of its committees.

I will tell the gentleman—indeed, I did tell him a moment ago—another method of proceeding. Independent of any special order, it is quite in order, as I understand, for any member to introduce in this House a resolution authorizing the payment of this allowance during vacation from the contingent fund of the House; it is entirely in order to refer such a resolution to the Committee on Accounts, which is a privileged committee; and it is quite in order and perfectly practicable to get that resolution before the House for consideration. If such a resolution were adopted such payments would undoubtedly be made.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman guarantee a favorable report from that committee?

Mr. CANNON. I do not care whether the report is favorable or unfavorable. The committee will no doubt report; and then it is in the power of the House to do whatever a majority pleases with the resolution. I perhaps might put the matter another way, and I do not put it offensively—whatever a majority believes is right and has the courage to do may be done. [Applause.]

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I think that both the answers of the gentleman have enforced the point I desired to make. Now, I wish to ask him another question.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. If the House conferees should request the Senate conferees to agree to add to this bill an amount for annual clerks of members of the House, does not the gentleman from Illinois believe the Senate conferees would assent to the proposition?

Mr. CANNON. The matter is not in conference. It is impossible under the rules of the House to get upon this legislative bill in conference any provision that will make it in order to consider this question of allowances for annual clerks to members.

Mr. BLUE. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BLUE. If the House should see fit by resolution to authorize members to employ clerks for the rest of the year, would it not be in order to add to the general deficiency bill an amount sufficient to cover the expenditure?

Mr. CANNON. Quite in order.

Mr. BLUE. And that bill has not yet come in.

Mr. CANNON. The House can pass an appropriation for its contingent fund of one dollar or any number of dollars.

Mr. CULBERSON rose.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] desire to be recognized?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BINGHAM. With pleasure.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that one point of difference between the House and the Senate is the pay of clerks to Senators. Is that so?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is correct.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then the committee will have to recommend either that the Senate recede from its amendment or that the House recede from its disagreement and concur in that amendment. Now, I want to know if it is not entirely competent for the House conferees to recede from the disagreement to the Senate amendment with an amendment of the character suggested?

Mr. BINGHAM. Of what character?

Mr. CULBERSON. Providing for clerks to the members of the House at $100 per month.

Mr. BINGHAM. On an amendment pertaining to the employees of the Senate, not the House? It would not be in order.

Mr. DOCKERY. In other words, such an amendment would not be germane.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not at all. They are entirely different parts of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Why would it not be in order?

Mr. BINGHAM. Because it is a change of existing law, and we are acting under the rules of the House.

Mr. CULBERSON. But who is to object to it if it is put on in the Senate?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move that the House recede from amendment numbered 19, relative to the annual clerks for Senators, with an amendment which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 19 of the Senate, relating to 38 annual clerks to the Senators, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: "And for 360 annual clerks to Members and Delegates of the House, at $100 per month, $432,000."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I must make the point of order that the amendment is not germane, and the further point, if necessary, that it is contrary to existing law.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Montana desire to be heard upon the question of order?

Mr. HARTMAN. Not on the point of order, but I would like to appeal to my friend from Pennsylvania, who I understand is in harmony with the legislation asked for here, with the idea of aiding the Representatives and Delegates on the floor in the speedy and proper discharge of their duties, to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. That I could not do. I am in charge of the conference report, and therefore have no individuality in the matter. I must act for the whole body.

Mr. HARTMAN. I know; but is it not proper to insert what is sought to be inserted here in this appropriation bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. I think it has been clearly stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that there is another and a proper way to reach the conclusion the gentleman seeks, if it is the wish of the House. It is contrary to the rule now, and subject to the point of order, and under the circumstances it becomes my duty to make the point of order and insist upon it.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to be heard on the point of order if the gentleman from Pennsylvania feels compelled to insist upon it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am compelled to insist.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the rules of the House, the Chair must hold that the point of order is well taken.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House insist upon its disagreement to the other amendments of the Senate, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BINGHAM, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The Speaker appointed Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. MCCALL of Tennessee, and Mr. DOCKERY as conferees on the part of the House.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole under the order of the House for the consideration of general appropriation bills, and the Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8109) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, in presenting to the consideration of the committee the current appropriation bill for fortifications a brief time spent in retrospect may, I think, be not without advantage.

It is well known to the older members, as well as to those who have given this subject consideration, that at the beginning of the late civil war our seacoast was in the then development of the science of warfare well defended. In other words, and generally speaking, our principal ports had such works of defense as would enable them to successfully resist the encroachments of any navy of any nation in the world which might be sent against us.

Commencing, however, with that period, a period remarkable for invention and improvement in every direction, we find a corresponding improvement in armament, in ships, in armor plating, in guns; in short, in every matter connected with offensive or defensive warfare.

I know of no better way in which to illustrate and bring home to the members of the committee the fact to which I have alluded than to say that the weight of the projectiles used in modern warfare exceed by twentyfold the weight of the projectiles used prior to 1860. The energy with which the shots of to-day are delivered exceeds even by thirtyfold the energy of the shots which were fired prior to that time. We have entered upon an era of armored vessels, of rapid-firing guns, of heavy guns which possess immense energy or smashing power. It therefore follows that the armament which was entirely sufficient prior to 1860 is practically useless to-day.

The Army and Navy, the civilians of our country, those who are mostly interested in the defense of our country, were not slow in marking this wonderful advance, and we find at an early date the attention of the Army and Navy and of our most thoughtful civilians was directed to the necessity of a better defense of our seacoasts.

Time passed, and while we had much of agitation and much of talk, practically nothing was done until 1885, when the pressure upon Congress was so great that an act of Congress was passed authorizing the President of the United States to form what was known as the Endicott Board, consisting of two officers of the Army, two of the engineering force, two of the Navy, and two eminent civilians, presided over by the Secretary of War, who were charged with the important duty of investigating this entire subject and presenting a comprehensive scheme of defense for the country. That board, after nine months of the study, made an elaborate report, which is now before me, known as the Report of the Endicott Board, a report which has remained the foundation of all that has been since done.

Although there have been some modifications of this report, caused by changed conditions and some further investigations, that report remains to-day as the foundation not only of all which was then deemed proper and wise to do, but what is so deemed to-day.

That report pointed out the immense need of fortifications, that need which must be apparent to every thinking person in the United States. They pointed out the fact that we had 4,000 miles of seacoast, which was then and now is practically undefended. We recognize the fact, when we come to think of it, that there are at these great seaports, the harbors of our country, to which access has been made easy by nature and the ways to which we have deepened to receive the largest ships that float, at least $10,000,000,000 worth of property which may be destroyed by the navy of a warring power. We recognize the fact that within those cities there are $100,000,000 worth of public buildings alone, which might be so destroyed. And yet 1 per cent of the total destructible property in those cities is sufficient to constitute what would be to-day a perfect and impregnable defense for that immense property and our country.

It seems to me, it has seemed to your committee, it has seemed to every thoughtful person who has investigated this matter, that these stupendous figures call upon the people of the United States, through their Congress, to take some efficient steps looking to a proper defense of our country. In these cities which thus invite attack we spend annually for police and fire protection an amount sufficient to thoroughly defend them. One per cent of $10,000,000,000 of destructible property would place this country in a condition where it could successfully meet at the boundary any force which might be brought against it.

With this conceded condition of the country, the question arises, What has been done?

The Endicott Board, in its consolidated estimate which I find on page 28 of its report, provided for the defense of 27 of these principal ports. Their estimate of the required expenditure was, in round numbers, in the aggregate, $126,000,000, of which $9,700,000 was for torpedo boats, $4,300,000 for submarine mines and their adjuncts, $18,875,000 for floating batteries, and the remainder, about $97,000,000, for ordnance and engineering work.

Now, turning to page 24 of the same report, I find the defense which is recommended contemplates the employment of 44 16-inch guns, 6 14-inch guns, 203 12-inch guns, 222 10-inch guns, 102 8-inch guns, 4 6-inch guns, and 724 mortars, being 700 of 12-inch and 24 of 10-inch caliber, respectively.

That, in brief, is the scheme which was then outlined. Gentlemen will observe that in this plan the expenditure contemplated was about $29,000,000 for floating defense and $97,000,000 for land defense.

What has been done since? We have expended and authorized for our floating defense, from that time up to the present, $110,000,000; and during this session of Congress the House has passed a bill which authorizes the expenditure of $26,000,000 more. In other words, the provision thus far made for floating defense has aggregated over $136,000,000. What has been done in the way of land defense? The testimony which I have before me shows in that time we have expended for engineer work only $4,500,000 and for ordnance work about $7,200,000. In other words, as against the recommendation of $97,000,000, we have expended $11,700,000, while for the naval defense we have expended and authorized up to the present time about $136,000,000. If we proceed at that rate—if in eight years we have expended only $11,000,000, while a total expenditure of $97,000,000 is required—I ask you when we may expect to have a sufficient and efficient defense in this country?

Let it be remembered also that when we expend money so parsimoniously for this or any great object a very large proportion of the amount which we actually expend must necessarily be taken up in the work of repairs, maintenance, salaries, and other general fixed charges, and but a small portion of it can be devoted to the completion of the system of defense which all concede the country demands. A navy, while an effective arm of defense, is not sufficient. It needs the protection of fortifications, under the shelter of which it may make necessary repairs, obtain supplies, and from which it may go forth on its work of offensive warfare. The navy is to seacoast defense what the cavalry is to the army. It does the skirmishing, it carries the flag abroad, and is much in evidence on occasions of pomp and display; but after all, the infantry inland and the forts on the coast do the real fighting. All history and experience are to this effect.

I submit in this condition of the country the people may well look to Congress to borrow of experience and take heed of the lessons of prudence and ordinary foresight. To-day, while the country is awake to the importance of this subject, it is our duty to make sufficient appropriation and thus meet the demands of the country, insuring its safety.

Our danger to-day is not from within. Our people are united. Peace dwells within our borders. Momentarily we are depressed and our industries languish, but in the near future, unless all signs fail, our wealth will again grow apace. Our people will be fully employed and our accumulations will more and more tempt the avarice of the world.

What appropriations have been made in the past?

From 1875 to 1886, inclusive, the appropriations averaged only $540,750 per annum.

In the years 1887 and 1888 no appropriations were made.

From 1888 to the present time the appropriations for fortifications aggregate $22,489,224.50, or an average of $2,811,128.06 per annum; but even of this only about one-half was appropriated for the purposes contemplated by the Endicott Board.

Not only was the aggregate of appropriations ridiculously small, but the Secretary of War called the attention of the country in his last report to the fact that even under the small appropriations there has been no sort of correspondence between the several items of the bill, and the several branches of seacoast defense have not been symmetrically developed. In other words, that while we have expended a small amount for guns appropriate for defense we have appropriated a much smaller amount proportionately for carriages upon which these guns must be mounted. We have appropriated a still smaller amount for emplacements in which these guns must be fixed in order to be effective. For gentlemen will bear in mind that a gun must be mounted on a carriage and it must be emplaced before it can be rendered effective if it is to deliver shots against the enemy. Guns without carriages and carriages without emplacement are of absolutely no force or effect as an agency for defense or offense.

This appropriation is made doubly important by the further consideration that a gun on land is vastly more effective than a gun on a ship. Let me call the attention of the members of the committee who do me the honor to listen to the fact that the testimony before our committee showed that a gun on board a vessel has an effectiveness of only one-fifth to one-third of the effectiveness of a gun on land. The testimony also shows that the cost of a gun on shipboard is from three to five times as great as the cost of a gun on land. In other words, that a dollar expended on land defense is from nine to twenty-five times as effective, in the first instance, as on board a vessel, while the cost of maintenance of a naval defense is infinitely greater than that of a land defense. Place a fortification once in good condition and there it remains for your posterity and mine; but place it on a vessel, complicated as it is, while that vessel to-day may be a splendid instrument of offensive and defensive warfare, the next year it has already been relegated to the past, either because of improvements constantly being made or by the destructive agencies which necessarily work upon it.

Such being the case, it behooves us to place in proper condition our land defense; and to that end your committee has devoted itself. We brought before us the experts, those who are qualified to speak on the matter, and we went about it in a business-like way, and I believe in a patriotic way, with a view to present here to the consideration of this House and this committee a bill making substantial progress in the direction of providing an effective defense. I am profoundly impressed with the overwhelming necessity for ushering in a new era of national defense. The bill which we present provides in bulk $11,384,000 for this defense. Of this amount there is a direct appropriation of $5,842,337, while contracts are authorized in the additional amount of $5,542,276.

Up to this time in our appropriation bills which have become laws, provision has been made for 129 guns, 61 carriages, and only 34 emplacements. In other words, we have provided for 68 more guns than we have carriages, for 95 more guns than we have emplacements, and for 27 more carriages than we have emplacements. Under the provisions of this bill, however, we shall have provided for 173 guns, 140 carriages, and 122 emplacements. In other words, at the end of the next fiscal year, if this bill is enacted into law, the guns will be only 33 in advance of the carriages and only 41 in advance of the emplacements, while the carriages will be only 8 in advance of the emplacements. That is to say, the guns will not be to exceed one year in advance of the other branches of the service.

On this point let me suggest for the consideration of the committee that perhaps no mistake has been made in the past in permitting the existence of the discrepancy to which attention has been called by the Secretary of War and to which I have alluded thus far in my remarks, for we find that in order to construct these large seacoast guns from two to three years are required. The forgings for these guns must necessarily be provided in advance even of entering upon the construction of the guns proper. Much time is necessary for the construction of the guns, very much more time than is required for the construction of the carriages or emplacements, and it was therefore, perhaps, the part of wisdom to construct the guns first and to make a considerable advance in that branch of the service.

Another thing to which the attention of the committee is specially challenged is the marked advance which has been made in the work of constructing carriages. Under the provision of the Endicott Board, and as was contemplated for many years thereafter by the Engineering and Ordnance Departments, these heavy guns were manipulated by means of enormous lifts, which were operated by machinery complicated in its structure and necessarily very costly. In these later years invention has proceeded, so that instead of these heavy gun lifts, involving an enormous outlay of money and labor, there has been gradually evolved what is known as the disappearing gun carriage, which enables the gun to be loaded under cover, then raised and fired, and returned to its position completely hidden. This disappearing carriage is very much cheaper than the old-fashioned gun lift and fully as efficient (viewed from an engineering standpoint, much safer for the gunners), and it has been estimated by experts there will be a saving by the substitution of the disappearing carriages of fully $19,500,000, while the saving in the casements, in engineering work, will be about $9,500,000. In other words, it is estimated that there will be a saving from the use of the disappearing carriages of about $29,000,000. So that the work which has been proceeding more rapidly in the direction of making heavy guns than of making carriages has, in the end, inured to the financial advantage of the country. We have not had the benefit of protection meanwhile, but we have saved our money, applying it on our debts, and thus far have suffered no loss. We have, in other words, been extremely fortunate.

There has been already evolved, as I have said, a perfectly satisfactory disappearing carriage for the 8-inch and 10-inch guns, and it is now believed by the Ordnance Department they have also devised a perfectly satisfactory disappearing carriage for the 12-inch guns; so that we can now proceed, and I think properly proceed, to bring these several branches of our service more nearly into correspondence. Proceeding on this theory, we have recommended a large increase for carriages and emplacements. We have allowed for our gun and carriage factories an amount sufficient to enable them to work at full time, and have made corresponding appropriations also for the Engineering Department, so that at the end of the fiscal year for which we are providing we shall have the several branches of the service into something like reasonable correspondence, and with the expiration of another year it is thought the several branches will be brought as nearly upon a plane of equal development as the nature of the undertaking permits.

I have now only to call the attention of the committee to the amount which we have provided for contract work. Let me suggest further on this point——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If I may interrupt the gentleman, I was unable to hear his statement with regard to the whole amount appropriated by this bill. What is the amount?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The amount appropriated in money is $5,842,337, while contracts are provided for in addition amounting to $5,543,276, and for which appropriations must hereinafter be made. The cash appropriation will carry the work to March 4, 1897.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. That makes about $11,000,000.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. This bill carries in cash and by contract obligations $11,385,613.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The bill gives authority to the Secretary of War to make contracts involving, as the gentleman says, an expenditure of over $5,000,000.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. In what length of time is that money to be drawn from the Treasury?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. There is no stated time. The gentleman understands that this is not an annual bill. The amounts appropriated here are made immediately available and remain available until they are expended. There is no limitation placed on the Secretary of War save the limitation of his discretion, a discretion upon which we thought we could safely rely.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The bill carries an appropriation, then, for coast defenses amounting to about $6,000,000, as I understand?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. This is practically all for the coast defense.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Then the amount for coast defenses would be practically about $11,000,000. Will the gentleman please state where those defenses are to be located—at what particular cities?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That is a matter within the discretion of the Secretary of War. The bill does not undertake to make any apportionment between cities or ports. I have called attention to the fact that by the report of the Endicott Board and the Puget Sound Board, which was made supplemental thereto, 28 principal ports have been suggested for the erection of fortifications, and the appropriations thus far made have been used for the purpose of making suitable defenses at those points.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I suppose the committee, in estimating how much money would be required, took into consideration the points where works of defense would probably be constructed, and I should like the gentleman to state, if he can, where the money will probably be expended.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman, on reflection, will certainly see that it would not have been wise for the committee to go into that question, nor would it be proper for such a question as that to be discussed here in this body.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Does the gentleman believe that the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill will be sufficient to protect our coast?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Oh, no; certainly not. But if succeeding Congresses take up the line of work for which we have here appropriated——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Then this is only a commencement?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It is practically a commencement, but a very good one. I have already called attention to the fact that the recommendations of the Endicott Board involve an expenditure of about $126,000,000. This amount will be reduced by changes already discussed, and, on the other hand, additions must be made for new points not considered by the board. We have thus far appropriated about $22,000,000, and very nearly one-half of that amount has been for objects not contemplated by the Endicott Board. So that thus far we have appropriated only about $11,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out the recommendations of that board. We now make provision here for the expenditure of about $11,000,000 more. In other words, this bill proposes to do substantially as much for coast defense as has been done in all the years since 1888.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Then about $100,000,000 more will be required.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I thought the gentleman said that something over $120,000,000 in all would be necessary.

Mr. GROUT. That was the estimate of the Endicott Board.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. What I wanted was an estimate or opinion of the committee as to how much would probably be required for coast defenses beyond the appropriations contained in this bill.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. In my individual judgment—I would not undertake to bind the committee by any such expression of opinion—it will require about $75,000,000 more. In other words, it will require about eight years to complete these defenses. On this subject I call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to this language, which was used by the direct representative of the Secretary of War in the hearings before the committee:

> The completion of the project depends ultimately upon the maximum rate of construction of guns and mortars, that rate being the slowest in the construction of any of the items entering into the system. The quota of 8, 10, and 12 inch guns can be completed in eight years, with sufficient appropriations to attain the maximum rate at the Government factory; the quota of mortars can be completed in nine years on the same condition, and the carriages can be completed as rapidly as the guns and mortars. But since by the end of the eighth year a very large part of the mortars and their carriages would be finished, eight years may be fixed as the minimum possible limit for the completion of the entire work.

The committee have taken this statement as approximately correct, and have made appropriations not only covering the estimate originally submitted to us, but exceeding that amount by about $4,000,000, thus, so far as we could, committing Congress and the country to a speedy completion of our coast defenses and within "the minimum possible limit" suggested by the Secretary of War. In this, Mr. Chairman, we believe we are obeying simply the wise demands which are made upon us by the people.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The gentleman's statement is very interesting to me; and I hope he will excuse me for another question.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. What length of time and what amount of appropriation per annum will be required, in the judgment of the gentleman, to complete our coast defenses?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. In my judgment we have just about determined the annual limit in this bill. If each succeeding Congress makes an equal appropriation and gives equal authorization these coast defenses will be completed in about eight years. That is about as rapidly as, according to our present information, they can be completed.

Now, gentlemen of the Committee of the Whole will bear in mind that the work on the guns, upon which manifestly the entire system of defense must hinge, can not be pushed beyond a certain limit. The work of producing the forgings out of which the guns are made consumes necessarily a large amount of time; the assembling and finishing of these guns necessarily takes much time. The work of constructing carriages can be expedited; while there is practically no limit other than the financial one which can be placed upon the work of the engineering department. So therefore it behooves us to continue and press forward this work of completing our heavy seacoast guns, keeping that work in advance of the other branches of the service. This we have undertaken to do in the bill which is before us.

I have already called attention to the fact that we have made adequate provision for our gun and carriage factories. There has been no stinting of provision for these important factories, establishments which it seemed to the committee are deserving the highest meed of praise for the excellent work they have thus far done.

Our guns there made are conceded by experts to be as good as the best. Our carriages are satisfactory to the War Department.

The quality of what we have is excellent. Our only lack is in quantity. That lack time and money will supply.

We have also made a reasonable appropriation in this bill for field and siege guns, looking, as we thought we had a right to look, to a proper equipment of the land forces of the United States that might be called upon to meet any forces which might land upon our coast. We have also made an appropriation up to the full estimate for the procurement of sites for fortifications.

The other items of the bill are those which usually abound in bills of this character. Respecting them I need only say we have in almost every instance given the full amount of the estimate.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman from Nebraska state the character of the engineering work to which he has referred? Does it relate to the emplacement of the guns and carriages, and work of that character?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The usual character of such work.

Mr. STEELE. Since the advent of the disappearing gun carriages do they build these on the same plans as formerly?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Not necessarily. Of course the gentleman will understand that the disappearing gun carriages do not require the immense fortification or masonry that was formerly required.

Mr. STEELE. Nor of dirt, either.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No; but they do necessarily require engineering construction of a most important character and involving much labor and expense. I assume, of course, neither the gentleman nor the committee care to go into a technical discussion of these emplacements.

These, Mr. Chairman, are some of the considerations which occupied and prompted the committee in reporting the bill, and they believe in its presentation they have risen to the plane to which the people of this country, the thoughtful consideration of the people of this country, would have them rise. Not that they are agitated by any fear of war, for we do not believe—I think no member of the committee believes—that the United States Government is about to be involved in a war. No threat of any embroilment with a foreign power in any manner prompted our committee in recommending the work to be done, or which we would have the country enter upon at this time. On the contrary, we believe that the mission of the United States is to-day, and that it will be in all the years to come, one of peace; but we have not felt it either wise or prudent for this Government to longer delay the work of reasonable protection to our exposed ports and of organizing an efficient system of coast defense against such attack as may possibly be made upon it.

The Government of the United States and the people have no desire to build up an enormous Navy which shall exceed or equal that of any other power. A navy is necessarily offensive in its work and character. Our work and our mission is not of that description; and while we have no design on any foreign power, while we are strangers to any thought of subjugation or increase of territory by force, while we will cultivate peace with all the world, common prudence, which should guide every enlightened government, requires that we place ourselves in a position at all times to be enabled to defend ourselves against aggression. We believe that peace can be best and most securely maintained by entering upon the work proposed here and carrying it to a speedy completion. While we do not believe the purpose of the Government or our people is to engage in war, we yet believe it is our duty to be ready for it. We believe the best way to avoid danger is to be prepared to meet it when it comes. War is not our mission. I would not encourage a taste for it.

Neither would I, as a member of this committee, place the Government of the United States in the line of the first great naval powers of the world. We are to-day, at best, only at the head of the second-class powers respecting our Navy. We can not hope, without the expenditure of enormous sums of money, to place ourselves in the ranks of the first great naval powers of the world. But we can, by the expenditure of a small amount in the other direction, place ourselves in a condition where we may rest secure against the encroachments of any power. We will not then place ourselves in the position of a wealthy but thoughtless person, inviting attack by going into unfrequented paths which are beset by footpads. In this spirit the committee have prepared and presented this bill for the consideration of the House.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question in this connection before he takes his seat? Will the gentleman from Nebraska please state what the Endicott Board reported as to the question of inland ports, such as those on the Great Lakes, with regard to this matter of fortifications and coast defenses? Will the gentleman kindly state, in brief, what the report recommends in that regard, if there is information accessible on that point?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I may say, in response to the gentleman from Illinois, in a general way that the report classifies as of importance with reference to a system of coast defenses, first, the city of New York; second, the city of San Francisco; third, the city of Boston, and fourth, the ports on the Great Lakes. That, I conceive, covers the question of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. And the Endicott report, if I understand the gentleman's answer, deals with the subject of the lake ports as of importance when we come to consider the matter of enlarged coast defenses?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Unquestionably. And at the same time I wish to say this: There is absolutely nothing in the bill which will bind the Secretary of War to enter now upon the protection of these lake points, or of any other points, with reference to the construction of fortifications.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. I so understood the gentleman's former statement.

Mr. STEELE. That would apply also to New York, Boston, or San Francisco.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly. That is a matter left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of War, and there is nothing in the bill to direct that this work, at any port, shall or shall not be entered upon.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. I so understood the statement.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. If I understand it, in a general way, living as I do in the Mississippi Valley, after something of general inquiry on the subject, it is supposed that with 3,000 miles of boundary between our country and Canada on the north, there being some 70,000,000 people on our side of the line as compared with their small population, our ready communications by rail and waterways, the fact that the St. Lawrence is the boundary line for hundreds of miles between New York and Canada, the Welland Canal on one hand and Canada on the other, that in the event of a war with Great Britain, neither country having a naval force on the Great Lakes, it is supposed that the conditions I speak of would enable us to defend the northern border by attacking what might be the enemy in the event of trouble; and that, so far, there has been no estimate or work in pursuance of estimates looking toward the fortification of any lake port?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is substantially correct, and yet not entirely so. The Endicott Board did make estimates referring to these lake ports. Speaking for myself, and having no military experience, I feel that a certain degree of modesty is most becoming, yet it seems that the very conditions which have been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois clearly indicate, at least to the lay mind, that the best defense for the lake ports is the wonderful preponderance of power that we have, and since these lake ports could be attacked only by our Canadian neighbors, the best way to protect them would be to capture Canada, which probably would be done if such a necessity presented itself. It is also true that under our treaty with England only one armed vessel can be floated in the greatest of these lakes, and that bearing only a single gun of 8 pounds caliber. So there is nothing serious to apprehend in that quarter at present.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. Does the gentleman mean to say that only vessels of that limited capacity could enter the lakes from the sea?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Oh, no; not at all; because, as I understand, vessels of 14 feet draft could enter, unless the Welland Canal is closed; but that is of easy access and could practically be destroyed in twenty-four hours after war was declared.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. If they could pass the Welland Canal they could float very much larger vessels?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. And do I understand the gentleman to say that they could not pass the Welland Canal?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That would be my impression. Of course I am not prepared to discuss these questions from the technical standpoint of a trained soldier.

Mr. STEELE. Is it not a fact that the Canadian Government now has modern fortifications on her frontier at several places?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Unquestionably; and the same may be said of Halifax, which is a strongly fortified city. England has proceeded upon an entirely different theory than have we hitherto.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not within the knowledge of the committee that the British Government is now and has been for several years past expending many millions of dollars in fortifications at Esquimalt, across the Strait of Juan de Fuca from Puget Sound, in the State of Washington, and that no American citizen and no citizen of that province is permitted to have any knowledge of the extent of those fortifications, or permitted to know anything, except that a vast number of the most modern and powerful guns are being placed in position there all the time?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I thank the gentleman for his information; it affords additional argument for the passage of such a bill as we have here presented. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] such time as he may desire.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I expect to consume but a few minutes of the time of the committee. The bill itself, as stated by the gentleman in charge of it [Mr. HAINER of Nebraska], carries an immediate appropriation of $5,842,000, and in addition authorizes contracts to the extent of $5,542,276.

I heartily concur in the provisions of the bill. I think—and I may say it without egotism, as I had no share in the preparation of the bill, it having been prepared by a subcommittee and submitted to the general committee—that the amount appropriated is wisely distributed between the two branches of the military service which have in charge the construction of fortifications along our coast.

As gentlemen well know, the Ordnance Bureau and the Engineering Office are the two branches of the military service that are charged with this work. Heretofore, with the exception of the establishment and maintenance of the gun factory at Watervliet, N. Y., there have been but small appropriations, except for the purpose of making guns and mortars. In the Fiftieth Congress, in order to carry out the provisions of the report of the Endicott Board, an appropriation was made for the construction of Watervliet Arsenal, N. Y. It was several years before the requisite machinery could be secured in order to put that arsenal upon a proper footing. That having been done, appropriations have been made, year by year, to keep the arsenal running eight hours a day during the entire year, and for the purchase of steel ingots from the manufacturing industries of the country, so that we now have quite a number of guns of 8, 10, and 12 inch caliber.

The bill carries larger appropriations than have heretofore been made, for the purpose of putting these guns in place at different localities on our coast.

The Appropriation Committee has taken one step, and only one step, that has not been previously taken by Congress, and that is to provide for the construction of a 16-inch gun. Heretofore Congress has refused to authorize the construction of so large a gun; but the subcommittee on Appropriations, and the general committee to whom the bill was committed, have thought it wise that authority should be given to construct such a gun to be put to the extreme test, when it shall have been built, so as to ascertain by actual experiment whether it would be wise to continue the construction of so heavy a gun in the future.

I will say in conclusion, because the gentleman in charge of the bill has very clearly and fully explained all of its provisions, that the bill meets my entire concurrence. I think it is a good bill. It is not an extravagant one. I believe the contract features to be proper, and think the bill ought to be passed in its present shape. It is not an extravagant one, as I have already said, in any sense of the word, and the entire appropriation which has been made and the contracts which it authorizes have been divided between the two different branches of the military service, the ordnance and the engineer offices, in a thoroughly practical manner.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman if he considers the amount of the appropriation is as large as could be expended advantageously for this purpose? Does he not go further?

Mr. SAYERS. I think the appropriation carried in the bill is as large as it ought to be, and I trust it will not be enlarged in the House or in the Senate, but that it will go to the Executive just as it is before us. It is all that the Department asks; and, as stated by the gentleman in charge of the bill, Watervliet Arsenal, which is the Army Gun Factory, is provided for through the entire year at the rate of eight hours' labor each day; so that there will not be a moment's cessation in work on account of the want of necessary funds. And then authority is given to purchase mortars and to contract for carriages. In my judgment the bill is sufficiently large to meet the necessities of the service.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman know whether there is any provision in this bill for the location of a site for one of these fortifications on Long Island Sound?

Mr. SAYERS. There is a general appropriation of $250,000 for the purpose of permitting the Secretary of War to acquire such sites as to him may seem best.

Mr. HILL. You do not know whether any portion of that is to go to acquiring a site on Long Island Sound?

Mr. SAYERS. We did not undertake to locate the places where the fortifications are to be erected. If we had done so, it would simply have advertised the fact to parties who own the sites, and thus enabled them to extort from the Government.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, the reason why I asked the gentleman this question is because in the Endicott plans there is a recommendation for a fortification at the eastern end of Long Island Sound.

Mr. SAYERS. There is no provision at all made for that place in this bill. That is a matter which is and should be intrusted entirely to the Secretary of War.

Mr. TALBERT. I desire to ask the gentleman a question for information, if he will yield to me.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. In the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill it was stated that it carried on its face about $9,000,000, and yet the expenditure which would be authorized under it would amount to $60,000,000.

Mr. SAYERS. That is not the case as to this bill.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman from Nebraska, in answering a question of the gentleman from Kentucky, stated that to carry out the provisions of this bill it would require $75,000,000.

Mr. SAYERS. Oh, not at all. The gentleman is mistaken. The gentleman has clearly misunderstood the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska. What the gentleman from Nebraska said was that, according to the report of what is known as the Endicott Board, made a good many years ago, and in order to carry out the recommendations of that board, it would be necessary to expend, in his judgment, about $75,000,000.

Mr. TALBERT. That does not apply, then, as I understand the gentleman, to the present appropriation?

Mr. SAYERS. I will say, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from South Carolina that this bill shows upon its face every cent that the Government will be required to expend under it.

Mr. TALBERT. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. SAYERS. It is $5,842,337 in cash and $5,542,276 under contract.

Mr. TALBERT. I understand now.

Mr. SAYERS (continuing). Making the total amount that can possibly be expended under this bill $11,384,613.

Mr. TALBERT. That is the utmost limit. That is the point.

Mr. SAYERS. And I will state to my friend that it will take at least two, and probably three, years to expend the $5,542,276 authorized to be contracted for. Now, there is nothing whatever deceptive in this bill. Any gentleman can read it and can easily understand just what it carries. Each amount is stated upon its face, and each amount can not be exceeded by the War Department.

And I will say further, in answer to my friend in front of me, that I do not believe that it would be wise for Congress to specify the places that should be fortified and what character of fortifications are to be erected, for the reason that the responsibility ought to rest solely upon the War Department. That branch of the executive department of the Government is charged with the defense of the country; and upon it ought to devolve the entire responsibility. The only duty that belongs to Congress is that of providing the proper appropriations to enable the Secretary of War to carry out his plans for an appropriate defense.

Mr. Chairman, I have said all that I desire, and yield back my time to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as one of the Democratic members of the Committee on Appropriations and one of the two Democratic members on the subcommittee which had charge of this bill making appropriations for fortifications and the armament thereof, and as the only Northern member of that subcommittee, I feel it my duty to submit some remarks to the committee before this bill is passed. The views which I shall utter will represent, I presume, the views of Northern Democrats, and, I trust, the views of the Democracy of the whole country as to the propriety of suitable appropriations for our coast defenses, for our coast fortifications, and for the armament of those fortifications.

Let me first, gentlemen of the committee, call your attention to the present condition of this country in respect to defense. As to that condition there is no secret. There is no foreign government, there is no European power, which does not have accurate and definite information as to our strength and fighting capacity, both offensive and defensive, to a man and to a gun. So if I draw attention to our defenseless condition, to the helpless condition of our harbors and our seaports, I betray no secret. It is well known to all of you and to every intelligent man in the United States that we are powerless to-day to resist the inroads or incursions of any foreign fleet. One of the most distinguished of our naval officers, one than whom there is no man in the service of higher ability or finer character, Admiral Walker, testified not long since before a committee that within ten days, in the event of a war with any great European power, most of our seacoast cities could be ruined.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] said, if I mistake not, that we were a second or third rate naval power. If we take the schedule of armored vessels we are at best only the fifth power, and if we take the aggregate of all the vessels in the Navy we should be placed seventh in rank. It is well known that Great Britain is first, that France is second, and that Russia is third; and if we take the armored vessels as the test, Germany would be placed before the United States of America, whereas if we take the vessels armored and unarmored, all the vessels on the list, we shall be obliged to concede to the Netherlands and to Italy a position superior to our own. So, Mr. Chairman, the most that we can claim is that to-day we are a fifth-rate naval power. I read the other day a very able speech by the Senator from Vermont, Mr. PROCTOR, on coast defenses, delivered I believe on the 27th day of February in the Senate of the United States. In that speech Senator PROCTOR deprecated any further substantial advance in our Navy. He maintained that the only proper thing was to have a satisfactory system of coast defenses with adequate appropriations for fortifications and for the strengthening and defense of our seaports.

Now, sir, I do not agree with the Senator from Vermont. I think that the Navy and our system of coast defenses should go hand in hand, and that, year after year for some years to come, we should make provision for the building of at least four new battle ships, and this year I should have been willing to have voted for the construction of six new battle ships. It is hardly necessary, I presume, to call the attention of members of this committee to the great numerical, overpowering strength of the British navy as compared with our own; to the fact that Great Britain has to-day 50 battle ships against our 3, and will have in a few months 60 in commission as opposed to the 8 which we may have in commission two years hence. The same discrepancy is found throughout the whole list of vessels, cruisers, coast-defense vessels, torpedo boats, and all the vessels of the two navies, armored and unarmored. Then, sir, reflect for a moment upon the fact that Great Britain has a navy of nearly 89,000 men, while our total force is only 13,460, including the marines.

So, gentlemen, we must assume that it never will be in our power until we have a surplus revenue greater than any for which we may soon hope to maintain a navy which can compete with the navy of Great Britain, or with the navy of France, or with the navy of Russia. But what can we do, gentlemen? What is the imperative and the essential duty that is now incumbent upon us? It is to defend our helpless coast. It is to defend our great seaports. It is to begin a systematic, continuous provision or plan for the construction of adequate coast defenses along our whole coast line. Gentlemen must remember that, in rough figures, the Atlantic seaboard runs along for some 2,043 miles; that in the Gulf of Mexico our coast line is 1,810 miles; that on the Pacific Slope our coast line is 1,850 miles; and, of course, these figures do not include the indentations along the coast.

Now, we do not, of course, propose to construct fortifications along the whole coast line of the Atlantic seaboard, the Gulf, and the Pacific, but we do propose to fortify our principal seaports and the mouths of our great harbors and rivers. Let us say first, however, that in submitting these views I do not assume for one moment that my conception of the plan to be adopted is to be considered as binding upon my associates. I do not know that my conception is the same as that which is entertained by the gentleman from Nebraska, who has submitted this bill. I do not know but that my views differ somewhat in substance or in detail from the views entertained by the gentleman who has just addressed the committee. But I will tell you what I think should be done; and I will give you my idea as to the vote which I cast when I vote for these appropriations.

To-day, as I have indicated, we are absolutely at the mercy of a fleet of any foreign power, unless that foreign power be weaker in its naval armament than we are to-day. We should be powerless as against the fleets of Great Britain, France, Russia, or even Germany. The experts tell us that any foreign fleet, any foreign squadron of ordinary power, could do one of three things: It could either occupy an American harbor, for instance the harbor of one of our great seacoast cities, or it could shell the city, or it could, by its presence within the harbor lines, extort contribution and ransom equal in value to all the property lying exposed to the shells of the foreign vessels. Do you gentlemen, irrespective of party—do you as patriots—hesitate for one moment as to your duty not only to your constituents but to the whole American people? Will there be any man on either side of this House who will venture for one moment to oppose the passage of this bill?

I say that if we could use more money within the fiscal year—if we could provide wisely for larger appropriations—I for one should gladly vote for larger sums. We have, according to my conception of our report, declared ourselves substantially in favor of a simpler Endicott plan—that is, a plan similar in its scope to the plan adopted by the Endicott Board of 1886, but simpler and somewhat modified in details, because it has been found that owing to improvements and new inventions, certain guns can be made at a less cost. It has also been found that the old gun lift must be superseded for the new disappearing gun carriage. I speak now as to the gun carriage for 12-inch steel guns; for we already have disappearing gun carriages for the 8-inch guns and for the 10-inch guns.

Gentlemen will remember that the plan of the Endicott Board provided, in substance, for the erection of coast defenses or fortifications. Whether this matter be important to members of this committee or not, I think, gentlemen, you will all agree with me that no appropriation bill, nor any bill of any form, has come here for consideration during the present session which is of graver importance to the American people than this. The whole American people, irrespective of party, demand the adoption of a complete and satisfactory system of coast fortification and coast defense. The interests of commerce and navigation, the manufacturer, the banker, and the business man in every avocation, the professional man, the whole press of the country, the artisan, the mechanic, the day laborer—all unite, Mr. Chairman, in favor of the system of continuous construction of coast defenses throughout our whole coast line.

And, gentlemen, although we can not conclude the War Department as to the ports which are to be fortified—as to the special seacoast cities coming within the purview of the general plan—it is no secret that the plan must include all the principal seaports along the Atlantic Seaboard, commencing with the Penobscot and Kennebec rivers, taking in Portland, Me.; coming along to Portsmouth, N. H.; thence taking in Boston and New Bedford, Narragansett Bay and the east entrance of Long Island Sound, and including New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington; passing on to the South and taking in all the important seaports on the South Atlantic coast—that is, Hampton Roads, Wilmington, N. C., Charleston, and Savannah; thence on to the Gulf Coast, taking in Key West, Pensacola, Mobile, New Orleans, and Galveston. I shall not attempt, Mr. Chairman, to enumerate each of the seaport cities or harbors that should be defended. But on the Pacific Coast we have San Diego, we have San Francisco, we have Portland, Oreg., and also Puget Sound. So there would seem to be an intent on the part of the General Government, on the part of the War Department, to make in every instance a fair and just appropriation of the money which is given to the Department or to the Board of Ordnance and Fortification for distribution.

Now, gentlemen, the plan which we have adopted has the support of the Chief of Ordnance, General Flagler; it has the support of the Chief of Engineers, General Craighill; it has the support and approval of the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications—that continuous Board which is presided over by the Major-General in Command of the Army, General Miles, and which has one civilian in its membership, General Outhwaite, our colleague in the Fifty-third Congress, and which also has as members Col. Royal T. Frank, of the artillery; Col. Peter C. Hains, of the Engineers, and two ordnance officers, I believe, Major Phillips and Captain Ayers. This Board, composed of efficient officers, supports the project now submitted by the Committee on Appropriations.

In answer to the suggestion made to me sotto voce by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT], I wish to say that the bill now before the Committee of the Whole has the unanimous support and approval of all the members of the Committee on Appropriations, Republicans and Democrats alike.

I believe that the original plan of the Endicott Board contemplated an expenditure of $97,000,000. It has been asked by certain gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, how much money we propose to expend. The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, evinced a few moments ago his interest in this question. He desired to know how much money it was proposed to expend. Now, my idea of the general plan is that we must expend in all either $85,000,000 or $97,000,000. The money will be distributed, in round numbers, as follows: For the guns and gun carriages we shall have to spend in all about $44,600,000. And, Mr. Chairman, as to the guns, let me call the attention of the committee to the general plan contemplated. It is settled that the guns are to be 8-inch guns, 10-inch guns, and 12-inch guns, made of steel, and of course the carriages will be of a character to correspond with the size of the guns. We are then to have 12-inch mortars, a small number of 10-inch mortars in addition to these, and we are to have 360 rapid-fire guns for flank fire or defense. In addition to these items, $115,000 is appropriated for the purpose of procuring steel forgings in order to construct a 16-inch gun. The Board of Ordnance and Fortifications report as to the 16-inch gun that it will be an absolute necessity, that we must have guns of that caliber in the future; and I call your attention to the fact, in this connection, that Great Britain has already sixteen 16-inch or larger caliber guns, France has eight of 16½-inch caliber, and that Italy has guns of from 17 to 17¾ inch caliber.

Under the general plan it is proposed to construct, build, or purchase 203 12-inch guns, 180 10-inch guns, and 98 8-inch guns. Some of these guns have been already constructed, but the work, as yet, may be said to be scarcely more than just commenced, and it is very incomplete. We have some 86 mortars already built, with their carriages; that is, of the 12-inch size and type, the most favored size being the 12-inch mortars. In all, provision is made for the construction of 1,032 12-inch mortars and 24 10-inch mortars, with carriages of the necessary size to mount them. That is the general plan contemplated by the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have already stated, we appropriate forty-four million and some hundreds of thousands of dollars for guns and mortars and for their carriages. The guns and mortars will cost of that sum, in round numbers, $26,800,000 and the carriages $17,800,000. For the emplacements, or the places, in ordinary language, where the guns are to be mounted and set in position, we shall have to expend—it all coming under the general head of fortifications—the sum of some $41,000,000, in round numbers; and as I have noticed in some of our debates during the present session of Congress diagrams have been produced to illustrate a point, I shall produce one myself for the inspection of the members of the committee from the edition of the Scientific American of the 14th of March of this year, to illustrate an 8-inch barbette gun in position at Fort Wadsworth, New York Harbor, to which I ask the attention of the members who take an interest in this discussion.

A gun in barbette, I may say, means a gun upon a mound or platform, which fires over the parapet of a fortification, instead of firing through an embrasure. It is raised upon a platform, which enables it to fire over the parapet. And permit me to say in connection with this explanation that "emplacement," a word frequently used in connection with fortifications, is a military term; you will not find it in the dictionary, but it seems to be in essence the same as the placement or placing in position. It is the position or place where the gun stands, and the word itself may be defined, from a military standpoint, as embracing the site or platform on which the gun rests to protect the parapet and the magazine. So, if we have the emplacement, consisting of the platform, the magazine, and the parapet, we have the whole fortification, and the only other items to be considered are the gun carriages and the gun itself. So the whole subject of fortifications may be said to be included in the emplacement, the carriage, and the gun.

Now, of the $85,000,000 we must expend in any event some forty-four and one-half millions, as I have already said, on the guns and carriages; some forty-one millions on the fortifications, that is, on the masonry, armor, platforms, parapets, and the general line of fortifications, and then two and one-half millions more for submarine defenses or torpedoes, and a million and a half more for the purchase of the sites, and adding all of these together you will find the aggregate carried by the whole of the items I have mentioned will reach about eighty-nine and one-half millions of dollars. But, gentlemen, we must have projectiles; we must have armor-piercing shot or deck-piercing shell in addition; and the cost of armor-piercing shot and deck-piercing shell will amount to $7,500,000 more. So we have in round numbers $97,000,000 to be voted as a total for the fortifications and their armament to be provided for the protection of our seacoast.

When I voted for this bill in committee I believed I was voting for the initial step in a continuous system providing for the construction of fortifications and coast defenses; and I believe that we shall be compelled, if this plan be inaugurated, for the next eight years to contribute either ten or eleven million dollars a year, or to pay that sum, in the continuation of the work on coast defenses and fortifications.

Now, a word as to the other measures which have been introduced into the Congress of the United States bearing upon this question. The Senator from Washington [Senator SQUIRE] introduced a bill in the Senate providing for some eighty millions of dollars to be expended on coast defenses. The Senator from Massachusetts [Senator LODGE], I believe, in another bill proposed an expenditure of about a hundred million dollars for the same purpose. It is proposed by the bills now before the Senate of the United States, in other words, to do what? To use eighty million or a hundred million dollars for coast defenses and fortifications and to pay for them by the issue of bonds; that is, materially increasing our national debt for all time to come.

This appropriation bill will render all such measures unnecessary. We provide funds for all that can be done for the year coming, or within the period of time that should be covered by the general appropriation bill. In other words, there is no need of appropriating another dollar other than that which is appropriated in this bill. It has been the purpose of the committee, well defined and well considered, to use for coast defenses and coast fortifications all the money which could be used within the fiscal year. These appropriations become available at once. So we have intended to appropriate all the money which could be used before the 1st of March, 1897, and, in addition to that, to provide for contracts which have no definite limits, but which may run throughout the fiscal year, or even for two years.

Now, if the bill introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts or the bill introduced by the Senator from Washington should come here for consideration, it would not be necessary for this House to consider them during the present session or at any time in the future, provided the plain, businesslike proposition we submit to the committee to-day receives the approval of the committee and of the House; and I submit, gentlemen of the committee, that it is far better to pay for these coast defenses out of our current revenues than it is to add to and increase the enormous national debt under which we are suffering to-day.

For two reasons, Mr. Chairman, I submit that this bill should find favor. In the first place, because it is demanded by the danger of the hour. It is demanded by the imperative necessity which now lies upon us. And there is another reason. It is demanded by the interests of American labor. It is well said, Mr. Chairman, by the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications, in their report which was submitted on the 31st day of October last, that it is a pity to build magnificent workshops and to allow them to lie idle. In other words, the workshops should be run up to their fair working capacity of eight hours a day. And, Mr. Chairman, in the bill which we have now submitted we have made provision for the running of our great gun factory at Watervliet for eight hours a day throughout the whole year. And let me say in passing, gentlemen, that we ought to congratulate ourselves upon the present condition of our arsenals and our manufacturing establishments. We have, in all, one armory and four arsenals which are entitled to special attention.

At the armory in Springfield, Mass., the small arms, that is, the improved Krag-Jorgensen rifles, are manufactured, and we turn out now some 15,000 per annum. At the Frankford Arsenal the cartridges are manufactured. At the Rock Island Arsenal, in Illinois, the artillery harness, the equipments for the infantry and cavalry, and the target material are manufactured. And then we come to the great arsenals, one of which, that at Watertown, is our gun-carriage factory. All the gun carriages not purchased for our guns are manufactured at Watertown, and it is said in the report of the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications that the establishment of the gun-carriage factory at Watertown has been a great success, and that it has demonstrated that the Government of the United States can manufacture gun carriages that in quality of workmanship, in cost, and in celerity of delivery compare most favorably with those manufactured at any other gun factory, or even surpass them. That is to say, that the gun factory in those qualities surpasses the private factories.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while we are able to manufacture our gun carriages, and while we are able to make the guns, we are not able to make the steel, and that has to be purchased either from the Bethlehem Iron Company or from the Midvale Steel Company, or from some other private corporation. But in that we should find rather a source of congratulation, because as long as the money goes to the support of American labor, as long as it goes to keep American factories running, it ought to be a subject of congratulation rather than of dismay or of disappointment.

At the gun factory at Watervliet we manufacture some 35 or 40 guns per annum, and it is proposed, in the plan which will probably be adopted by the War Department, that all the heavier seacoast guns shall be manufactured at the Watervliet factory, that is, at the Army Gun Factory near Troy, N. Y., and that the heavier gun carriages shall be manufactured at the Government factory at Watertown. Some 100 guns, under the law of 1891, have been provided for under an existing contract in force with the Bethlehem Iron Company.

I think we have sufficiently gone into details; and now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in conclusion, whether you be in spirit for war or for peace, whatever position any one of you may have taken on the stirring questions of the hour or of the past few months, I believe that every one of you will advocate an efficient system of coast fortifications or coast defenses; and I call your attention to the words of a great English writer on international law.

Of the primary or absolute rights of a nation, the most essential, and as it were the cardinal right, upon which all others hinge, is the right of self-preservation, and all these rights, he tells us—that is, the primary or absolute rights of nations—are founded on moral truth. And then, as an adjunct to the right of self-preservation, he tells us we have the right of self-defense. He says:

> An independent political society which is not in a condition to repel aggression against its territory or against the persons or property of its members is unequal to the object of its institution.

And I cite further, gentlemen of the committee, the words of the great writer on international or public law Vattel, in his Droit des Gens, where he says:

> The nation ought to put itself in such a state as to be able to repel and humble an unjust enemy. This is an important duty which the care for its own perfection and even its self-preservation imposes both on the state and on its conductors.

And after thus citing the words of Vattel and of the English law writer in support of my position—that is, in support of my theory and view that we should take care for the preservation of our own, and that we have the right to defend our own coast—I desire to call the attention of the committee to the words of one of the greatest Democrats that ever lived in the United States. I allude to the Hon. Samuel J. Tilden, at one time President of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. Did he draw the salary?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. No, gentlemen; Mr. Tilden did not draw his salary. He received the votes, that is, the fair votes, and he was duly elected President of the United States; and I believe that is conceded by almost everyone save the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will allow me——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. No, sir; I can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not wish by an innocent remark of mine to be drawn into a political discussion. I had conceived that after a lapse of twenty years all political question as to the election of Mr. Tilden had died out; but I will refer to his letter as the letter of a great Democrat; and this letter was written about the 1st day of December, 1885. It was then supposed that Mr. Carlisle—the Hon. John G. Carlisle—would be Speaker of the new House; and on the 1st day of December, 1885, Mr. Tilden, from his country home known as Greystone, addressed a letter to Mr. Carlisle on coast defense and the urgency of making due provision therefor. The condition of affairs in this country then was somewhat peculiar. We then had a surplus, and the question first considered by the great Democratic statesmen was, What shall be done with the surplus? Shall we apply that surplus to a reduction of the revenue; shall we apply it to part payment of the public debt, said Mr. Tilden, or shall we devote it to the coast defenses, and make due provision therefor? He alluded to the Monroe doctrine, that doctrine which had found favor in the United States of America, in this language:

It is now more than sixty years since we announced to the world that we should resist any attempts, from whatever quarter they might come, to make any new colonizations on any part of the American continent; that while we should respect the status quo, we should protect the people of the different nations inhabiting this continent from every attempt to subject them to the dominion of any European power or to interfere with their undisturbed exercise of the rights of self-government. This announcement was formally made by President Monroe, after consultation with Mr. Madison and Mr. Jefferson. It was formulated by John Quincy Adams. Our Government has firmly adhered to the Monroe doctrine, and even so late as 1865 it warned Napoleon III out of Mexico. It is impossible to foresee, in the recent scramble of the European powers for acquisition of colonies, how soon an occasion may arise for our putting in practice the Monroe doctrine.

And then come these sound words of wisdom, and I call the attention of the members of the committee to this concluding sentence, and whether you be in favor of the Monroe doctrine or not I think you will concede that that doctrine has found utterance on more than one occasion since the beginning of the Fifty-fourth Congress. Mr. Tilden says:

It is clear that there ought to be some relation between our assertion of that doctrine and our preparation to maintain it.

But, I say, whether we desire to assert that doctrine or not, whether we do assert the Monroe doctrine or not, even the most peace-loving American citizen, even though he be about to attend the sessions of the arbitration convention or committee, must admit that it is an imperative duty now incumbent upon us and upon every patriot to appropriate money for our coast defenses and fortifications. Why should we appropriate money? Because the great deterrent force lies in having our seaports and our harbors ready for an incursion or an inroad by any foreign people. Let us fortify them, whether it take even more than eight or nine years. Let us commence to-day. Let us on this 14th day of April, 1896, pass this bill and take the initiatory step toward the building and construction of a complete cordon of fortifications around our whole coast line, extending from Maine to Washington.

In conclusion, let me direct your attention to these remarkable words of the same great statesman, Samuel J. Tilden:

The best guaranty against aggression, the best assurance that our diplomacy will be successful and pacific and that our rights and honor will be respected by other nations, is in their knowledge that we are in a situation to vindicate our reputation and interests. While we may afford to be deficient in the means of offense, we can not afford to be defenseless. The notoriety of the fact that we have neglected the ordinary precautions of defense invites want of consideration in our diplomacy, injustice, arrogance, and insult at the hands of foreign nations.

So, gentlemen, I appeal to you, without distinction of party, to pass this bill at once. It will find support in the platform of every party at the coming election, and it will meet the hearty approval and acclaim of all your constituents, no matter what the political faith may be which you are sent here to represent. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BINGHAM having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 435) for the relief of the trustee of St. Joseph's Catholic Church at Martinsburg, W. Va.; and

A bill (S. 2783) to establish a life-saving station on the coast of New Hampshire or Massachusetts between the Hampton and the Merrimac rivers.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the Secretary of Agriculture upon the expenditures of the agricultural experiment stations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, in compliance with the act approved August 8, 1894, making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, be printed as a document; and that there be printed, in addition to the usual number, 2,000 copies of said report, the extra copies to be distributed under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries something over $11,000,000. I take it for granted that there will be no opposition to the bill on the floor of this House. It may appear somewhat extravagant to some members of this committee and to some persons on the outside that we should jump from a little above two millions last year for fortifications and armament to eleven millions this year, especially at a time when our Government is borrowing money on bonds at a very heavy sacrifice to the taxpayers of the country, and when there is very little money in the Treasury. I want to congratulate the country, however, that now, when it is a settled fact that Mr. McKinley will be the Republican nominee and that the A. P. A.'s will defeat him [laughter], and when it is an acknowledged fact that the true Jeffersonian Democracy of this country will take charge of the next Chicago convention and bring ample relief to the people [laughter]—I desire, I say, to congratulate the country upon this state of facts and to say to those who may be inclined to be apprehensive on account of this large appropriation that they may just as well rest easily and sleep soundly, for this country will be safe after the 4th of March next. [Cries of "That is right," and applause on the Republican side.]

The committee, in formulating this appropriation bill, has followed closely the suggestions of General Flagler and others who know far more about the condition and requirements of our armament and fortifications than any individual or member of this House can know. Therefore, if your committee has made a mistake, it has been led into it by those who ought to know and doubtless do know what ought to be appropriated for the several arms of the service. Secretary Lamont, in his report last fall suggested in his estimate a total appropriation of about $6,610,000. That included an appropriation for guns, mortars, carriages, etc., of $4,175,155, and for emplacements, sites, fortifications, casemates, submarine mines, and galleries, $2,135,000, making a total of over six millions of money. Now, this bill carries for guns, carriages, mortars, etc., $5,542,276, and for emplacements, sites, fortifications, and submarine mines, $5,842,337, making in all over $11,000,000.

The advantages in the appropriations in this bill over any other bill that has been before the House in a long while is in this particular, that we have endeavored to even up the armament and fortifications of the country so that the guns that are now on skids will be on carriages, and the guns and carriages will be on their emplacements, so that in case of an emergency we can utilize all of our guns, and at the same time provision is made for a sufficient number of rounds of ammunition for all these guns.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not take much stock in the danger of an early war with Spain or with England. I do not think that either one of those countries intends to fight us.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman aware that the British Government has sent forty-four or forty-five rapid-firing guns to Kingston, Canada, to protect the lakes?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, yes; and if they had 145 it would not make any difference; not a particle. This Government can take Canada in three weeks from to-day, with any number of fortifications, guns, and men that England can put there. But it is good policy, good common sense, to put our defenses in proper condition, and I trust that this bill will pass without any lengthy discussion. There does not appear to be any opposition to it, and I presume that there is nobody on the floor of this House who will question the propriety of making these appropriations. They might have been larger, much larger, and perhaps they ought to have been larger. But I want to say this: It has been given out from some quarters that we are in very great danger, and that if we should have a war with England or with Spain or with both our defenses are in such a condition that we could not make a respectable defense. That is a mistake. And if the suggestions of the distinguished gentleman from New York, to which my friend who has just taken his seat alluded, had been carried out thirty years ago, those very defenses and those very guns would have been to-day out of date—would have been of no use to us.

It is the policy of this Government to go slowly and gradually in this sort of work because of the improvements which are being made from year to year, and I might almost say from day to day. Why, sir, the guns which we had twenty years ago are to-day of no use; the fortifications we had fifteen years ago are to-day practically useless. We have got to keep pace with the progress of improvements. I think we have enough money in this bill to pursue that line of policy. If we cover now the latest improvements in guns, fortifications, etc., we can a year from now make further appropriations covering improvements as they are made, thus securing the best types of guns to be had in this country or any other. In this way, by moderate though liberal appropriations, we can keep pace with the progress of military science, without being extravagant or wasteful with the people's money.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, it is particularly gratifying that the Appropriations Committee is unanimous in reporting so good a bill as the one under discussion. My only regret in connection with it is that the bill has not gone further and appropriated a larger sum of money; that its purpose has not been to put this country in the completest position of defense which money can accomplish within a reasonable time. That is the only criticism which can be made upon the bill. I presume, however, that a majority of the House will be satisfied with this measure as it is, because it is so much better than anything proposed in any recent Congress.

But it is to be borne in mind, Mr. Chairman, that this bill does not come up to the requirements of the War Department or of the General in charge of the Army.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that we have absolutely gone beyond the estimates of the Secretary of War and of the heads of the different departments of the Army.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will wait a moment, I think I will convince him absolutely that I am correct in the statement I have just made.

In 1886, as has been stated here, the Endicott Board reported a system of general coast defenses, which included 27 ports, to which the Puget Sound country was subsequently added, making 28 ports. The estimated cost of that system was $97,782,800. There was asked at that time an appropriation of $21,500,000 for that immediate year, and an annual appropriation of $9,000,000 for each subsequent year until the whole system of defenses should be completed. If the recommendation of the Endicott Board had been carried out by sufficient appropriations, the year just closed would have shown the completion of our entire coast defense according to that plan; and instead of being to-day practically without a coast defense, we should have a system which would need only to be brought down to and preserved in the ever-present state of the art.

It is true, as the gentleman who has recently addressed the House says, that there are continual improvements in the line of defense, in the making of guns, etc. But the same remark will apply to every avocation of life, to every pursuit in which individuals or nations engage. Of course it is appropriate that every nation, while being each day and each hour in a proper state of defense, should also keep up with every improvement made in the arts of war and peace.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman will allow me to say that there has been no special improvement during the period referred to in guns. The only improvement has been with respect to carriages. In that period we would have lost about $29,000,000 in the purchase of gun carriages and the gun lift, which the disappearing carriages are about to supersede.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And that loss, taking into consideration the security which it would have given us, would have been gladly approved by every patriotic citizen. This matter of coast defense—the providing of guns, fortifications, and armaments—is in the nature of an insurance policy. Its object is to give security to the nation and comfort to the individual citizen.

As it is, we find that at present only 3 of the 18 ports under special consideration have any kind of defense. Of these, New York has 2 12-inch guns and 16 12-inch mortars; San Francisco, 1 12-inch gun and 16 15-inch mortars; Boston, 16 12-inch mortars and not a single gun; and all the other ports of this great country are absolutely defenseless.

Now, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] pointed out, the fleet of a hostile nation may come so close to the city of New York as to demand a ransom, which would be greater than the whole amount of money which the Endicott Board asked to have appropriated or which is now asked by the Secretary of War for the defense of our several ports.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suppose the gentleman has given this subject a good deal of attention, and therefore I wish to ask how these mortars, under the plan of the War Department, are to be used in defense of the harbors? According to my understanding they have always been used for the purpose of bombarding besieged cities or in some similar line of warfare.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. They are equally valuable to bombard a fleet, and the deck-piercing shells which are spoken of in the blll will of course be fired from the mortars.

Mr. GROUT. And with unerring precision.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. With such precision as almost to equal a direct-firing gun. The mortars, I might say, are rifled as well as the guns. It is very gratifying that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] has made so good a Republican speech, and I only regret, Mr. Chairman, that at the last he was compelled to drag into it something of party politics, when otherwise his whole remarks had been upon the high plane of national patriotism. We can forgive him, however, for that, because it is so much better than we have been accustomed to hear from gentlemen of like political views.

But I promised to state to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] the reasons why I made the remarks with which I began. I find in Senate Document No. 104, which is the report of the Secretary of War in reply to a resolution of the Senate, that he says, under date of February 3, 1896, a little over two months ago:

I have the honor to state that the sum of $25,678,860 could be advantageously used by the War Department for the purpose of coast defense prior to July 1, 1897, of which amount, if it should be appropriated, $4,722,000 should be made available during the present fiscal year, to be expended as follows—

That is, the present fiscal year, ending on the 30th day of June next.

By the Ordnance Department:
For working the gun factory to its full capacity eight hours per day in finishing and assembling guns during the remainder of the fiscal year	$55,000
By the Engineer Department:
For fortifications	3,467,000
For sites	350,000

And you will notice that the present bill, not for the present fiscal year alone but for the coming year as well, provides an appropriation of $250,000 for this purpose—

For submarine defenses	$850,000

Then, again, he says:

Twenty million nine hundred and fifty-six thousand eight hundred and sixty dollars would be expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, as follows:

By the Ordnance Department:
For guns, mortars, carriages, powder, projectiles, etc	$6,316,860
By the Engineer Department:
For fortifications	12,340,000
For sites	650,000
For submarine defenses	1,650,000

The total amount required for sites for fortifications would be $1,000,000, the total amount required for engineering work would be $19,307,000, and the total amount required for ordnance work would be $6,371,860.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I feel justified in saying that, generous as this bill may be regarded, it does not meet the emergency upon us, and does not fully, or even approximately, meet the demands, and the very recent demands, of the War Department for necessary funds to be expended in coast defenses.

But the Secretary of War goes still further and points out in this report the special advantages which would result from such an immediate appropriation. Using his own language:

The special advantages that would result from an increase of the appropriations would be (1) the utilization of the Army Gun Factory to its full capacity, thus diminishing the relative cost for supervision, inspection, light, heat, and power; (2) the more rapid armament of our fortifications, as this measure would add to the number of carriages already built, building, and estimated for, about eight 12-inch, eight 10-inch, and seven 8-inch carriages of the types most needed, thus enabling most of the guns that will be completed during the next fiscal year to be mounted as rapidly as emplacements can be provided for them; (3) an addition of twelve mortars and carriages to those already estimated for, which, with those now on hand, will equip a 16-gun battery of this much-needed type; (4) the purchase of an additional 500 deck-piercing shells, one hundred and twenty-five 8-inch, thirty-five 10-inch, and twenty 12-inch armor-piercing shot; (5) a supply of heavy material for the siege service, viz, about ten guns, ten howitzers, and twenty mortars, with their carriages, implements, and equipments, and (6) the more rapid construction of emplacements to receive the guns, mortars, and carriages now on hand or building.

He still goes beyond this; and I commend this document of the Senate to the careful consideration of every member of the House.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman from New Hampshire allow me an interruption just there?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. About six weeks after that document was published the War Department was called on by the Committee on Appropriations to make a revised estimate, if it saw fit to do so, respecting the proposed expenditures for ordnance and engineering work. These estimates were made and submitted to the committee, and I will say to the gentleman, as I have already stated to this committee, that we have given in this bill every dollar called for in the revised estimates, based upon the most careful consideration the Department could give to the subject, after much time spent in such consideration, utilizing every dollar that they felt could be utilized for the prosecution of the work during the time to which I have referred.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Why, Mr. Chairman, the very fact that the Committee on Appropriations saw fit to call upon the War Department for revised estimates was an intimation that the estimate which had been already submitted did not meet the approval of the committee—that they intended to cut it down—and in accordance with that intimation the new estimates were submitted.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman is entirely mistaken——

Mr. GROUT. On the contrary, they increased the estimates over a third.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. As a matter of fact, we did not have the document before us to which he refers. We had the estimates, and it was after consultation with the Chief of the Ordnance Department, and feeling that the estimates should be revised up instead of down, that a new and revised estimate was given, and as a matter of fact the revised estimates very much exceed the original estimates.

Mr. GROUT. In every point.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. And it was evidently in accordance with the feeling of Congress on the subject—in fact induced and called forth thereby—that this revised or increased estimate was furnished.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If there is any difference of opinion between the Secretary of War and his Chief of Ordnance, I leave the War Department and the Committee on Appropriations to settle it. It is no matter of mine; but I stand here quoting the document which the Secretary of War sent to the Senate, and upon which to this date, so far as any public statement is concerned, he now stands.

Mr. HEMENWAY. As a matter of fact, the Secretary of War reduced the estimate for emplacements furnished by General Craighill when first submitted. They came to the Committee on Appropriations in that form. Notwithstanding the fact that the report shows that the guns were away in advance of the emplacements, the Secretary of War did not decrease the estimates for guns, but he did decrease the estimates for emplacements.

Mr. GROUT. And then in the revised estimates he increased them.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then he was requested to revise the estimates in such a way as to establish a proper balance between the Engineer Department and the Ordnance Department.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. HAINER], the chairman of the subcommittee, in his able remarks, to which I listened with great interest, informed us that it is much easier to mount the guns than to make them, and if, in pursuance of that general idea, the Secretary of War saw fit in that particular to diminish the gun-carriage appropriation to conform to that theory, it is a matter of detail to which I need give no attention; but I will say for the information of this House that since this bill was reported to it I have personally asked an officer of the War Department of high rank if the bill was satisfactory, and the answer was, "It is satisfactory to this extent, that it is better than we expected." And that, to my mind, Mr. Chairman, tells the whole story—that it is so much better than preceding Congresses have done, that many people feel satisfied and gratified with it, and for one I am gratified that it is so good; but it does not reach up to the height of the report that is before us, and which I believe the American people demand that we should meet.

I hope that when this bill reaches the Senate the Senate committee will take it and make it conform to the wishes of the Secretary of War, as stated in the document to which I have referred. Certainly there is no money saved by doing this work by piecemeal; by so doing the cost will be increased and its efficiency diminished. Let us put ourselves where we shall be able to say to our people and to the country that we have done all that is possible to put our nation in a condition of defense, where she can meet, with all the advantages of modern science, any assault which can be made upon her; and in so doing the people will say we have done well.

The CHAIRMAN. If no other gentleman desires to address the committee, the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. There are several gentlemen who desire to be heard. I ask that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], my colleague on the committee, be recognized.

[Mr. HEMENWAY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will only claim the attention of the committee for a very few moments. I want to say that I am justified in complimenting the gentleman in charge of this bill, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT], and the other gentlemen on the subcommittee that prepared it. It has been prepared, to my knowledge, with great labor, after much of investigation; and while I am not competent to criticise the bill throughout, I do feel I am competent to say that in my service in the House of Representatives for over twenty years there never has been a bill for fortifications so well prepared and so amply providing for the public service as this bill. I do not agree with the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] in his statement that we are not going fast enough in this session of Congress. We have recommended appropriations for every dollar that can be used in the coming year economically for fortifications.

We have gone beyond that, and authorized contracts for forgings and for emplacements, the money to pay for which will be furnished, where this bill does not furnish it, at the next session of this Congress. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] called attention to the fact that this bill makes and emplaces as many guns and does as much work for fortifications as all the bills that have been passed from 1888 up to the present time. It does not carry as much money as those bills carried in the aggregate; but for many of the years of the period referred to much of the money appropriated was consumed in mere housekeeping. You have to support your Ordnance Bureau and your engineers. You have to have all the machinery, whether you make guns and emplace them or not.

Now, then, we keep that machinery and recommend enough money to leap forward by the provisions of this single bill as far as the space that was covered by the appropriations from 1888 up to the present time, and that is all I desire to say about it. I do not want to abuse anybody. Some people think that in former years we did not go fast enough. I think at times we did not, but when we recollect that since the close of the late civil war there has been a complete revolution in ordnance and fortifications, in seacoast defense, and in naval warfare, it would be well to recollect that if we had not had a breathing spell for the purpose of determining the proper type of guns and proper fortifications, and so forth, that we might have expended much money where the product of the expenditure would before this time have become obsolete. But at last we have as good, if not the best, guns on the earth, and as to the time when we are likely to have a war, I want to say that I do not believe that we will have war the coming year—no war this year nor next year nor the year after. I doubt if there will be any during this century or perhaps the early years of the next century. But if you will stop and think a minute, with our 70,000,000 of people in our present territory, with the hemisphere to the south and Canada to the north, in a lifetime, in the coming generation, this population will increase, as it now increases, so rapidly, that while our political boundaries may not extend, our children will pass over the boundary and will possess themselves of the hemisphere, economically, industrially, and commercially, and it is right and proper that we should be in position to give them by our diplomacy, by our readiness for war, if war must be had, in proper self-defense, the encouragement of that defense that they are entitled to look for.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood the gentleman to say that we were making the best guns that had ever been made, or the best that this country had ever made.

Mr. CANNON. I say my information is that our guns are equal, if not superior, to the best that have ever been made in the world.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Has the gentleman's attention been called to the bursting of one of them in New York yesterday, whereby General Miles came near losing his life? The shell stuck in the barrel and the gun burst.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose that was testing a new type of gun. I suspect, however, that there never will be guns made so strong that once in a while one of them will not explode. I had not noticed the incident to which the gentleman calls my attention. I do know, though, that our guns are strong enough and good enough so that if people get in front of them they will get hurt [laughter], and I think that perhaps there is less danger at the breech than there has been heretofore in the older types of gun.

Now, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that, when the expenditure authorized by this bill is made, our principal seaports will, in my judgment, be so fortified that we can rest in substantial security, and if those who, in the fullness of time, come after us in Congress shall be wise enough to continue this work, there will ultimately be complete defense of the 27 or 28 greater seaports of this country. In the meantime, by the mere making of this appropriation, by the mere demonstration of our capacity to make the forgings from which to make the guns, by showing that we have that capacity to-day to make the guns and that we have the skill to emplace them, even before the guns are emplaced, our diplomacy will be strengthened among the nations of the earth, and that is one of the principal points to be gained by getting into a state of preparation and by making these appropriations. For my part I never have had any fear but that, even without fortifications, the 70,000,000 of people in these United States, in a contest with any or with all the nations of the earth, could defend this country against all who might assail it. Even if we did not have a gun or a fortification I believe we could defend ourselves, but we would get terribly hurt for the first year or two or three.

Now, if we pursue this line of policy it will keep us from being hurt the first year or the first two years. Aye, more; in my judgment, this policy, wisely adopted and carried out, will insure peace and quiet to the United States against all comers by the mere influence of our diplomacy thus reenforced.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman, I do not often speak upon an appropriation bill, and I never like to antagonize the conclusions of a committee that have presented a bill for the approval of the House, but it does seem to me that this bill, contemplating, as it does in the end, before the work that is laid out by it shall be finally concluded, an expenditure of perhaps $150,000,000, might have been more wisely drawn, so that, instead of confining our fortifications to a few special localities, we would take the same amount of money and expend it upon great ships of war, movable batteries, that could go from one point to another, wherever the enemy might be found. Those ships could be marshaled upon the high seas, and we could say to Great Britain and to the world: "We have floating batteries here that dare meet any nation that comes to attack us from any part of the world."

I have confidence, as the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. CANNON, has, in the capacity of this American people upon land, united as we are now and numbering 70,000,000, to defend ourselves against any power that might attempt to plant its flag upon American soil. But I do believe that, instead of expending this money in fortifications at given points here and there along the seaboard for a thousand miles or more, if we could turn out upon the high seas forty or fifty or more powerful naval vessels and say to the world, "Let our enemies come on; we will meet them," it would be a much more judicious expenditure of this money than to spend it upon fortifications at particular places. Instead of building up great fortifications at different points along the coast, we might construct a powerful Navy, which would be equal to that of Great Britain, if need be; and in that way we could defend our towns and cities, as well as any other places within the territory of the United States that any enemy might choose to attack.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, if no gentleman desires to speak further upon the bill, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be now closed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk, reading the bill by paragraphs, read as follows:

Oil-tempered and annealed steel for high-power coast-defense guns of 8-inch, 10-inch, and 12-inch caliber, and forgings for one type 16-inch gun in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection at each stage of manufacture, and including all parts of each caliber, $1,332,038.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 3, line 3, after the word "gun," insert a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rapid-fire guns, including their mounts and ammunition, $150,000.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is an appropriate place, because to carry out the purposes provided for in the section just read requires a high order of education, and I desire to call the attention of the House to a bill which I introduced providing for the use of public lands in the State of Alabama for educational purposes.

I am encouraged to do this because it is in the line of policy which has always been approved by the lawmaking power of this Government during its entire existence.

On May 20, 1785, the Continental Congress enacted the following:

There shall be reserved the lot No. 16 of every township for the maintenance of public schools.

And the tendency of Congress has been to extend this so that the late States have received four sections of a township instead of one—Utah, the last State admitted, receiving more than 6,000,000 acres, and the total grant to the nine States admitted since 1861 amounting to some 70,000,000 acres.

The total amount received by Alabama when it became a State was 902,744 acres, while the average given to the nine States lately admitted is eight times that amount.

The State of Alabama is doing her full duty with regard to the education of her citizens, both black and white. The money provided for this purpose, pursuant to the laws of Alabama, is greater in proportion to wealth than that of many of the most liberal States of the North. The efforts of the people in this commendable line ought to be responded to by Congress, especially when it can be done without any expense to the Government.

There are now but 600,000 acres of public lands in the State of Alabama, and most of it is of such a character that we can hardly expect it to be appropriated under the present land laws. The expense of maintaining the land offices in the State can not be less than some $30,000 a year, and as the Government will never realize that amount, it is very evident that it would be in the line of economy to give these lands to the State and abolish the land offices. In fact, no other system seems at all consistent with proper economic administration. It will be seen that to keep up these land offices the United States is each year spending an amount which is just about equal to the value of the public lands of the State. Alabama is divided into two sections, one called north Alabama, and one called south Alabama.

Some years ago, pursuant to acts of Congress, two colleges in south Alabama received large grants of land amounting to some 80,000 acres. In order to equalize these matters and to do a measure of justice to north Alabama, I introduced the following bill in the Fifty-third Congress:

Be it enacted, etc., That the governor of the State of Alabama be, and he is hereby, authorized to select, out of the unoccupied and uninhabited lands of the United States within the said State, 23,040 acres of land, in legal subdivisions, being a total equivalent to one township, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall forthwith, upon receipt of said certificate, issue to the State of Alabama patents for said lands: Provided, That the proceeds of said lands, when sold or leased, shall forever remain a fund for the use of the Alabama State Normal College at Florence, Ala.

So impressed were the Committee on Public Lands with the justice of this bill, and the great good being done by the State Normal College, that the bill received the unanimous report of the Committee on Public Lands. The report was No. 1938, Fifty-third Congress, and was made by Mr. Kribbs. It is as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8925), granting a township of land for the use of the Alabama State Normal College, having considered the same, make the following report:

The Alabama State Normal College at Florence was established by an act of the legislature of Alabama, and has been maintained as a first-class institute and college, where pupils may acquire a thorough normal-school education. It has now an attendance of 300 students, which, with the requested assistance, could be increased to between 500 and 1,000.

The college has been the means of educating hundreds of young persons, who have not only been benefited themselves by this opportunity for their education, but are devoting themselves to the profession of teaching, and assisting in promoting and improving the efficiency of the schools of the State. The curriculum is of a very high grade. The establishment and maintenance by the State of a college of this character is deserving of the highest commendation, and where a grant, as here requested, that does not require the appropriation of any money, nor of anything that will avail to produce money for the Treasury, will contribute so much to encourage as well as materially benefit the institution, it ought to be made.

Your committee recommend that the bill, without amendment, do pass.

It was too late in the session for this bill to pass during the last Congress, and when we met last December I reintroduced the bill. It is House bill 217 of the present Congress, and I expected that it would receive the immediate favorable consideration of the Committee on Public Lands. You can scarcely imagine my disappointment and surprise to find that instead of reporting my bill and doing partial justice to north Alabama by giving a most important institution in that part of the State 23,040 acres of land, as provided for in my bill, the committee neglected my bill altogether and in place thereof reported a bill giving 50,000 acres to two institutions in south Alabama, thus doubly intensifying the injustice to north Alabama instead of alleviating it, making the donations to south Alabama some 130,000 acres and not giving a single acre to north Alabama.

Similar bills to the ones reported favorably by the House committee were introduced in the Senate, combined into one bill, numbered Senate bill 2461, and passed by that body, and the friends of those bills are seeking to pass this Senate bill through the House. I am thoroughly in favor of that bill, and think it should pass, but I think that the fair-minded, generous men of this House will concur that it ought to be amended so as to give to the schools of north Alabama an amount of land equal to that which is proposed to be donated to the south Alabama schools. I introduced a bill to attain that purpose. It is No. 7266, and if the House will amend the Senate bill as thus provided it will give north Alabama 50,000 acres, leaving south Alabama two and a half times as much. I afterwards introduced another bill, No. 7372, which I respectfully submit would be the proper one to substitute for the Senate bill.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all the public lands within the State of Alabama are hereby donated to the State of Alabama for the purpose of improving the school system in said State, and the Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the State of Alabama patents for said lands: Provided, That the proceeds of said lands, when sold or leased, shall forever remain a fund to be used for the purpose of improving the school system of Alabama; the said proceeds to be apportioned between the schools for colored children and the schools for white children in proportion to their population in said State as shown by the census taken by the United States authorities.

SEC. 2. That in case of the forfeiture of any land of the United States within the State of Alabama which, previous to the passage of this act, had been acquired by homestead, preemption, or any other laws, said land so forfeited shall be patented by the Secretary of the Interior to the State of Alabama for the purposes stated in the first section of this act and under the provisions and limitations as stated in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 3. That after the lands designated in section 1 of this act have been patented to the State of Alabama the land offices in the State of Alabama shall be abolished and all officers connected therewith shall be honorably discharged from the service of the United States.

The passage of this bill would be wise legislation. The State of Alabama could use the lands to great advantage in the cause of education, while, as we have shown, not only are they of no value to the United States, but they are a great expense, the annual cost to the Government being about equal to the total amount of money the Government can ever hope to realize from their sale.

The last census shows that there are more than 400,000 people in the State of Alabama over 10 years of age who can not write.

It is not necessary to speak to this intelligent body of the importance of education. I think my fellow-members will concur with me that every dollar used for this great and good purpose is returned more than a thousandfold by the improvement and development of our citizens.

Among those 400,000 illiterate beings in Alabama there may be minds of great natural grandeur which, cultured, would equal any of the brilliant intellects that history has ever known, but which, like the priceless gem hidden beneath the surface of the earth, while there remaining performs no function more important than does the common pebble by its side.

I consider—

Said Addison—

a human soul without education like marble in the quarry, which shows none of its inherent beauties until the skill of the polisher fetches out the colors, makes the surface shine, and discovers every ornamental cloud, spot, and vein that runs through the body of it. * * *

What sculpture is to a block of marble education is to a human soul.

The philosopher, the saint, the hero, the wise, the good, or the great man very often lie hid and concealed in a plebeian, which a proper education might have disinterred and brought to light.

Leibnitz said:

The way to reform the human race is to reform the education of the young. The good education of youth is the first foundation of human happiness.

I will also quote these eloquent words from Daniel Webster:

If we work upon marble it will perish; if we work upon brass time will efface it; if we rear temples they will crumble into dust; but if we work upon immortal minds, if we imbue them with principles, with the just fear of God and love of our fellow-men, we engrave on those tablets something that will brighten to all eternity.

That distinguished French writer, Mgr. Dupanloup, beautifully says:

The work of the educator bears a likeness to the work of the Creator. If he does not create from nothingness, he draws from slumber and lethargy the benumbed faculties; he gives life and movement and action to an existence yet imperfect.

In this light an intellectual, moral, and religious education is the highest possible human work. It is the continuation of the highest and noblest work of divinity—the creation of souls.

These beautiful phrases carry our minds back to the first thoughts of creation. We recall these words, which are found in the third and fourth verses of the first chapter of Genesis:

And God said, Let there be light, and there was light. And God saw the light, that it was good.

These sublime words of the Almighty as He called the world from chaos, His first recorded utterance, His command to the beings about to be created to "Let there be light," might convey an idea involving something more than a change from the darkness of night to the light of day. May we not indulge the pleasing and beautiful fancy that this was an admonition to us to enlighten minds that were to be implanted in the human frame, a command to the people of all nations and all ages to give light unto the mind?

I appeal to the House to consider this great and most important question in the spirit of the broadest statesmanship and most generous philanthropy. I appeal to them to enact into law the bill which will extend its blessings to all the people of the State, and especially do I appeal to them to do justice to that part of Alabama which has heretofore received no grants of this character. The enactment into law of the last bill which I have read will accomplish this purpose, but to confine this proposed grant of 50,000 acres to the schools of South Alabama, making the special grants to that part of the State 130,000 acres, would be a most glaring injustice to the young people in that most beautiful part of the State which is called North Alabama, who are seeking education. This 50,000 acres will take all the lands which are really valuable; therefore, unless the schools in North Alabama are included in the grant proposed by the Senate bill the lands they might afterwards receive would be of very little value, and incalculable injustice would be done to the people I represent.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House, with the recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8109) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, and with the recommendation that the bill be passed as amended.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move the previous question on the amendment and on the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAINER of Nebraska, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

A bill (S. 100) for the relief of the estate of John R. Bigelow;

Joint resolution (S. R. 104) directing the Secretary of War to transmit to Congress a report on survey of the waterway connecting the waters of Puget Sound at Salmon Bay with Lakes Union and Washington, and to submit an estimate of the cost of constructing said waterway.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave to withdraw papers from the files of the House, without leaving copies (there having been no adverse report), was granted as follows:

To Mr. PITNEY, in the case of Horace B. Gardner, Fifty-first Congress.

To Mr. WOOD, in the case of Jesse Durnell, Fiftieth Congress.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LINNEY, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. MCCORMICK, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. KYLE, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. PARKER, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana, for ten days, on account of sickness.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. LACEY. I ask unanimous consent that House bill No. 3268 be transferred from the Union Calendar to the House Calendar. The reference to the Union Calendar was a mistake.

Several MEMBERS. What is the bill?

Mr. LACEY. It is a bill to facilitate the procurement of evidence and to compel the attendance of witnesses in matters before registers and receivers of the local land offices of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Does not the bill provide for the advancing of fees?

Mr. LACEY. It does not. It provides for subpœnaing witnesses and compelling their attendance in cases before registers and receivers. It involves no appropriation.

Mr. PAYNE. If fees are to be paid, does not that involve a charge upon the Treasury?

Mr. LACEY. This bill relates to land contests between private individuals? There is now no way to compel the attendance of witnesses in such cases, and this bill is to supply that defect in the law.

Mr. PAYNE. But if the bill provides for the payment of fees of witnesses it seems to me it involves a charge on the Treasury.

Mr. LACEY. It relates simply to land contests between individuals.

The SPEAKER. Are not the fees, or some of them, to be advanced by the authority of the United States?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all, unless the Government of the United States should in some instances have a lawsuit before these officers, in which case the Government could compel the attendance of witnesses in the same way as the bill proposes to authorize private individuals to do. But there is no charge upon the Treasury involved in any way. I ask consent that the change of reference be made.

The SPEAKER. Even if the reference should be changed, the bill would be subject to a point of order when it comes up——

Mr. LACEY. Certainly, if the point shall be well taken.

Mr. SAYERS. So that no trouble may arise from the action now asked, I will reserve points of order at this time.

The SPEAKER. A point of order would be good if taken at any time before the consideration of the bill is entered on. If there be no objection, the reference of the bill to the Union Calendar will be rescinded, and the bill will be referred to the House Calendar without prejudice.

There was no objection.

And then, on motion of Mr. HAINER of Nebraska (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

A bill (S. 2141) to amend an act approved August 24, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize purchasers of the property and franchises of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to organize a corporation and to confer upon the same all the powers, privileges, and franchises vested in that company";

A joint resolution (S. R. 104) directing the Secretary of War to transmit to Congress a report on survey of the waterway connecting the waters of Puget Sound at Salmon Bay with Lakes Union and Washington, and to submit an estimate of the cost of constructing said waterway; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 123) directing the Secretary of War to submit a plan and estimate for the improvement of the Nebraska side of the Missouri River opposite Sioux City, Iowa.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. QUAY presented a memorial of 82 citizens of Huntingdon County, Pa., and a memorial of 140 citizens of Newburg, Pa., remonstrating against placing the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. FAULKNER presented the petition of W. R. Jewell and 70 other citizens of Vandalia, W. Va., praying for the removal of the statue of Père Marquette from Statuary Hall; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. ALLEN (for Mr. THURSTON) presented resolutions adopted by the Nebraska Club, in favor of the enactment of legislation requiring educational tests of immigrants; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also (for Mr. THURSTON) presented a petition of Omaha Lodge, No. 1, United National Association of Stationary Engineers, of Omaha, Nebr., praying for the reorganization of the Engineer Corps of the United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also (for Mr. THURSTON) presented the petition of Leo Wolfson, secretary of the Board of Trade of Dallas, Tex., praying for the passage of the so-called Torrey bankruptcy bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PEFFER. I present a petition of sundry citizens, and as I have not had time to indorse it I hardly know how to state its contents except by reading the first sentence, which is as follows:

We, the undersigned citizens of the United States, most respectfully represent to your honorable bodies that there exists within our midst a class of industrial beings or entities whose members as compared with our own race are veritable giants capable of performing prodigious amounts of labor; a single one of them in many instances being able to accomplish as much in a given time as a dozen of our best and most skillful laborers.

I assume from the language of the petition that it is a request for legislation in the interest of laboring people who have to compete with machines. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of the Connecticut Temperance Union, praying for the appointment of an impartial national commission of inquiry, to investigate and report upon the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to crime, pauperism, taxation, and the general public welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of the Purcell Bar Association of Purcell, Ind. T., remonstrating against the repeal of the existing law which gives exclusive jurisdiction to the courts of the Indian Territory over all criminal prosecutions in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorial of J. R. Stubbert and 113 other citizens of New London., Conn., and the memorial of Thomas E. Packer and 86 other citizens of Mystic, Conn., remonstrating against the introduction of military training in the public schools of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TURPIE (for Mr. VOORHEES) presented resolutions adopted by the Young Men's Democratic Club of Boston, Mass., favoring the election of Senators by popular vote; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. SHOUP presented the petition of Mrs. Rebecca Mitchell, Eva Craig Bartin, Mary E. McGee, and Susan E. Holbrook, officers of the Women's White Ribbon Association of Idaho, praying for the appointment of an international board of arbitration between Great Britain and the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

We, White Ribbon women who wear the badge of peace and represent the home, the church, the school, and the philanthropies that seek to enthrone the Golden Rule of Christ, that by its means we may help to bring in the golden age of man, hereby earnestly petition your honorable body to adopt a resolution and appoint a commission to carry out the provisions of the same, whereby all subjects of difference between the United States and our mother country shall be referred to arbitration.

We rejoice that the legislature of the great Empire State of New York, with but one dissenting voice, petitioned you to take the same beneficent action, and we believe that every legislature in the land would gladly do the same. She who bears the soldier begs that he need no longer bear the sword, but that instead the keen blade of justice and the ammunition of cogent argument may be the only weapons used between two great nations so closely akin by reason of their common ancestry and religion, their common language and history, and their common love and loyalty to the home, which is the bright consummate flower of a Christian civilization.

To this end we appeal to you with great good will and entire confidence that our prayer to God and our plea to you will not prove to be in vain.

MRS. REBECCA MITCHELL,
President of the Idaho W. C. T. U.
EVA CRAIG BARTIN,
Recording Secretary of the Idaho W. C. T. U.
MARY E. McGEE,
Corresponding Secretary of the Idaho W. C. T. U.
SUSAN E. HOLBROOK,
Treasurer of the Idaho W. C. T. U.

He also presented a communication from Henry W. Elliott, of Cleveland, Ohio, relative to the condition and driving of fur seals on the Pribilof Islands, Bering Sea, Alaska; which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed as a document.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2741) to reclassify railway postal clerks and prescribe their salaries, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2822) to increase the pension of Theodore V. Purdy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ROACH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1902) granting a pension to Jennie E. Burch, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom were referred four bills, to report them adversely with the recommendation that they be indefinitely postponed. I suppose, to meet the views of the Senators introducing the bills, they may be placed on the Calendar.

The bills were ordered to be placed on the Calendar, as follows:

A bill (S. 983) to consolidate mail matter of the third and fourth classes;

A bill (S. 1030) to require preference to be given to citizens of the States and localities where the mails are to be carried in all mail lettings;

A bill (S. 1162) making an appropriation for the purchase of Fairbanks & Co.'s Infallible American gold and silver coin scale and counterfeit-coin detector for use in the post-offices throughout the United States; and

A bill (S. 2243) for the relief of Rev. Robert Meacham.

Mr. WOLCOTT, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. HAWLEY on the 10th instant, providing that after January 1, 1897, no postage stamps shall be manufactured or furnished by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, etc., intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to report two amendments intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, one providing for the extension of the electric-light plants in the Capitol and to the grounds about the Capitol, and the other for the ventilation of the Senate wing of the Capitol. The second amendment is accompanied by a report made by Prof. S. H. Woodbridge. I move that the amendments be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, together with the accompanying report by Professor Woodbridge.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRITCHARD, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 227) requiring bills of sale, conditional sales, mortgages, or deeds of trust of chattels in the District of Columbia to be recorded, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. QUAY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. WHITE on the 9th instant, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, the amendment proposing to appropriate $12,000 for additions to and alterations in the United States court-house and post-office building at Los Angeles, Cal., reported it without amendment and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

BREVET APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. SEWELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3719) to provide for appointment by brevet of active or retired officers of the United States Army, to report it favorably with an amendment; and as the bill will not excite any opposition, I ask unanimous consent to put it on its passage.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The amendment was, in line 5, to strike out "shall" and insert "may, at the discretion of the President"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all officers of the Regular Army of the United States, active or retired, who served in the volunteer forces during the late war, may, at the discretion of the President, receive a brevet in the Regular Army equal to the highest rank held or the highest brevet received in the said volunteer forces and be commissioned accordingly as of the date of such brevet: Provided, That they have not already received a brevet of equal or higher grade in the Regular Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not care to object, but I should like to know whether the bill increases the pay of these men or not?

Mr. SEWELL. It does not cause a dollar of expense to the Government. It affects a few officers who are still living and who received brevets in the volunteers. It will give them a brevet equal to that rank in the Regular Army for the remainder of their lives. There can be no possible objection to the bill.

Mr. ALLEN rose.

Mr. SEWELL. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I have amended the bill, by order of the committee, so that it is entirely in the discretion of the President to grant the brevet.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if the bill does not carry pay either now or hereafter?

Mr. SEWELL. Not at all.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator what is the necessity or the propriety of the bill?

Mr. SEWELL. It is simply the pride that military men have in rank. There are a number of these gentlemen (the number is confined to thirty or forty, I think) who served as major-generals, commanding divisions and corps, and they are now lieutenant-colonels and colonels in the Army. They would like to hand down to their offspring the rank of brevet major-general in the United States Army. That is the sole purpose.

Mr. HAWLEY. The same rank they received in the volunteers.

Mr. SEWELL. The same rank they received in the volunteers.

Mr. HAWLEY. Which lapsed when they were transferred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLEN. With one word, I think I will withdraw my objection to it. I hope the Senator from New Jersey, who is liberal in this matter—and I feel that he is liberal in all other matters—will consent to amend the bill so that it will embrace all noncommissioned officers and private soldiers as well. Let it be provided——

Mr. SEWELL. I should be glad to do that if I knew what to give them.

Mr. ALLEN. I think they performed services equally meritorious and conspicuous.

Mr. SEWELL. But they did not receive brevets in the volunteer service. The bill refers only to officers who received brevets in the volunteer service.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from New Jersey has no doubt that we could create a rank of brevet colonel or brevet brigadier-general for all the private soldiers and noncommissioned officers and authorize the President to commission them.

Mr. SEWELL. I will say to the Senator that the Congress of the United States might make us all major-generals if it chose to do so.

Mr. ALLEN. I believe I will object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Nebraska to object?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SEWELL. I believe this is an exceedingly meritorious bill. It is one that passed the other House without the least objection, and I have amended it, by order of the committee, so as to take the peremptory part of it out and leave it entirely at the discretion of the President. I move to take the bill up, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a motion would not be in order now.

Mr. ALLEN subsequently said: I send to the desk, and ask to have printed and lie upon the table, an amendment to House bill 3719, which was reported by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] a little while ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, and ordered to be printed and lie on the table, in the absence of objection.

ERIE (PA.) HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. QUAY. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report a joint resolution relative to the improvement of the harbor at Erie, Pa., and to ask for its immediate consideration. The joint resolution calls for information from the Department which is immediately required by the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (S. R. 131) relative to the improvement of the harbor of Erie, Pa., was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to examine into the feasibility and advisability of the improvement of the harbor of Erie, Pa., by the construction of dikes to prevent the closing by sand of the entrance of said harbor, and to make report thereon with an estimate of the cost of such improvement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. HALE. I report from the Committee on Printing a concurrent resolution, and ask for its passage.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows;

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Committees on Enrolled Bills of the two Houses be authorized to correct enrolled joint resolution S. R. 116 by striking out the word "eight" in the said enrolled joint resolution and inserting "seven."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States relating to this subject, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), I return herewith the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 116) authorizing the Public Printer to print the Annual Report of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in quarto form and to bind it in one volume.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 14, 1896.

Mr. HALE. The resolution simply cures the defect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks for the present consideration of the resolution reported by him from the Committee on Printing.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

BURIAL PLACES OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1466) to purchase, inclose, and improve the sites, or portions thereof, of certain forts, battlefields, and graves of American soldiers, sailors, and marines in the Maumee Valley, and to erect thereon appropriate monuments and commemorative tablets, to report it favorably by substitute, and I ask that it be considered at this time. The bill is somewhat lengthy, and I suggest that the substitute only be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the substitute will be read for information, instead of the original bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the substitute.

Mr. ALLISON. If the bill leads to debate——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa object to the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. ALLISON. I shall not object to it if it does not lead to debate.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the substitute; which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That there is hereby appropriated, upon the condition hereinafter prescribed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $17,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of War, on behalf of the United States, to acquire by purchase, or to accept the donation of, the site of Fort Meigs and the burial places adjacent thereto, in the State of Ohio, and the burial place on Put-in-Bay Island, in Lake Erie, in which burial place are interred the remains of certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and to transfer to said burial place or to Fort Meigs, and to inter therein, such remains of soldiers, sailors, and marines of the war of 1812 as may be found at or near any of the battlefields of said war in the State of Ohio, and to inclose said fort and burial places with suitable inclosures, and to erect therein appropriate monuments or tablets in commemoration of the men who lost their lives in the service of the United States on said battlefields or in the battle of Lake Erie: Provided, That this appropriation is made upon the express condition that a like sum of $17,000 be appropriated by the State of Ohio or secured by any association of citizens and placed at the disposal of the Secretary of War for the purposes of this act: And provided further, That upon the fulfillment of the condition above expressed, the Secretary of War may cause proceedings to be instituted in the name of the United States in any court having jurisdiction of such proceedings for the acquirement by condemnation of any land or right pertaining thereto needed to enable him to carry into effect the provisions of this act, such proceedings to be prosecuted in accordance with the laws relating to suits for the condemnation of property of the State wherein the proceedings may be instituted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the protection and preservation of the burial places of certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and for other purposes."

MARIA E. WILSON.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yesterday the bill (H. R. 1181) for the relief of Maria E. Wilson was reported from the Committee on Pensions. Further facts having come to the attention of the committee concerning the bill, I move that it be taken from the Calendar and recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what committee does the Senator from Tennessee desire to have the joint resolution referred?

Mr. BATE. I suppose the committee having charge of that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance, in the absence of objection.

Mr. BATE. I suggest that the joint resolution be referred to the Select Committee on International Expositions, to which committee I understand bills and joint resolutions similar to the one I have just introduced have heretofore been referred. I do not care, however, as to what reference may be given the joint resolution, but merely make that suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary informs the Chair that the joint resolution came originally from the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and therefore the Chair supposes it should be referred to the Committee on Finance of the Senate.

Mr. BATE. Very well; I have no objection to that reference, though we have a committee which I suppose was created for the special purpose of taking charge of such subjects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MANTLE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONTROL OF SLEEPING CARS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to whom was referred Senate No. 1901, a bill to empower the Interstate Commerce Commission to control sleeping cars, and for other purposes, on February 4, 1896, be, and is hereby, directed to report said bill to the Senate at the earliest day possible.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know where the resolution comes from, but I do not think it necessary to adopt the resolution. The Committee on Interstate Commerce is trying to do its duty in these matters without any instruction from the Senate. I can assure whoever introduced it that the committee has been giving and will give proper attention to this and all other business which has been referred to it. I hope with this statement the Senator will not undertake to force a resolution through carrying with it the idea that we are not doing our duty with reference to this subject or any other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois object to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not care to object to its consideration. I want the Senator who offered it to say what he wishes about it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I meant no slight upon the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The bill was referred to the committee on the 4th of February, and I simply wish to call the attention of the committee to the matter. I was informed by the older members of the Senate that to offer such a resolution is not a matter of discourtesy or one that ought to lead to any possible objection on the part of the committee. I intended nothing of that sort. It seems to me the resolution can do no harm, and I hope the Senator from Illinois will withdraw his objection to it.

Mr. CULLOM. I think it is a reflection on the committee itself, because it is a declaration that the committee has not yet reported a bill and the Senate is asked to direct us to report it at once.

Mr. PLATT. Let me suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM. I am perfectly willing to allow that to be done.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Very well; I do not object to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 14th instant approved and signed the act (S. 2132) for the relief of settlers upon lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

REMOVAL OF CLERK IN POST-OFFICE AT PENSACOLA.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate the correspondence relating to the recommendation of the postmaster at Pensacola, Fla., for the removal of a clerk in the post-office at Pensacola, Fla., and the action of the Post-Office Department thereon.

Mr. WOLCOTT subsequently said: I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] and of the Senate to a resolution which was passed unanimously this morning introduced by the Senator from Florida. I noticed only a word or two of it and interposed no objection, for I was engaged at the time. The resolution reads as follows.

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate the correspondence relating to the recommendation of the postmaster at Pensacola, Fla., for the removal of a clerk in the post-office at Pensacola, Fla., and the action of the Post-Office Department thereon.

I do not apprehend that the Senator from Florida desires to put in motion the machinery of the Senate in order that we may ask the Postmaster-General to send to this body the correspondence he may have had with a postmaster at Pensacola looking to the removal of one of his clerks or that the letter of the postmaster at Pensacola to the Post-Office Department should necessarily be sent here for the consideration of the Senate and given publicity.

It may or it may not be such a subject as should be investigated, but in any event, Mr. President, not to occupy the time of the Senate further, I deem it my duty to interpose a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed. Perhaps I can by conversation with the Senator from Florida fix the resolution in such terms as shall meet his views and at the same time save the possible construction that might be put upon the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado enters a motion for the reconsideration of the resolution.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say, in reply to the observation of the Senator from Colorado, that I shall be entirely willing to have the vote by which the resolution was passed reconsidered, provided the Senator will give me some reason why it should be done. When the matter comes properly before the Senate I shall have something further to say regarding it.

AFFAIRS IN CUBA PRIOR TO 1878.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to the resolution of March 24, 1896, requesting that the Senate be furnished with the correspondence of the Department of State between November 5, 1875, and the date of the pacification of Cuba in 1878, relating to the subject of mediation or intervention by the United States in the affairs of that island, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State forwarding such papers as seem to be called for by the resolution in question.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 10,000 additional copies of Bulletin No. 15 of the Office of Experiment Stations of the Department of Agriculture, entitled Handbook of Experiment Station Work; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, pursuant to the notice that I gave yesterday that I would resume the floor to-day upon the privileged question, the resolution for the admission of Henry A. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate, I will, if the Senate will so far indulge me, proceed to consider that matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a resolution which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, February 18, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate, and the Senator from Delaware is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the Senator from Delaware proceeds, I should be glad to know from those having charge of the privileged question before the Senate when it is their purpose to secure a vote upon the proposition? I do this with a view of getting the question out of the way in some form, because it materially interferes with other important business. I know it is also an important question, and I should be glad to learn what the purpose is of those having the matter in charge.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to know whether some disposition can not be made of the Du Pont case so as to finally dispose of it? It has been going on here for a good many weeks at intervals, by unanimous consent and otherwise, and we have allowed appropriation bills to be laid aside and taken up at the close of business in the evening. For that reason I should be glad to have some understanding with our friends who have charge of the pending resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will state to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that as far as I am concerned, I have been anxious from the first, and I am still anxious, to reach a conclusion in the Du Pont case at the earliest possible moment. Speeches have been made, as the Senator knows, on both sides, and there are yet a number of speeches to be made on both sides, as I am advised. I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, as I know the appropriation bills should not be delayed unnecessarily, that after the Senator from Delaware, who has the floor to speak to-day on the Du Pont case, has concluded his speech the Senate shall proceed with the Indian appropriation bill, at all events.

Mr. HALE. I will state to the Senator from Oregon that in addition to that measure the naval appropriation bill has been reported and I am very desirous to go on with it the moment the Indian appropriation bill is out of the way. We expected to get both bills into conference before this time, but, as the Senator from Iowa has said, they have been pushed aside for speeches upon the Delaware case. Senators feel, I think, generally, that we ought to be at work upon the appropriation bills.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There are at least three or four Senators on this side of the Chamber who have notified me that they desire to be heard on the Du Pont case; and on the other side the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] at least has indicated to me that he desires to be heard.

Mr. ALLISON. What I desire is that we shall have some understanding as respects the business of the Senate, so that if the Du Pont case is to be considered now it will be understood that the appropriation bills shall be set aside. Otherwise we should have an understanding that when an appropriation bill is taken up for consideration in the Senate it shall be concluded without injecting other business.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will make to the Senator from Iowa this suggestion, at all events, that after the Senator from Delaware shall have concluded his speech and after the bond question shall have been disposed of, then the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill to a finish, and perhaps by that time we shall be able to have some understanding as to the order of business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to give notice that after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Delaware to-day I shall move an executive session. Senators are probably aware of the object of the executive session.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to say to the Senator from Ohio that there is an agreement by unanimous consent to proceed, when that time comes, with the bond resolution; but we can doubtless arrange as to that matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will not disturb that arrangement.

Mr. PEFFER. With that understanding, of course, I shall not interpose.

Mr. ALLISON. The bond resolution is subject to appropriation bills by a distinct statement made by myself the other day when it was sought to make that resolution a special order. Of course the Senator from Kansas does not expect to go on with the bond resolution to the exclusion of the appropriation bills; at least I hope not. I do not understand that to be the order.

Mr. PEFFER. I understand the agreement to be just as it was made, Mr. President. There was a unanimous-consent agreement made a few days ago that yesterday at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m. we should proceed to the consideration of the bond resolution, but yesterday at 2.15 o'clock we were not ready by reason of the fact that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was on the floor in the midst of a speech. Then, by unanimous consent, the agreement was postponed or delayed until to-day at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. ALLISON. Then I understand the unanimous-consent agreement embraces the idea that the bond resolution is to be the unfinished business. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PEFFER. At that time?

Mr. ALLISON. At that time.

Mr. PEFFER. That is the understanding.

Mr. ALLISON. Giving way, of course, either by unanimous consent or otherwise, to appropriation bills.

Mr. PEFFER. That is rulable, undoubtedly.

Mr. PALMER. I wish to say that I desire to address the Senate on the Du Pont case, and will be ready at any time it suits the convenience of the Senate to hear me after the Senator from Delaware has concluded. So there need be no delay so far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the suggestion made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Iowa, will be agreed to. We have been considering this privileged question in the Senate at odd times for the last month. We have now reached a point where all the great appropriation bills are nearly ready for the consideration of this body. It is unfair and it is a loss of time to attempt to bring the appropriation bills in here as we have done and sandwich them between the privileged question and the ordinary business of the Senate. We have reached appropriation bills in which there are great questions involved besides the mere amount of money to be appropriated, and those bills will have to be considered by the Senate very fully. It seems to me it would expedite business if we could have an agreement now to vote upon the privileged question on Wednesday next at 3 o'clock without further debate. If such an agreement is made we can then proceed with the ordinary business of the Senate——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I can not agree to a vote upon the Du Pont case at that time in view of the notices I have received from Senators on both sides of the Chamber who desire to be heard upon it.

Mr. GORMAN. That would give one week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Oregon to object to fixing a time?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I have already stated to the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and I now repeat to the Senator from Maryland, that perhaps after the Indian appropriation bill is out of the way and we ascertain just who desire to be heard further upon the Du Pont case——

Mr. HALE. And the naval appropriation bill, I suggest also. That bill is on the Calendar and ready to be brought before the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Well, I suggest that we may then probably be able to see our way clear to make some arrangement. But at present I am unable to agree to any time for a vote upon the Du Pont case.

Mr. GORMAN. That, I take it, practically means that this case is not to be considered until after the 1st of June.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It does not, by any manner of means.

Mr. GORMAN. In view of the condition of the business of the Senate, with the debate that will necessarily occur upon the appropriation bills, with the very full consideration which those important measures now coming on require, and which ought to be disposed of before the 1st day of June—this is a question involving the right of a gentleman to a seat in this body; it is a privileged question; and it seems to me that some time should be fixed for taking the vote upon it. If one week will not do, ten days hence ought to be fixed, so that we can get it out of the way of all these important measures.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will say what the Senate appreciates and understands, that this privileged question has not been proceeded with regularly. It has been taken up only at odd times, a speech made now and another then. We have not proceeded with it any one day for the full day. As far as I am concerned, I have a desire to accommodate the business of the Appropriations Committee and other business of the Senate, and I am now willing, having charge of the privileged question, that after the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] the Indian appropriation bill and the naval appropriation bill shall be taken up and concluded, and then I desire to go on and proceed to a finish with the Du Pont case.

Mr. STEWART. What has become of the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is included.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEWART. I wish it distinctly understood that there is a unanimous-consent agreement to consider the bond resolution after the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I should like to say——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I do not wish to interfere with that, of course.

Mr. STEWART. The bond resolution might be passed without any discussion. Everybody can read it and know what it is. There is no necessity for any discussion of it. I think it obviously ought to be passed, and it is very important before the appropriation bills are disposed of that we should know what the probable revenue will be. If the present policy continues——

Mr. HOAR. I shall object to debate, I believe, when the Senator from Nevada gets through.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Massachusetts can not take a Senator off the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I call for the regular order.

Mr. STEWART. If the present policy is to continue——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts calls for the regular order.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to interpose until the Senator from Nevada has finished.

Mr. STEWART. I will finish my sentence.

Mr. HOAR. I say I do not wish to cut off the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I do not want to break off in the midst of a sentence. I say if the present policy of selling bonds continues it will be necessary to make very large appropriations in order to get the money out of the Treasury, or we shall have no money in the country with which to do business.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senator will be satisfied with our efforts.

Mr. STEWART. If that resolution should be passed we could perhaps be a little more economical.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, in what I have to say in regard to the claim made on behalf of Mr. Du Pont that he was elected by the legislature of Delaware in May, 1895, as a Senator from that State to this body I shall endeavor to be as brief as clearness of statement will permit. As a citizen of the State where the legality of that claim is strenuously denied, I have been more than willing that other Senators, free from any supposed bias in this matter, should bear the burden, such as it is, of the argument on this side in opposition to that claim. I do not mean that I am conscious of any such bias as would interfere with the clear and impartial exercise of the judicial function we are now called upon to assume. At all events, I am most fortunate in approaching the discussion of this case free from all prepossession against the personality of the claimant, who has long been known to me as an accomplished gentleman and worthy of the high esteem and regard in which he is held as a citizen of my State. It is only because the claim made of his election is utterly unsupported by any view of the constitution of Delaware heretofore taken, or by any just view capable of being taken, that I conceive it my duty to oppose that claim.

Mr. President, at the outset it is proper to remark, in view of what has been said by all the Senators who have spoken in support of this claim, that all fair prepossessions founded upon the merits, founded upon the situation in the State of Delaware, are in favor of the propositions that I now support and which have been supported by the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in opposition to the claim of Mr. Du Pont. If Mr. Du Pont shall be seated, he will be seated because a community in the State of Delaware has been disfranchised; he will be seated because one of the regularly elected members of the legislature upon which the duty of electing a United States Senator devolved has been deprived of the right to exercise the function of an elector, and thereby made a result possible which, if he had not been thus deprived, could not have been brought about. In other words, Mr. President, those who support the claim of Mr. Du Pont to a seat in this body can only hope to be successful by the accident of a vacancy in representation, which they argue has been brought about under the provisions of the constitution of Delaware.

No one doubts that if every person elected to the legislature of the State of Delaware by the people of that State was present and voting when the election for United States Senator was being held Mr. Du Pont would not be seated. No one doubts if Kent County in the State of Delaware had its full representation, which it had elected under the constitution, in that electoral body that Mr. Du Pont would not have been chosen. So that, if he should be admitted here and it should be declared that he was elected and entitled to a seat in this body, it would be by reason of this casus in the situation in the State of Delaware, and not by reason of the will of the people as expressed when they elected the members of the legislature.

So that, Mr. President, what I have said seems to me very apposite when we consider how each of the Senators who have supported this claim has animadverted in terms of more or less severity upon what they term a usurpation upon the part of one of the members elected from one of the counties in that State to the senate of Delaware, on what they variously call a seizure of office, an extrusion of the rightful speaker of the senate, and a seizing of the position. Mr. President, none of these epithets is applicable, none of them is justified by the situation, none of them applies justly to the situation that was created by the exercise by Mr. Watson of the office of governor under the constitution of Delaware.

I do not think it worth while to continue further in this line that has been opened up by Senators on the other side of this question, because I am quite willing to rest this case upon what I conceive to be the clear meaning of the constitution of the State. All we claim is that the provisions of that constitution shall not be set aside by the Senate of the United States. All we claim is that every legislative elector sent to the general assembly of the State of Delaware by the people of that State shall be allowed to exercise the right and the privilege and the duty that was imposed upon him when he was elected by his constituency; and it is only by depriving one of them of that right and of that commission given to him by his constituents that Senators can hope to seat the claimant in this case.

Mr. President, I pass for the present the attempt of the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to have the Senate of the United States rewrite the constitution of Delaware and assume jurisdiction over the qualifications of a member of the Delaware senate, a jurisdiction belonging exclusively to that body. I wish, first, to vindicate the action of Speaker Watson in voting for United States Senator after he had assumed the exercise of the office of governor; and I do this, not because I believe that this is the tribunal where that vindication should be made, but because his conduct in the premises has been denounced and unsparingly assailed on this floor, and because the interpretation of the constitution of my State, acquiesced in through a hundred years of its history, and in accordance with which he acted, can be, as it has been, overwhelmingly sustained.

I will therefore proceed to state as succinctly as possible the propositions of law and fact which support and vindicate the statement made by the speaker of the Delaware senate as presiding officer in the joint assembly of the legislature on the 9th of May, 1895, at the conclusion of the last ballot on that day, when he declared that, no person having received a majority of the votes cast for United States Senator, there was no election to said office. I may say, in passing, that the statement was made twenty-seven times by the speaker of the senate of Delaware as presiding officer of the joint assembly, that no person having received a majority of all the votes cast for United States Senator there was no election to said office, and that no one out of the full membership of that assembly ever rose in his seat to suggest, much less to protest, that that statement was not literally and accurately true.

This belongs to the recital of the history of events upon which all argument must be founded. These proceedings appear in the regular journal of the joint assembly, as attested by the clerk of the senate, who was the clerk of that joint assembly, and a copy of the same appears as an exhibit in the report of the majority of the committee.

The parts of the constitution of Delaware with which we are principally concerned in this discussion are those which I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read for me. They are from Article II, which treats of legislative power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUTLER in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE II.

SECTION 1. The legislative power of this State shall be vested in a general assembly, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives.

SEC. 2. The representatives shall be chosen [for two years] by the citizens residing in the several counties.

No person shall be a representative who shall not have attained the age of 24 years, and have been a citizen and inhabitant of the State three years next preceding the first meeting of the legislature after his election, and the last year of that term an inhabitant of the county in which he shall be chosen, unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States or of this State.

There shall be seven representatives chosen in each county, until a greater number of representatives shall by the general assembly be judged necessary; and then, two-thirds of each branch of the legislature concurring, they may by law make provision for increasing their number.

SEC. 3. The senators shall be chosen for four years by the citizens residing in the several counties.

No person shall be a senator who shall not have attained to the age of 27 years, and have, in the county in which he shall be chosen, a freehold estate in 200 acres of land, or an estate in real or personal property, or in either, of the value of £1,000 at least, and have been a citizen and inhabitant of the State three years next preceding the first meeting of the legislature after his election, and the last year of that term an inhabitant of the county in which he shall be chosen, unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States or of this State.

There shall be three senators chosen in each county. When a greater number of senators shall by the general assembly be judged necessary, two-thirds of each branch concurring, they may by law make provision for increasing their number; but the number of senators shall never be greater than one-half nor less than one-third of the number of representatives.

If the office of representative or the office of senator become vacant before the regular expiration of the term thereof, a representative or a senator shall be elected to fill such vacancy, and shall hold the office for the residue of said term.

When there is a vacancy in either house of the general assembly, and the general assembly is not in session, the governor shall have power to issue a writ of election to fill such vacancy; which writ shall be executed as a writ issued by a speaker of either house in case of vacancy.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 5. Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers; and also each house, whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor, may choose a speaker pro tempore.

SEC. 6. Each house shall judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as shall be deemed expedient.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 12. No senator or representative shall, during the time for which he shall have been elected, be appointed to any civil office under this State, which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which shall have been increased, during such time. No person concerned in any army or navy contracts, nor member of Congress, nor any person holding any office under this State, or the United States, except the attorney-general, officers usually appointed by the courts of justice, respectively, attorneys at law, and officers in the militia, holding no disqualifying office, shall, during his continuance in Congress or in office, be a senator or representative.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I now read from Article III of the constitution, which relates to the executive power:

ARTICLE III.

SECTION 1. The supreme executive power of the State shall be vested in a governor.

SEC. 2. The governor shall be chosen by the citizens of the State.

There is no suggestion, much less any authorization, in that first section, or in any other provision of the constitution, that a governor can be created in any other fashion—

The governor shall be chosen by the citizens of the State.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 3. The governor shall hold his office during four years from the third Tuesday in January next ensuing his election, and shall not be eligible a second time to said office.

SEC. 4. He shall be at least 30 years of age, and have been a citizen and inhabitant of the United States twelve years next before the first meeting of the legislature after his election, and the last six of that term an inhabitant of this State, unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States or of this State.

SEC. 5. No member of Congress, nor person holding any office under the United States, or this State, shall exercise the office of governor.

* * * * * * *

After reading these clauses of the constitution of Delaware there will be no difficulty in understanding the true bearing of section 14, which is the important one in this case.

It provides as follows:

SEC. 14. Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If the person elected governor shall die, or become disqualified, before the commencement of his term of office, or shall refuse to take the same, the person holding the office shall continue to exercise it until a governor shall be elected and duly qualified. If upon a vacancy happening in the office of governor there be no other person who can exercise said office within the provisions of the constitution, the secretary of state shall exercise the same until the next meeting of the general assembly, who shall immediately proceed to elect, by joint ballot of both houses, a person to exercise the office until a governor, elected by the people, shall be duly qualified. If a vacancy occur in the office of governor, or if the governor-elect die, or become disqualified, before the commencement of his term, or refuse to take the office, an election for governor shall be held at the next general election, unless the vacancy happen within six days next preceding the election, exclusive of the day of the happening of the vacancy and the day of the election; in that case, if an election for governor would not have been held at said election, without the happening of such vacancy, no election for governor shall be held at said election in consequence of such vacancy. If the trial of a contested election shall continue longer than until the third Tuesday of January next ensuing the election of a governor, the governor of the last year, or the speaker of the senate, or of the house of representatives, who may then be in the exercise of the executive authority, shall continue therein until a determination of such contested election. The governor shall not be removed from his office for inability but with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the legislature.

It is submitted, sir, that an intelligent and careful reading of these provisions would not leave a doubt of the following propositions:

First. That the scheme of the Delaware constitution provides for a governor, to be elected by the people, in whom the supreme executive powers of the State shall be vested, who shall hold his office for a term of four years and have certain prescribed qualifications and not be eligible for a second time to the office.

Second. That no other than one so elected for the term and with the qualifications prescribed by the constitution is a governor in the full constitutional sense.

Third. That the framers of that constitution, regarding the vicissitudes of human life, have provided in case of the death of a governor so elected that the duties of the office shall be discharged by a person holding a place of high dignity in the legislative department of the government, to wit, the speaker of the senate, who is necessarily a senator elected to represent one of the counties of the State.

Fourth. That the speaker, upon whom the constitution in such a contingency devolves the exercise of the office, exercises a temporary and ad interim function until a governor in the full constitutional sense can be elected by the people. That he does not exercise the office for a full term of four years or for the remainder of the term of the deceased governor, but only until an election for governor can be had; it may be only for a few weeks.

Fifth. That the constitution in devolving this temporary ad interim function upon the speaker of the senate has not provided that thereby such speaker shall vacate the place of a senator from the county to which he was elected. And the whole scheme of the constitution negatives any implication of the intent to create such a vacancy.

The speaker of the senate in such cases is a guardian of the gubernatorial office, like the civil law term in loco parentis—in loco gubernatoris—custos; like the great seal, being "in commission" when there is no chancellor.

Those are cases which seem to me analogous and most like the provision that is made by the Delaware constitution for the contingency of the death of a governor elected by the people. All of these exercises of authority are well understood and well known as not conferring either the rank or the power or the substance of the office, but are stop-gaps; they are made for a temporary emergency, which it was thought best should be provided for in order that the machinery of government might not break down. It does not require any refined exegesis to explain that to the plain people of the State for whom constitutions are made. They can understand that one officer may, upon a temporary emergency, exercise the duties of another office without stepping into the shoes of that officer, or being or becoming the officer whose duties he is performiug. It is a thing which belongs to the common affairs of everyday life, and when the constitution makers of Delaware framed this provision to meet a temporary emergency they knew that they were speaking to people who would understand the machinery that had been provided to meet the case that was described.

It is inconceivable that intelligent men, engaged in the serious business of framing the organic law of a State, should have neglected to expressly declare and provide for a vacancy in the representation in the senate from a county, if one was intended or contemplated, when the speaker of the senate should exercise the office of governor upon the happening of a contingency for which they were then providing. Think of it for a moment, Mr. President! Here were presumably intelligent men, selected from the body of the citizenship of the State, a State that has proved its capacity for self-government through a hundred years of American history, and these men, thus selected to make a framework of government, after providing for the deposit of executive power, and coming to the obvious suggestion that there might be by resignation, death, or removal a temporary vacancy in the office of governor, proceed to provide for that contingency. And they do provide for it, not by leaving the office vacant for a time, however short, for they knew that the inconveniences of having an absolutely vacant office, or having no one to exercise the executive power when it should be necessary to exercise it, would be great, but they said that, although we have provided that the governor shall be elected by the people, or chosen by the people, as is the more apt phrase of the constitution, and in him all executive power is lodged, yet if during his term he dies or is removed or is unable to perform the duties of his office, then until we can have another governor elected by the people we will take the obvious, common-sense, businesslike procedure of devolving the duties of that office upon a man already elected by the people and promoted to a high and dignified office, to wit, the speakership of the senate of the State, and say that he shall exercise it for what time? For the balance of the term? No; but until the people shall elect a governor and he qualifies.

Mr. President, is there anything remarkable about that? Is there anything to justify the epithet of "anomalous" applied to it by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] yesterday afternoon? Imagine that having done that, these framers of the organic law of Delaware, having devolved that duty upon the speaker of the senate of Delaware as a stop-gap, should have been confronted with the suggestion "you have probably made a vacancy in the office or position or place of representative in the senate from Kent County, or Newcastle, or Sussex," and they said, as the Senator from Oregon in effect declares they said, "Oh, well; let it go; we will leave it open for construction when the occasion arises." Or suppose they had been told that "there was an American system, an American common law" that was so binding, that was so well understood, so all-pervasive, that of its own force it would work a vacancy, as was said by the Senator from New Hampshire yesterday. If there was such a law, as claimed by the Senator from New Hampshire, we must presume that those framers of the constitution of Delaware understood it as well as he, that John M. Clayton, George Read, James Rogers, Willard Hall, and Charles Polk, and their colleagues knew as much about the American system as even the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire. Yet we are asked by the distinguished Senator to believe that when these men were confronted with this American doctrine which is said created a vacancy in the representation from a county, depriving the constituency of one-third of its representation, they said, "We will not provide for it; let it go; let one-third of the people of that county go unrepresented." Vacancy in the representation of a county where there are only three to represent it is about as important a matter as a vacancy in the Executive office, and yet we are told that those men, confronted with that situation, were willing that the vacancy should go unprovided for, and never wrote one line to show that they recognized that vacancy, much less to provide for filling it.

I am here to defend my State from the imputation of ever having had a constitutional convention composed of men so fatuous, so unfitted for the high duty they were called upon to perform, that when confronted with an exigency like that they did not have intelligence enough to deal with it. Oh, no, Mr. President; I said it was inconceivable. So it is. When they said that the duties of this office shall devolve upon the senator who happens to be speaker it never entered their heads that they were vacating the office of senator from one of the counties, or else we know that they would have provided for the filling of that vacancy.

We might stop and leave the case here, taking the plain language of the constitution in section 14, which says:

Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor, by his death * * * the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

We might stop there, with not a word in the section or in the constitution about the effect of that provision upon the representation of a county in the senate, not a suggestion that a vacancy was ever contemplated, and say we will not do violence to common sense, to the rights of the people of a sovereign State, by here in the Senate of the United States undertaking, under our power to judge of the qualifications and elections of a Senator of this body, to unseat a senator or vacate a place in the senate of Delaware.

Mr. MILLS. May I ask the Senator from Delaware a question?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. MILLS. Suppose the office of governor should have been cast upon the speaker of the house of representatives, as is contended for, and then an election should be ordered for governor of the State and a governor elected in accordance with the constitution; would the speaker then be out of office?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly. As soon as the governor is qualified the speaker would cease, in the language of the constitution, the exercise of the office of governor.

Mr. MILLS. He would not be speaker? He would have lost his office as speaker entirely?

Mr. GRAY. He would not have lost his office as speaker or senator. I will come to that point presently. The practice for one hundred years under the preceding constitution, which was precisely similar, has been that he resumed his place.

Mr. MILLS. I think the word "until" would imply that he did.

Mr. GRAY. I think so. I do not think there is any other construction to be put upon it.

We are not to make pawns of the rights of the citizens of a State upon the political chessboard. We are not to gamble away the rights of great communities, and to stultify our own common sense in order to accomplish a predetermined purpose or end. Constitutions, as I said a while ago, are made for the plain people of a State. They were meant to be interpreted by those plain rules which govern the meaning of the English language, in which they are written, and it will not do here in this high place by argumentation, by dialectics, by refined and subtle reasoning to reason away the plain, obvious, common-sense meaning of these great charters, and leave the people dazed and amazed at the consequences of what they themselves have done.

They had provided that each county should have three senators, and they had provided that all vacancies should be immediately and without delay filled by a special election. They recognized the serious consequences of a vacancy in the representation of a county. Did they intend to create a vacancy of which they did not speak, or leave it, as the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections says, an open question whether there was a vacancy or not, to be determined by the casuistry of lawyers and United States Senators?

One of the most remarkable of all the remarkable and ingenious arguments that have been made in this case on behalf of the claimant was made by his counsel before the committee and indorsed by the chairman of the committee when he says:

The true construction—

As if this section wanted any construction in the sense in which they are speaking here—

The true construction of this section is not that it is optional with the speaker, either of the senate or of the house, while exercising the office of governor also to perform the functions of speaker and senator or representative, but that when the speaker shall exercise the office of governor the house shall have authority to choose another speaker.

He is alluding now to an interpretation of that clause in the constitution which says that when the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office of governor the senate may elect a speaker pro tempore.

This—

Says the counsel—

leaves it open for construction when occasion arises to determine whether or not by becoming governor the speaker thereby vacates his offices of senator and speaker.

Is it worth while to pursue further an argument which has been driven into that corner, that here a solemn provision of the constitution of a State is said not to be amenable to the plain, obvious construction which it bears upon its face, but the true construction is that it is left open when occasion arises to determine whether or not by becoming governor the speaker thereby vacates his office of senator and speaker? As though constitutions were made in order to raise questions, moot questions, to exercise the wit and ingenuity of lawyers, and not made for the government of a plain, honest, and intelligent people. He says the true construction is that it is left open for determination when the occasion arises.

Mr. GEORGE. That would mean that those who were the framers of the constitution refused to do so and left it to their successors in after years to frame it for them.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly. That is what it means, that they were derelict in their high duty of framing the organic law of the State, but in this important particular left it open for future determination when the occasion arises; borrowing trouble from the future; going to seek it, instead of quietly—by a plain, simple provision—setting all question at rest.

No such absurd argument, I say with all due respect to the committee, was ever before made in regard to the interpretation of any constitution of a free State.

Mr. PUGH. What reason can be imagined for leaving it open?

Mr. GRAY. Nothing we can suppose, except to gratify those who delight in the display of ingenious and refined argument. That way of looking at this provision has done this, I grant you. It has given to us the pleasure of seeing the most remarkable exhibition of the ability and ingenuity and dialectical skill of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. But if there is any other conceivable purpose for which they should have adopted an interpretation which Senators solemnly say they did adopt, that is, the open construction theory, I am not competent to imagine it.

According to the other side these men were engaged in making a provision for the given contingency of the death of the governor, by compelling a senator temporarily to exercise the office, yet they either did not know that their action was creating an almost equally important vacancy in the representation of a county, or if they knew it they did not consider it a matter grave enough to mention and provide for or even to allude to. We do not believe it. No argumentation can convince a reasonable man that either alternative was true. On the contrary, the express language of the constitution tells us that they did have in mind and did contemplate the consequences and possible effect of what they were doing, for it says that each house whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor—may elect another senator in his place? No—but may choose a speaker pro tempore.

The framers of the constitution thereby declared, not only by their silence but expressly, that the exercise of the office of governor by a senator in the contingency provided for should not work a vacancy in the representation of any county in the senate. The whole scheme of the constitution is in harmony with this plain meaning and construction. Could anything more clearly show that they knew what they were doing? Here they were providing for the consequences of imposing the duty of exercising the office of governor on a senator. How did they do it? By providing for a vacancy or suspension? No. But by a provision that negatived a vacancy or suspension.

Mr. President, imagine, if such a feat of imagination were possible, that here, when they had ordained that in the event of the death of the governor the speaker of the senate should exercise the office until a governor could be elected by the people, and that immediately thereafter they had said when the speaker of the senate or of the house shall exercise the office of governor either house may elect a speaker pro tempore—imagine any one getting up in the convention and saying we have adopted this provision for the temporary exercise of the office of governor and we have provided that when the speaker is in the exercise of the office of governor a speaker pro tempore may be elected by the senate or the house, as the case may be; but there is an American law, to use the phrase of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], which provides that whenever a legislative officer is called upon to exercise executive duties he shall vacate his legislative place. Imagine, then, that they, by silence or by express assent, go on with their work on other branches of the constitution without a syllable to show that they either recognized that American public law, as it is called, or attempted to provide for the consequences it might work.

The constitution does not make the speaker of the senate governor, and if I understood aright the exceedingly able and interesting argument of my friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], the whole force of what he said was directed during the hour that he spoke to show that when the constitution did say that the speaker of the senate shall in the contingency of the death of the governor exercise the office of governor it made him governor. That was the burden of his argument. It was insisted upon by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], the chairman of the committee; it was dwelt upon by the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] and by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. The framers of the constitution could make just such provision as they pleased. They could say that the speaker of the senate "shall be governor" or "shall become governor" upon the happening of this contingency; but they did not say it. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has shown in his interesting and exhaustive argument that they knew the English language and they knew how to say "become" and "be" when they wanted to say "become" and "be." But they did not say it here. What are you going to do about it? They have chosen to make a distinction between being governor and exercising the office of governor, and who shall say them nay? Do you deny the power to make that distinction? Do you deny to the people of a State in framing their organic law the right to use such language as expresses their intent? You say they said he shall become governor, but when we turn to the constitution we find that it says the speaker in such contingency shall exercise the office of governor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The provision in the Constitution of the United States with respect to the Vice-President does not say that the Vice-President shall become the President, and yet would the Senator from Delaware contend that the Vice-President does not become the President of the United States to all intents and purposes in the event of a vacancy?

Mr. GRAY. We are not discussing the Constitution of the United States at the present moment; at least I am not. But if it were necessary, and I may have something to say about it before I conclude, to take up the line of argument suggested by the Senator from Oregon, I would merely suggest to him that it has been a matter of considerable difficulty with jurists in this country wherever it has been discussed whether he became President or was acting President, and I think that the weight of authority and opinion, as far as I am able to estimate it, is on the side of considering the Vice-President in that event as acting President, just as the Constitution describes him, and not as President. However that may be, we are discussing the constitution of Delaware and not the Constitution of the United States, and I will say that anyone who reads that constitution will agree with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], and I take pride in saying it, that its language, its style, its verbiage, and the knowledge it implies of the use of words and the force of language are equal to that displayed in the Constitution of the United States.

Of course there is no limit to the exercise of the human intellect. Ingenuity, dialectical skill, from the time of the scholiasts to the time of the Senator from Oregon, has been employed to "make the worse appear the better reason." There is no human language that can be employed, however plain and direct, which, when subjected to this sort of intellectual exercise, can not be made to create at least conundrums and puzzles for the ingenious and skillful. But, Mr. President, we are here exercising the high judicial function imposed upon us by the Constitution of the United States, and it has been over and over again declared in this body and in every other tribunal which has been called upon to consider such questions that when you are called upon to construe a statute, much more the organic law of a State, "words are things," and that the plain, obvious meaning of the English language employed in setting down the landmarks of a State's government shall not be tortured or twisted or strained out of their natural and ordinary meaning in order to make occasion for the exploitation of the skill of the particular expounder, and that where words are used ex industria they are to be taken as meaning something, and that where one word or set of words is used in contradistinction or in apposition to another there is meant to be a clear line of demarcation between them, and you are not at liberty to disregard that use of language.

The constitution does not make the speaker of the senate governor. It does not say that in a certain contingency he shall be governor, but it everywhere keeps separate and distinct the governor elected by the people from one who on the death of the governor exercises the office temporarily and ad interim. It is all well enough to say that they mean the same thing, and that the governmental machine runs along when somebody is exercising the office, but it will not do to disregard the plain distinction that the framers of the constitution chose to make between the two. Nowhere in the constitution where it is necessary to speak of such a person is he spoken of as governor, but he always is called by the long and more inconvenient location of speaker of the senate or house exercising the office of governor. Does that mean nothing?

When speaking of this man after the duties have been devolved upon him, not when they are making the provision which devolved the duties upon him, they always speak of him as speaker of the house or of the senate exercising the office of governor. Why did they not say "governor"? They could have said it. It is shorter, less roundabout.

Mr. GEORGE. Because they did not want him to be governor.

Mr. GRAY. They had a purpose. They chose to distinguish them, and they had a right to distinguish them.

Article III, section 1, says:

The supreme executive powers of the State shall be vested—

Where?

in a governor.

Section 2 says:

The governor shall be chosen by the citizens of the State.

A governor in the full constitutional sense must, as I have before said, be elected by the people.

Section 3 of this article says:

The governor shall hold his office during four years.

"The speaker of the senate," says section 14, "when there is a vacancy in the office of governor," shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Would it disturb the Senator from Delaware if I ask him a question right here?

Mr. GRAY. Not at all.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Perhaps I should like to ask two questions. The first one is this: Is there any one function that a governor elected by the people of Delaware can exercise which can not be exercised by the person who as speaker of the senate succeeds to the exercise of the office of governor, or is there any—I was about to say penalty, and I will say it—penalty to which the governor elected by the people of the State is subject or may be subject to which the speaker of the senate who succeeds to the exercise of the office of governor is not subject? That is the question.

Mr. GRAY. Is that the whole of it?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is all of this question.

Mr. GRAY. There it is again. The constitution of Delaware or its framers have seen fit clearly to distinguish between the governor, who they say shall be chosen by the people for four years, and the speaker of the senate, who in a given contingency shall exercise the office of governor. They have chosen to do it; they have continued that distinction all through the constitution; and yet the Senator comes here and says that it means the same thing as "be" or "become" governor, because the person who thus exercises the office performs every duty that is imposed upon the governor. That may be, but in between the performance of those duties I take it he is not governor, nor is he governor when he is performing them, but he is the person whom the constitution directs to perform them.

They have seen fit to make that distinction, and yet the Senator from Oregon says they had no right to make it. He says it means something else; it means that he shall be governor—just as the people of Pennsylvania after having a constitution such as we have, acting upon it as we have in the State of Delaware, when they came to amend their constitution said the speaker of the senate in that contingency shall become governor. They had a right to say it, to make the distinction.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That was a very long answer to a question that might have been answered yes or no.

Mr. GRAY. I am not here when I am making my argument to be catechised categorically by the Senator, to answer yes or no.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly not. Then do I understand the Senator from Delaware to admit in substance and effect that there is not a single function which the governor of Delaware elected by the people can exercise but can be exercised and is exercised by the speaker of the senate who succeeds to the exercise of the office of governor?

Mr. GRAY. I do not admit it. I say that the speaker who exercises the office undoubtedly performs the duties that are imposed upon the governor. That is what I say, and I do not choose to put my answer in any different form from that.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Very well. Now, one other question bearing on the same point. Does the Senator from Delaware regard that there is any difference at all in the character of the person (call him governor or what you please, that is his official character) who is the speaker of the senate and who succeeds to the exercise of the office of governor and the person who may be, under certain circumstances, elected by the legislature to exercise the office of governor until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified?

Mr. GRAY. I do not know, Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. In the one case an official is taken and in the other case a person is taken, not an official. Do they occupy any different position?

Mr. GRAY. I do not know, and if the Senator from Oregon will excuse me, I do not think it necessary to answer that conundrum. I am not prepared to answer. I have not thought much of it, but I have my view of it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I think it is very important.

Mr. GRAY. I do not think it is important. I do not think it has any materiality here at all.

Mr. President, there is a difference which the common mind recognizes between the officer full panoplied with all the dignity that the constitution ordained by the people can give him and the one who temporarily performs the duty when he is unable or when God has smitten him with death. Is there no difference between the chancellor of England and the commission who holds the seal? Is there no difference between the custodian of the property and rights appointed when the proper owner is dead and that proper owner? Is it not a common distinction everywhere that the one stands in a relation temporarily, as I said a while ago, where a man stands in loco parentis? Is the guardian the father because he exercises the duties of natural parent? Not at all. The distinction is important. We do not choose in Delaware to invest this temporary stop-gap with the dignity and with the supreme power of governor elected by the people. We say to him, "We want you and command you to exercise the duties when this visitation of Providence has come and taken our governor away until we can elect a governor, one who shall exercise the office of governor until a governor is elected by the people."

There is where they make the distinction in the first place, and it runs all through the constitution. I am here to show that the Senate of the United States has no right in the exercise of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution of the United States to ignore that distinction. It has no right to invade a State and override its constitution according to its notions of what that constitution ought to be. It may be that the Senator of New Hampshire was right in his learned argument and the distinction he made between legislative powers and executive powers. It ought always to be maintained after the strictest fashion. But can we impose that upon a State? No; we are here to recognize the people of the State and the organic law that they ordain as equal authority and binding force with the Constitution of the United States. It is part of our scheme of government. The Constitution of the United States recognizes it. The preservation of the rights of the States is just as important to the integrity of the National Government as the enforcement of the provisions of the National Constitution itself.

What is our scheme of government? It is a dual scheme. That is recognized everywhere. It is just as much our business to preserve that dual scheme in all its integrity, it is just as much our duty to be jealous of the rights and powers of the States, as it is that we should keep ourselves within proper observance of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. You can not get away from it. That is the American doctrine. That is the atmosphere we breathe, and we can not live as American citizens out of that atmosphere.

Mr. President, I was speaking, when I was interrupted, of the distinction the constitution of Delaware has seen fit to make in the very beginning between a governor elected by the people and a speaker of the senate or house who shall on a given contingency exercise that office. The governor elected by the people is not eligible a second time to the office; but a senator who exercises the office may be elected at the next or any subsequent election. That is a pretty considerable difference between the one who exercises the office and the one who is really the governor.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a difference of function or of power, the Senator from Delaware will allow me to say.

Mr. GRAY. The constitution says that—

The governor shall hold his office during four years from the third Tuesday in January next ensuing his election, and shall not be eligible a second time to said office.

But a senator who exercises the office may be elected, as I said, at the next or any subsequent election. The Senator from Oregon says that on a vacancy happening in the office of governor all the constitution does is to make the speaker "eligible" to the office of governor, and if he does not waive it he becomes governor. The constitution says that when there is a vacancy by reason of death in the office of governor the speaker of the senate "shall" exercise the duties of the office, but the Senator says, and I repeat, that when a vacancy happens in the office of governor all the constitution does is to make the speaker "eligible." What is the meaning of "eligible" in the clause "eligible to the office"? Why, capable of being chosen. But the constitution says he "shall exercise the office." It is mandatory. He can not get away from it. It is not for him to accept. It is just as much a part of his duty as senator and speaker as it is to attend on the sessions of the senate and perform his duty to his constituency when there.

Mr. MILLS. The governor, they contend, can be governor half a dozen times.

Mr. GRAY. Yes, but the Senator from Oregon disregards this peremptory and imperative command, "shall exercise the office," and merely makes the speaker eligible to the office of governor.

Now, look at what violence they have to do to the text of the constitution in order to accomplish that result. We read it as it is and take the plain common-sense interpretation. They say that they brush aside this clear command that the speaker "shall exercise the office" in a given contingency, and it only means—I quote the language of the Senator again—"that the speaker shall be eligible to the office of governor." If he does not waive it and voluntarily takes the oath of office he becomes governor.

Mr. President, does not the statement itself of that position refute it? How can you make it any plainer that they are talking about a thing outside of the constitution of Delaware, and that we are arguing upon what we find within its four corners? That is all there is about it. They are, as the Senator from Mississippi said, striking out and inserting. We are taking the text as it came from the representatives of the sovereign people and giving effect to the plain language that they have used. The governor must "be at least 30 years of age," but the senator who exercises the office may be less than 30 years old. The governor must be "a citizen and inhabitant of the United States twelve years next before the first meeting of the legislature after his election," but a senator exercising the office need only be "a citizen and inhabitant of the State three years." Is there no difference between the two?

Mr. CALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware a question.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. I ask him if the speaker should resign his office as senator and speaker what would become of the governor? Would he be governor under that language of the constitution?

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Massachusetts argued that case at considerable length and made a most interesting exposition of his view of a similar situation in regard to the President pro tempore of the Senate exercising the office of President, or acting as President, whatever the language may be. He said that every time the President pro tempore resigned or was removed and another put in there would be a new man to act as President.

But there was one point that I had overlooked. I was speaking of the distinction, made by the constitution and carried through all its provisions, between a governor elected by the people and the speaker, who temporarily exercises the office. I would not dwell upon it except that it seems to be the burden of the argument upon the other side. Certainly it was the sole burden of the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire. Of course he considers it important that the speaker, when he exercised the office, actually became governor and there was no distinction between him and the governor elected by the people.

In section 14 they commence by saying that—

> The speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until the governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

They also say in section 5 of Article II that—

> Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers; and also each house, whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor, may choose a speaker pro tempore.

Why did not the framers of the constitution say, if what the Senator from Oregon says be true, that each house whose speaker shall become governor shall choose a speaker. But they seem to have understood what they were about, and knew how to use proper language when they wished to make a discriminative use of it. Why did they say, "Each house whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor may choose a speaker pro tempore"?

Mr. MILLS. A speaker pro tempore is chosen temporarily.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly. They go further on and say:

> If the trial of a contested election shall continue longer than until the third Tuesday of January next ensuing the election of a governor, the governor of the last year—

That is, the governor elected by the people; it can not be anybody else—> or the speaker of the senate or of the house of representatives who may then be in the exercise of the executive authority shall continue therein until a determination of such contested election.

Mr. President, what is to be said about a contention that there is no distinction in the constitution of Delaware between the office of governor and the exercise by the speaker of the senate of that office?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUTLER in the chair). The Senator from Delaware will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. MILLS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside, in order that the Senator from Delaware may proceed with his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. VILAS. The unfinished business is laid aside simply that the Senator from Delaware may finish his remarks?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is laid aside temporarily.

Mr. GRAY. Now, let me read again. What are you going to do with this language? Will they say that it does not mean anything? Of course it is possible to say so, but the language will remain whatever you say about it. The constitution will remain as the people of Delaware made it. Whether the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from New Hampshire says that it means nothing, it will remain there to be construed by lawyers and by sensible people as long as the people of Delaware choose to have it remain. Let me read it again:

> If the trial of a contested election shall continue longer than until the third Tuesday of January next ensuing the election of a governor, the governor of the last year, or the speaker of the senate or of the house of representatives, who may then be in the exercise of the executive authority, shall continue therein until a determination of such contested election.

Certainly the framers of the constitution of Delaware, according to the contention of the learned and distinguished Senators on the other side of this question, took a great deal of pains for nothing. They certainly made a futile dalliance with the English language when they, all through the provisions in that respect, so carefully distinguished between the person whom they set up in a democratic government as the one depository of the executive power, the man elected by the people, and distinguished him all through from the temporary exercise of that power, the mere stop-gap to prevent the machinery of the government falling into desuetude, to the inconvenience and detriment of the people.

But that is not all. The second clause of section 14 of Article II of the constitution reads as follows:

> If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office, etc.

Here is a clear reference to the speaker of the senate exercising the office of governor as still being the speaker of the senate. It refers to a vacancy happening by his death, etc.—that is, the speaker's death. The pronoun "his" stands for no other noun than the speaker of the senate just referred to.

So we find the constitution is consistent throughout with the intent so clearly expressed at first. Different language could have easily been employed if a different intent had existed.

The temporary and provisional character of the arrangement made by the constitution in case of the death of the governor is apparent from even the most cursory consideration of the sections relating to this subject-matter, and which I have read in the hearing of the Senate. But the Senator from Oregon, and the counsel for Mr. Du Pont, say that section 12 of Article II of the Delaware constitution expressly prohibits Mr. Watson from acting as senator. That section is as follows:

> No person concerned in any army or navy contracts, nor member of Congress, nor any person holding any office under this State or the United States, except the attorney-general, officers usually appointed by the courts of justice, respectively, attorneys at law, and officers in the militia, holding no disqualifying office, shall, during his continuance in Congress or in office, be a senator or representative.

That is section 12 of Article II.

It is obvious, however, that this section is prescribing disqualifications for senators and representatives generally whether as concerns their eligibility or their status after election, and can have no application to a subsequent and particular provision of the constitution expressly commanding that in a certain contingency the executive duties shall devolve upon the speaker of the senate. That was section 12 of Article II, and section 14 of Article III. A subsequent provision says:

> Upon any vacancy happening, etc., the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

Common sense as well as the common law of statutory construction have approved the rule universally recognized, which I will read. That rule is as follows:

> Where there are words expressive of a general intention and then of a particular intention incompatible with it, the particular must be taken as an exception to the general, and so all the parts of the act will stand; and, as a broad proposition, general words in one cause may be restrained by the particular words in a subsequent clause of the same statute.

Mr. President, that is only the enunciation by an authoritative law writer of one of those rules of the human intellect which must govern the interpretation of all written instruments, constitutions, statutes, or whatever they may be, that where a general proposition is made and a particular one inconsistent with it is made, the particular proposition is an exception to the general one. That is all there is about it. It is applied every day. You can not construe a contract or a law, and, as my friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] said the other day, you could not construe the Bible or the Ten Commandments unless you applied this law of construction, which, as I said awhile ago, is a law of the human reason. It is a law governing the processes of the human intellect. You can not proceed one step in any intellectual process of interpretation of a written instrument without applying it. So you must read that provision of the constitution which says he shall exercise the office as senator as an exception out of the general prohibition, if that prohibition applies at all in the language which preceded it. It would read this way:

No person concerned in any army or navy contracts, and no person holding any office under this State, shall be a senator or representative, but upon a vacancy happening in the office of governor by death, etc., the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office of governor.

That is all there is about it. You can not read it any other way. You can not get away from that mode of construction. Otherwise the constitution would come to a halt. There would be a deadlock in the intellectual process of interpretation which could not be got over. The Senators on the other side, as well as the counsel for the claimant, recognize that difficulty, and they proceed not to deny it, for they can not deny it, but proceed to work around it.

Section 12 of Article II was intended to apply to a class of disqualifying offices very different from the functions imposed upon the speaker of the senate by section 14 of Article III. But if this were not so the particular provision of section 14 of Article III would have to be read as an exception out of the preceding general provision of section 12 of Article II. So also of section 5 of Article III, which is as follows:

No member of Congress, nor person holding any office under the United States, or this State, shall exercise the office of governor.

The subsequent particular provision of section 14 must be read with it as an exception to the generality of this language, even if a State senator may be said to hold an office under the State in the meaning of that provision of the constitution.

As I said, the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Michigan are lawyers of too great experience and too much learning and ability to deny this plain proposition. But how do they seek to evade it? The Senator from Oregon gets around it in this way. He says:

Twice over, therefore, does the fundamental law of Delaware declare in the most express and positive terms that the dual function of senator and executive shall not be exercised simultaneously by the same person.

I only pause to say that the fundamental law of Delaware does not, with all due respect to the Senator from Oregon, do anything of the kind. It says nothing about the exercise simultaneously of the two offices, but it says that persons holding certain offices or concerned in certain contracts shall not be senators or representatives.

That constitution—and I come now to the point of the Senator from Delaware—says to each and every citizen of Delaware, in substance and legal effect—

You see the Senator from Oregon can not trust himself to embark upon the yeasty waves of this debate upon a craft made out of the plain language of the constitution. He has to create a constitution for himself. He states that the constitution of Delaware says—to each and every citizen of Delaware, in substance and legal effect, in the most emphatic and unequivocal manner: "You can not exercise the office of governor while you continue to exercise the office of senator; neither can you exercise the office of senator while you continue to exercise the office of governor."

It declares in legal effect to the person who is speaker of the Senate—

Now, in quotation, this is his reading of that plain provision of the constitution which says that when the governor dies the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until the governor shall be elected. The Senator from Oregon proceeds:

You, in a certain contingency—that is, in case of the death, removal, resignation, or inability of the governor elected by the people—have a preference right over every other citizen of the State to become governor and exercise that office, a right, however, you can avail yourself of or not at your own option. There is nothing compulsory connected with it.

The Senator from Oregon puts that in quotations as his interpretation of that plain command in the constitution to the speaker of the senate—that in a given contingency you shall exercise the office of governor, "you have a preference right." He changes the duty imposed by the constitution into a right personal to the speaker and to the senator. He makes this devolution of these high duties a privilege belonging to the speakership of the senate, instead of the imposition of a great and important duty in the event described in the constitution. A "preference right"; the invention of another phrase; and I may say that the mind of the Senator from Oregon has been very fertile in the invention of phrases which seem necessary to support his argument all through the discussion of this question. He says there is nothing compulsory connected with it. What does the English language mean when it says in the case of a vacancy in the office of governor, etc., "the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office"? What does the English language mean, if that is not compulsory? Where is his right to waive it any more than he can waive any other duty which attaches to him as senator and speaker? It is the addition of duties which belong to him in his place as speaker of the senate in a given contingency.

"You can waive it if you please," says the constitution in legal effect—

I am quoting now from the Senator from Oregon—

"and continue to be senator and speaker of the senate, notwithstanding your eligibility to become governor, notwithstanding you hold the preference right over every other citizen of the State of Delaware to become governor; but if you avail yourself of this preference right given you by the constitution, and take the gubernatorial oath, and enter voluntarily, as you must if you enter at all, upon the exercise of the office of governor, then, that moment, you cease to be senator, your right to exercise the functions of either senator or speaker of the senate is at once gone, or at least held in abeyance and suspended so long as you continue to exercise the office of governor."

Mr. President, that long-winded paraphrase is what the Senator from Oregon thinks necessary to substitute for the plain command of the constitution of Delaware, the plain English, that in a given contingency the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office of governor.

Mr. MILLS. Suppose he refuse to do it, then what?

Mr. GRAY. I do not know what, Mr. President. In all human institutions you come at the last analysis to some point where the vital force of the machine of government depends upon human will and upon the recognition of human character. Suppose a State should refuse to send Senators to represent it in this Chamber; suppose the President of the United States after his election should refuse to act. So we come down in all free governments to the postulate at last that we have to depend—and that dependence has never, thank God, been mistaken or betrayed—we have to depend on the patriotic impulse of men of our race and blood to do the duty that is before them.

Mr. MILLS. The Senator misunderstood my question. I meant to say that the framers of the constitution of Delaware did not leave that question to be determined by the volition of the speaker.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly not. I did misapprehend the Senator.

Mr. MILLS. They made a command upon him.

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. They imposed a duty on him.

Mr. GRAY. They imposed a duty on him to prevent the existence of an interregnum, and certainly where the Senator from Oregon says, "You can avail yourself of this right or not at your own option," the constitution of the State uses the imperative language of command, "You shall exercise that office."

In criticising this paraphrase of the constitution made by the Senator from Oregon I do it with entire respect, because it was absolutely necessary that he should paraphrase it in order to make one premise of his argument which would lead to the conclusion that Mr. Du Pont was elected. Unless he reads it in that fashion and does that violence to the text and plain spirit of the constitution he can not arrive at the goal that he set out to reach.

Mr. President, another thing: The Senator from Oregon puts this long paragraph in quotation marks, thereby showing that that is his interpretation of this provision of the constitution. He has forty lines where the constitution has three to express that meaning. Let me read again what the Senator says that the constitution of Delaware says to the speaker:

If you avail yourself of this preference right given you by the constitution and take the gubernatorial oath and enter voluntarily, as you must if you enter at all, upon the exercise of the office of governor, then that moment you cease to be senator.

All through the argument the Senator from Oregon, the Senator from Michigan, and the Senator from North Carolina have laid great stress upon the taking of the gubernatorial oath. As soon as you take the gubernatorial oath, says the Senator from Oregon, then you vacate your office as senator. There is no provision in the constitution that the speaker of the senate shall take any oath on entering on the exercise of the office of governor. It is true he took one, and it has been the custom on such occasions to take the oath, but there is no prescription of an oath for the speaker of the senate when he assumes the exercise of the office of governor; there is no line of demarcation between his office of speaker and his exercise of the office of governor created by the imposition or prescription of an oath. The taking of the oath was voluntary. It has become a custom, I grant you, but it has no effect upon this argument, it has nothing more to do with the status of the man who exercises the office of governor than if he had chosen to submit himself to baptism by immersion before he undertook to exercise the office of governor. It may have added to the dignity of the occasion and given solemnity to the act he was about to perform, the first act in the exercise of the office of governor, but there is nothing in it to affect the legal argument, though it has been dwelt upon over and over again.

When Mr. Tyler assumed to act as President of the United States upon the death of President Harrison he protested against taking a new oath. He had been sworn in as Vice-President and taken the oath prescribed by the Constitution, he said, and rightly said; that no other oath was necessary; that the duty devolved upon him at the moment the death of the President was fixed, and it needed no new oath, and none was prescribed by the Constitution. He took the oath merely, he said, under protest, to quiet the cavil of those who might think differently. I do not know, sir, that it is important enough to occupy the time I have given it, but strangely enough, it seems that this gubernatorial oath, so called, has become a veritable rock of offense or defense, I do not know which, in the arguments of all the Senators upon the other side.

Right there the Senator from Oregon, in getting around the fact that these clauses of the constitution do not apply to the devolution of the office of governor upon the speaker of the senate, referred to a Minnesota case which he says is a case directly in point. That was a case, Mr. President—and as it has been given such an important place in the printed arguments I shall refer to it—where a provision of the Minnesota constitution, section 9 of Article IV, read as follows:

No senator or representative shall, during the time for which he is elected, hold any office under the authority of the United States or the State of Minnesota, except that of postmaster; and no senator or representative shall hold an office under the State which had been created or the emoluments of which had been increased during the session of the legislature of which he was a member until one year after the expiration of his term of office in the legislature.

In that case John B. Sutton was elected to the office of representative of the Twenty-third legislative district of the State of Minnesota for the term commencing on the first Monday of January, 1895, and ending on the first Monday of January, 1897.

On the 4th day of May, 1895, Sutton was appointed by the governor of the State to the public office of inspector of boilers for the Fourth Congressional district of that State, which office is one of great public importance and responsibility, having been created by an act of the legislature prior to Sutton's election as a member thereof.

The supreme court of that State held that under this constitutional provision Sutton could not hold the office of inspector of boilers, to which he had been appointed by the governor, until the expiration of the full period of time for which he was elected.

The court in its opinion said:

In the case at bar it is not necessary for us to speculate upon the intention of the framers of the constitution in adopting the provision in question. A bare reading of this provision suffices to enable us to ascertain and understand its meaning, and we need not search for light through the uncertainties of extraneous interpretation or construction. It is a part of the organic law of the State that no senator or representative shall, during the time for which he is elected, hold any office under the authority of the State of Minnesota. Is there any uncertainty or ambiguity about this language? Has it any of the characteristics which demand a construction to be placed upon it by the judiciary of this State other than that which is transparent from the language itself?

That is just what I say about the language of the constitution of Delaware. The court said:

The respondent could not nullify the constitutional prohibitory clause during the time for which he is elected by his resignation of the office of representative.

So they declared in that case that he could not hold the office of inspector.

Mr. GEORGE. That he could not take it.

Mr. GRAY. That he could not take it; not that his office as member of the house of representatives was vacated, but that the disqualifying office of inspector of boilers could not be taken and held by him. If that reasoning should be applied to this case at all, it would mean that this man could not exercise the office of governor, although the constitution says he shall.

The Senator from Oregon says that is a case directly in point. There was no provision of the constitution of Minnesota saying that a senator shall exercise the office of inspector, mark you. Then it might have been a case a little more apposite, a little more applicable to this controversy. We are dealing with a case where it is true the constitution says that no one holding an office under this State shall be a senator or representative, although the constitution afterwards says a senator in a certain case shall exercise the office of governor. This Minnesota case was one where the constitution provided that no person who is a senator or representative shall hold an office under the State; but the constitution does not say that thereafter, in a certain contingency, a senator or representative shall act as boiler inspector. So the case has no more application to the one in hand than the rule in Shelley's case or any other inapplicable and irrelevant judgment of a court.

Is it worth while, sir, in this presence to say that this word "eligibility" does not occur in the constitution of Delaware? It says that a governor elected by the people shall not be eligible to a second election. We know what the word "eligibility" means. It means capable of being chosen, that is all; and the Senator from Oregon, in the stress of his argument, is compelled to say that what this clause of the fourteenth section means, when it says that the speaker shall exercise the office of governor in a given contingency, is that he shall be eligible, shall have a preference right to be governor if he does not choose to waive it—if he chooses to take the gubernatorial office.

I do not think any further commentary is necessary upon that position taken by the Senator. Clearly neither of those sections, then, concern us in this discussion; neither section 12 of Article III nor section 5 of Article II—those prohibitory clauses. The question remains, was there a vacancy in the representation of Kent County in the senate of Delaware by reason of the death of Governor Marvil? The constitution does not declare one, but its language expressly negatives the existence of a vacancy. Let us see whether it does not so negative it. Section 5 of Article II says that—

Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers; and also each house whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor may choose a speaker pro tempore.

Does not that negative the suggestion of a vacancy in the office of speaker of the senate and, of course, of senator? Though I have already read it, I shall read again section 14 of Article III, which says:

If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Michigan argued at great length that that provision of the constitution made for their interpretation, because they said that "further vacancy" meant the further vacancy in the office of governor. Now listen to the plain words of the provision:

If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office—

How? By the death of the governor? No—by his death, removal, resignation, or inability.

To whom does the pronoun "his" refer? Manifestly to the speaker of the senate. It can not refer to anybody else. Mind you, we have got the speaker of the senate inducted into the exercise of the office of governor. We have passed that point. It provides something else after he commences to exercise the office of governor. It says:

If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office by his death—

That is, the death of the speaker of the senate. So if we do, as we are always at liberty to do, strike out the pronoun and substitute the noun for which it stands, it would read:

If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office by the death of the speaker of the senate, etc.

So here we have in the very next clause of the section language used which, as I said, expressly negatives the existence of a vacancy in the office of either senator or speaker. Again, next to the last clause of section 14 provides—I have already read it, but I shall read it again—

If the trial of a contested election shall continue longer than until the third Tuesday of January next ensuing the election of a governor, the governor of the last year, or the speaker of the senate, or of the house of representatives, who may then be in the exercise of the executive authority, shall continue therein until a determination of such contested election.

What does that language imply? Are we to disregard it altogether? Are we at liberty, in construing a constitution, to determine the end we wish to reach, and then leave out, interpolate, or alter the language in order to suit the exigency of our travel toward that end? We must regard it all; and here we have these three express provisions, which are absolutely inconsistent with the idea that there has been created any vacancy in the office of speaker of the senate or of senator by the exercise of the office of governor. Yet in the face of the fact that the constitution has not declared or provided for a vacancy, and of this express recognition in the section itself, of the fact that no vacancy exists, and that the speaker still continues to be speaker so far as this section affects him, the majority of the committee argue themselves into the belief that this provision of the constitution works a vacancy in the senate of Delaware.

Mr. President, need I say more on the question as to whether any vacancy was created or intended to be created by the framers of the constitution of Delaware upon the exercise of the office of governor by the speaker of the senate as they have provided for? Imagine the framers of a constitution confronted with the proposition that they had made such a vacancy and had in a certain event disfranchised the people of a county. What would they do? No case can be found anywhere in any constitution of any State where a doubt has been left as to a vacancy existing in representation. The constitution of Delaware has provided in three several places for filling vacancies in the representation in the senate and in the house when they occur. So anxious were they that they have covered every possible period of time in which such a vacancy could occur in order to fill it. If the senate or the house were in session the speaker of the houses respectively must issue immediately writs of election to fill the vacancy; and if the vacancy occurs in vacation, the governor of the State is required to issue the writ in order that there may be no vacancy in the representation of any county in either house of the State legislature. It shows the anxiety they had about this important subject. The legislature was a small one; a single vacancy was a large aliquot part of the whole legislature, and they studiously provided for filling vacancies; and yet we are told that here in this important contingency they are confronted with a vacancy and yet they have taken no means to fill it. The opposition abandoned that; they argued it and they abandoned it. They say, in effect, that there was no vacancy; that the interpretation put upon both constitutions for a hundred years compelled the abandonment of the proposition that there was a vacancy. So they invent another phrase, and that is, "suspension from office." I was going to allude to what had been the interpretation of the constitution as to a vacancy having been created, but it has already been gone over by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] so thoroughly as to compel the abandonment of this position by counsel for Mr. Du Pont and by Senators on the other side.

In the one hundred years under these two constitutions, both constitutions having a similar provision in this regard, there have been five cases where the speaker of the senate has been called upon to exercise the office of governor and has afterwards sat in the senate and performed his duties as senator under his original election.

Mr. GEORGE. And without question from anybody.

Mr. GRAY. Without question from anybody—from any lawyer or any judge or any citizen—so far as I know and so far as any records show.

Not only that, but three of those cases occurred under the constitution of 1792, where a senator exercised without question the office of senator after he had exercised the office of governor under this provision. When they came to make the constitution of 1831 they kept that provision in it in totidem verbis, thereby affirming that construction which had been put upon it by forty years of actual usage and practice. Do you suppose, Mr. President, that if the occupancy of these senators, who had been exercising the office of governor, of their seats in the senate had been questioned anywhere in the State under the constitution of 1792, that when we came to the convention of 1831 they would have retained that provision without a single alteration, without a single protest, without a single objection or criticism upon that provision?

Mr. GEORGE. They would have changed the language, as they did in Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY. They would have changed the language, as they did in Pennsylvania. So I say we have the sanction of the people of Delaware in the most solemn form. I mean a sanction expressly given in their convention, where they were making and altering their organic law as a sovereign people meeting in their primary capacity as citizens. We have the sanction of that body, that constitutional convention, of this interpretation of the constitution.

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion to him, the familiar rule of law is that when certain words have once received a construction, if they are subsequently adopted in legislation, that construction thereafter goes with the words. That rule prevails even when the statute of one State is adopted by another.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it will not inconvenience the Senator, I ask him whether I have understood him to argue that the speaker of the senate did not cease to be speaker of the senate when he became governor?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator's argument is that he does not?

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is now showing the cases in which the speakers of the senate who have become governors have come back to their senatorial office?

Mr. GRAY. Yes, occupied their seats in the senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Why, if a speaker can do that, and that is a fair and legitimate act under the constitution, does he not also come back to the office of president of the senate?

Mr. HARRIS. Before the Senator from Delaware proceeds, I should like to add to the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire this question: If the framers of the constitution of Delaware contemplated a vacancy in the office of the speaker of the senate by reason of the fact that the speaker of the senate was exercising the office of governor of Delaware, is it probable that they would have provided in that event for the election not of a speaker of the senate, where the vacancy is contemplated, but for a speaker pro tempore, a speaker for the time being? I should be glad if the Senator from Delaware would answer that in connection with the question of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question, with the permission of the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. GRAY. Very well.

Mr. CHANDLER. I infer from what the Senator from Tennessee has said that he conceives that when the Delaware constitution provided that a speaker pro tempore should be elected when the speaker of the senate should exercise the office of governor, that that implied that the speaker of the senate after he had become governor could come back to be again speaker of the senate?

Mr. HARRIS. Unmistakably.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, I ask the Senator from Delaware to state why, in the five cases to which he is now alluding, the senators, having come back to the senate, have in no one instance resumed the office of president of the senate?

Mr. GRAY. That is very easily answered, because I have examined those cases and I believe in all of them the office of speaker had expired.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have an affidavit here that states the fact how that office was filled——

Mr. GRAY. Of speaker?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes; speaker of the senate.

Mr. GRAY. By a new election, I suppose.

Mr. HARRIS. The speaker of the senate is elected for the entire term of the legislature, is he not?

Mr. GRAY. For a legislature.

Mr. HARRIS. And with the expiration of that legislature he may continue to be senator, but he ceases to be speaker. Is not that the fact?

Mr. GRAY. That is the fact.

Mr. HARRIS. That is what I supposed.

Mr. GRAY. I want to say that of course the Senator from Tennessee is quite right; that when the constitution says that when the speaker of the senate exercises the office of governor the senate may elect a speaker pro tempore, it means that the office of speaker and of senator is not vacated; otherwise it would have said "shall elect a speaker," and not a speaker pro tempore.

But I want again to give notice that in this argument, such as it is, which I am endeavoring to make, I do not hold myself out to answer all the questions and curious conundrums that may be propounded.

I do not mean any disrespect to those who put such questions. There are a great many inconveniences, as was so ably argued by the Senator from Mississippi, which must always occur when you come to fill an office temporarily. We put up with them. We would rather have the inconveniences than to have the absolute desuetude of the functions for the exercise of which we temporarily provide. It is inconvenient to have the speaker leave his place and go into the executive office to sign bills or perform some other executive act. It is inconvenient, as it would be for the President pro tempore of this Senate, when acting as President of the United States, to be away from the Senate on certain occasions in the performance of executive functions, but not a hundredth part as inconvenient as to have those offices unfilled, unperformed, even for the short interval between the vacancy and the election of another governor by the people. That is all there is to be said about that matter.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to say that by an express provision in the constitution of the State of Rhode Island the governor of the State is the regular presiding officer of the senate and is entitled to vote?

Mr. GRAY. I will come to that point presently on another branch of the case.

In order to emphasize this action of the people of Delaware and their legislature during a hundred years, a uniform practice which has compelled the Senator from Oregon by his own admission to abandon the theory of a vacancy being created in the office of speaker and senator, and in order to emphasize the value of these precedents, let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in several of the instances while the speaker of the senate was exercising the office of the governor vacancies occurred in the membership of the senate, by death or resignation or in some other way, and in every instance a writ of election was at once issued for the election of a new member, and at the same time the speaker of the senate exercising the office of governor was always considered as a member, or otherwise you can not resist the conclusion that a writ of election would have issued to fill the vacancy occasioned by his exercise of that office.

What does that mean? It means, of course, but one thing, that those legislatures, at these intervals of time, one after the other, different bodies of men, never conceived the possibility that there was any vacancy created in the office of speaker and senator by the exercise of the office of governor by the speaker, or they would have issued a writ of election in order to fill such vacancy.

The Senators on the other side see the force of that argument, and therefore they abandon substantially that proposition. But I will not abandon it until I have shown another matter which emphasizes it. I call attention to one of the cases to which I have alluded. John Bird was elected to be a senator to a session of the legislature commencing in January, 1801, and his right to sit was questioned under that provision of the State constitution forbidding any person concerned in any army or navy contract to be a senator or representative. Here is an extract from the journal of the senate of January 13, 1801:

It was moved by Mr. Vining, seconded by Mr. Grantham, to adopt the following resolution, to wit:

"Whereas it hath been represented to the senate of the State of Delaware, that the election of John Bird, of the county of Newcastle, as a senator, in the room of Archibald Alexander, esq., resigned, is unconstitutional upon the ground that the said John Bird hath and still is concerned in certain navy contracts: Therefore

"Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the senate to examine the premises and report thereon."

The question being put for the adoption of the foregoing resolution, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The committee appointed in pursuance of the foregoing resolution are Mr. Fitzgerald, Mr. Vining, and Mr. Owens.

On the following morning, Wednesday, January 14, immediately upon the assembling of the senate, the following minute was entered:

The committee to whom was referred the resolution relative to the constitutionality of the election of John Bird, returned as a senator in the place of Archibald Alexander, who has resigned, beg leave to report that sufficient evidence has appeared to the committee that the said John Bird was at the time of his election concerned in certain naval contracts under the United States, which, by the constitution, vacates his seat in the senate.

Resolved, therefore, That the speaker of the senate issue a writ, directed to the sheriff of Newcastle County, to hold an election and notify the electors of said county that the said election will be held on Wednesday, the 21st instant, for the purpose of supplying the said vacancy.

That report was adopted. The brief says:

At the election held on the above date, "Robert Maxwell was duly elected a senator for the said county, in the place of the said John Bird, declared ineligible."

This shows not only that the senate had to act and declare a vacancy—the fact that he held a navy contract not working a vacancy—but I think that was one of the cases in which there was a speaker of the senate exercising the office of governor, and they did not order any election for him.

I wish to finish up this matter because our friends on the other side attempt to ride two horses. Although they abandon the doctrine of vacancy occasioned by the exercise of the office of governor by the speaker of the senate, they say either one of two things is true; either there is a vacancy or there is a suspension from office. It is always a dangerous thing to attempt to ride two horses, for the rider may fall between them, and I think the Senator from Oregon is liable to do that in this case.

Now, one thing at a time. Although they abandon practically the theory of vacancy, I want to make it so that they can not come back to it when the other alternative fails them. It is said by the Senator from New Hampshire, it is said by the Senator from Michigan, as well as by the Senator from Oregon, that there is an incompatibility between those offices which creates a vacancy in the legislative office, and that there is no instance anywhere to be found, except in Delaware, in which State they say there is an anomalous condition of affairs, where it is asserted otherwise. There never has been an instance in the history of any State in the Union where similar provisions of the constitution obtain and where similar emergencies have occurred and where there has been no prohibitory clause in which there has been a vacancy declared.

In the State of North Carolina, back in 1854, under a constitution which provided that—

Where there is a vacancy in the office of governor the speaker of the senate shall exercise the powers of governor.

Mr. GEORGE. It is the same thing.

Mr. GRAY. Here it is "exercise the office of governor." In 1854 there was a vacancy in the office of governor in the old North State, occasioned by the election, I think, of the governor to the Senate of the United States. Mr. President [Mr. BUTLER in the chair], you are more familiar with that case than I am, but I am going to state it to the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Delaware give the date of that case?

Mr. GRAY. It was in December, 1854.

When the vacancy occurred in the office of governor the speaker of the senate or the president of the senate—I do not know which he is called—undertook to exercise the powers of governor. There was a resolution introduced into the senate, in substance if not in words, to the effect that the speaker of the senate by assuming to exercise the powers of governor had thereby vacated his seat as senator and his office as speaker; and that question was debated.

I have here the speech in extenso of the Hon. Warren Winslow, who was the speaker of the senate or the president of the senate—I do not know which he is called—who exercised the powers of governor, in defense of his right to continue senator and speaker. It is a speech which I would be very glad if I could have made in this case, because it is the most concise, compact, and thorough argument of this very question that I have seen. I have rarely seen so much of law and eloquence within the same compass. Mr. Winslow said that he defended it not as a right personal to himself, but he defended his proposition on the ground that he was bound to stand up for the right of his constituents to be represented on the floor of the senate, and he did it in this powerful argument which I hold in my hand. At the end of the debate the senate decided that under the constitution of North Carolina he continued speaker and he continued senator, notwithstanding that he exercised the powers of governor.

Mr. President, the little State of Delaware is not such an anomalous State as the Senator from New Hampshire would have the Senate think. She is a small State, but as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] eloquently said, she is a charter member of the great lodge of liberty. She is one of the original thirteen States, and her history is one we are not ashamed of.

Mr. GEORGE. She was the first one to ratify the Constitution.

Mr. GRAY. And we are willing to compare her history with that of any other State in the Union.

Mr. CHANDLER. I agree to that.

Mr. GRAY. Right in the great State of Pennsylvania, to the north of the State of Delaware, under a constitution which had almost exactly similar provisions in the respect as to which I am now speaking, there occurred a precedent which has been read to the Senate, in which exactly the same common-sense, plain view was taken that I contend only can be taken of these clauses in the constitution of Delaware.

Let me read it to the Senate. I read from the brief of the able counsel who argued the case on behalf of the governor of Delaware:

The constitution of Delaware of 1792 was based on the constitution adopted by Pennsylvania in 1790; and as Delaware, in her constitution of 1831, substantially transferred from her constitution of 1792 the provisions involved in the present case, so did Pennsylvania, in her constitution of 1838, substantially preserve the similar provisions in her constitution of 1790.

The constitution of Pennsylvania of 1838 provides, Article II, section 5—

The same number—that "no member of Congress or person holding office under the United States or this State shall exercise the office of governor."

Exactly the same language as the constitution of Delaware.

And by section 14—

The same number again—

And, by section 14 of the same article, that "in case of the death or resignation of the governor, or his removal from office, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office of governor till another governor shall be duly qualified."

Mr. GEORGE. It is the same thing.

Mr. GRAY. There is no difference in the constitutional provisions with which we are confronted.

On July 9, 1848, the general assembly of Pennsylvania not being in session, Governor Shunk resigned, and William F. Johnston, who was chosen as speaker of the senate at the last preceding session, took an oath faithfully to discharge the executive duties, and entered upon the exercise of the office of governor. The general assembly met on January 2, 1849.

July 9, 1848, he entered on the exercise of the office.

In the meantime an election for governor had been held, and Mr. Johnston had become governor-elect—

That is, the speaker who was exercising the office of governor was elected and became the governor-elect—

but his term as governor did not begin till January 17, 1849. When the general assembly met George Darsie was chosen by the senate as speaker pro tempore, and Mr. Johnston's name appears in the journal as that of a senator, whose term was to continue till 1850.

But, still more unequivocal—

The brief says—

are the following extracts from the senate journal of January 13, 1849, showing what Mr. Johnston, who was then exercising the office of governor, did in anticipation of his inauguration as elective governor on the 17th of the month:

To the Honorable the Senate of Pennsylvania:

SENATORS: I hereby tender my resignation as speaker of the senate of Pennsylvania. * * *

I remain, respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. F. JOHNSTON.

JANUARY 13, 1849.

Then another:

To the Hon. George Darsie, Speaker of the Senate:

SIR—

They had elected a speaker of the senate after he had resigned as speaker—

To the Hon. George Darsie, Speaker of the Senate:

SIR: Permit me, through your kindness, to present to the senate my resignation as a member of that body.

I am truly, yours,

WM. F. JOHNSTON.

JANUARY 13, 1849.

These communications having been disposed of, Mr. Darsie resigned the office of speaker pro tempore, and was elected speaker.

Delaware is not so lonely after all. This is not the only State, then, in which the speaker of the senate who exercised the office of governor has claimed the right to be a senator and to represent the constituency that elected him and sent him to the senate to represent them. It is not the only case, then, where it has been conceived by a great Commonwealth that all these things were possible and proper under the organic law of the State, and that no violence was done to American institutions or to American doctrine of any kind by the recognition of the right of a constituency to be represented by a certain person, even though executive duties were imposed upon him by the constitution.

North Carolina and Pennsylvania make a list, small though it may be, of compurgators with whom we are willing to stand.

The majority of the committee and the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from North Carolina apparently have been overwhelmed by the argument of undeviating construction of the State of Delaware for a hundred years in support of the doctrine that no vacancy is created by the exercise of the office of governor by the speaker. They therefore invent another phrase—suspension of function. They are traveling outside of the constitution again, as they have been doing all the time. There is no such phrase as suspension of function in the constitution of Delaware. They are compelled to invent it; they are compelled to interpolate both the thing and the phrase. Where is the constitutional warrant for suspension of function as distinguished from the creation of a vacancy? Where within the four corners of this constitution or any other has there ever been adjudicated a suspension of function where there has been no express constitutional provision providing for it? Not one. No case can be found, and yet the Senator from Oregon glibly says, both in his report and his speech:

> The history of this country is full of instances where the right to exercise an office on the part of a person who holds an office for a certain time is suspended. I can point to numerous instances of that kind.

And from the time he uttered those words until now he has not pointed to a single instance. There are a few instances where the constitution itself has provided for suspension in so many words, but notwithstanding that bold assertion, I venture to say he can not point to a single instance where a suspension of function has been created or adjudged to be created by a constitution unless done expressly by constitutional provision.

Mr. GEORGE. It is never done by implication.

Mr. GRAY. It is never done by implication anywhere.

Here is another violence done to the text and spirit of the constitution of Delaware in order to seat Mr. Du Pont. That violence is not justified even to seat so good a man as I believe him to be. Violence of that kind to the text and spirit of a constitution is a wrong done to the sovereign people of a State, and we ought to hesitate long before we gain our own consent to perpetrate it. It is true we have the power to ignore the law; we have the power to ignore the plain provisions and the plain meaning of the constitution of Delaware, but we will have stepped down from the high place that this body occupies in the dual scheme of American Government when, in order to accomplish an end, we have consented to ignore the plain provisions of the constitution of a State or to whittle them away by refined, attenuated, and artificial reasoning.

If more was wanted on the matter of suspension of office, we might turn to the constitution of Maine, where there is a similar provision. If I had it here where I could turn to it I would read it. The constitution of Maine provides in one place that the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office of governor. I have forgotten the phrase. Is that it?

Mr. GEORGE. That is right.

Mr. GRAY. But it also provides that when he thus exercises the office of governor his duties as speaker shall be suspended; and the other side bring in here a little three-line opinion of the chief justice of Maine in answer to a question, purporting to be acquiesced in by the two associate justices, with no reasoning to support the opinion, that when the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office of governor he is no longer speaker and can not vote as senator. Upon that the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Michigan rely with great confidence.

Mr. ALLEN. May I ask the Senator from Delaware a question at this point?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Does not that very provision of the constitution of Maine establish the doctrine that but for the express prohibition the right would remain with the speaker to exercise the functions of his first office?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly it does. You can draw no other conclusion from it. The framers of the constitution of Maine understood as well as the framers of the constitution of Delaware that if they were silent, after commanding the speaker of the senate to exercise the office of governor, he would remain senator and speaker, and so they said that when he shall exercise that office his duties as speaker shall be suspended.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Delaware a question here, as he has investigated this particular matter with respect to the constitution of Maine and I have not?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Do they issue a writ to fill the vacancy temporarily?

Mr. GRAY. Where, in Maine?

Mr. HOAR. In Maine, when the speaker exercises the office of governor.

Mr. GRAY. I do not know. I can not answer the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose they do not, but I thought the Senator probably would have been able to say they did not.

Mr. GRAY. I can not answer the question. I think they do. The constitution provides that the senate or house shall fill the vacancy.

Mr. HOAR. If they do not, then the constitution of Maine—and I am not speaking now of the meaning of language one way or another, but of the probability of establishing a certain system—is exactly and expressly what the majority of the committee suppose the constitution of Delaware to be; that is, they have provided in Maine that the speaker of the upper branch of the legislature shall exercise the office of governor. They have thought that it was not fit that he should exercise both offices, and therefore they have provided for a temporary vacancy or suspension of the office of senator, to which he comes back when he ceases to exercise the office of governor.

Mr. GRAY. I do not know whether he does or not, I say to the Senator from Massachusetts; but the provisions of the constitution of Delaware and Maine are not identical, because there is the important differences in the constitution of Maine that the framers of that instrument have seen fit to say that when the speaker shall exercise the office of governor his duties as speaker shall be suspended.

Mr. GEORGE. Expressly.

Mr. GRAY. Expressly. Now, what I was arguing was that there was no case anywhere that I could find, none that I have been referred to where a suspension of office or function has been adjudged to be worked where there was not an express constitutional or statutory provision providing for it.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question which I hesitate a little to ask because I had to be out of the Chamber during a part of his very interesting argument and he may have answered the question before I came in? Is not the constitution of Maine, as he describes it, precisely what the Constitution of the United States is in regard to the Vice-President, by implication without any constitutional provision whatever? The constitutional President of the Senate, when exercising the office of President, is not declared by the Constitution to vacate his office of Vice-President or President of the Senate, and yet, as everybody concedes, he does so. Now, how does the Senator distinguish the constitution of Delaware from that of Maine, except that Maine has written what in the constitution of Delaware and the Constitution of the United States is left to be implied?

Mr. GRAY. I answered substantially that question, not to-day, but yesterday, in an interlocution I had with the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], and I am quite willing to repeat the substance of what I said then.

The Constitution of the United States provides that when an election for President is had, at the same time and by the same electors there shall be elected a Vice-President, elected for the purpose of performing the duties of President or acting as President in case of the death, inability, or resignation of the President, elected expressly for that purpose and no other.

Mr. HOAR. Except to preside over the Senate.

Mr. GRAY. No; I will come to that in a moment. He is not elected to preside over the Senate. He is, as I said yesterday, a led horse, who is to take up the burden when it falls from the shoulders of the man who is elected primarily to bear it. He is elected for that very purpose and no other, and because the Constitution, in order, perhaps, to give dignity to the office and to the man who is set aside to wait for the death of the President, makes him ex officio President of the Senate does not alter at all the status to which this Constitution elects him.

So in case of the death of the President and the accession of the Vice-President to the duties of that office, the thing has occurred which the Constitution provided for, and when he acts as President or becomes President, I care not which, he must ex necessitate cease to be Vice-President. He is no longer the led horse. The burden is transferred to his shoulders. He can not be Vice-President to himself. He can not continue to be Vice-President and President too. For what is the Vice-President? One who is to take his turn as President when the President no longer exists. And those are two incompatible offices—incompatible ex necessitate—because you can not frame a sentence in the English language without absurdity that would make the Vice-President acting as President or when he becomes President continue also Vice-President.

Mr. HOAR. Then how does he get back in case of capture? Can the Senator tell me?

Mr. GRAY. I do not know. I am not bound to account for the way in which he would get back. When that case occurs it will no doubt give rise to an interesting argument. I am not to be turned aside from the plain, palpable point I am making by putting one conundrum after another, and I say it with entire respect; I mean questions which may be linked one to the other ad infinitum in regard to all human affairs. But there is that plain difference.

While we are on this subject I wish to enforce it a little further. The Constitution does more than provide for the election of a

Vice-President. It provides for a case where there is neither President nor Vice-President. The Constitution of the United States provides not only for the election of a Vice-President, but it looked ahead further. The framers of that instrument of course were confronted with the possibility or the probability that both the President and the Vice-President might be dead in one term and what should be done in that case. So they declared that Congress should provide by law who shall act as President in a case where both the President and the Vice-President were dead.

Congress in 1792, shortly after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, undertook to perform the duty which the Constitution imposed upon them, and under the clause authorizing them to provide who should act as President when both the President and Vice-President were dead, they enacted that in that case the President pro tempore of the Senate should act as President.

Now, for ninety-four years that law continued on our statute book without change. It is true that in the providence and mercy of God its provisions were never invoked, but there that law was. It was often the subject of discussion as to what might happen if the contingency so provided for should occur, and so inconvenient did some of the consequences of that law seem that the Committee of the Senate on Privileges and Elections since I became a member—not of that committee, but of the Senate—took the whole matter up, and under the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who was then its chairman, there was, after due consideration, I suppose, proposed from that committee a substitute for the law of 1792 which should repeal it and provide another order of succession, the one which now exists. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts performed on that occasion, as he has performed on many others, a great public service that will remain to benefit the people of the United States long after he and I have been removed from this scene of service and labor.

When the distinguished Senator brought that act into this body, and proposed that the Senate should adopt it in lieu of the old one, which was that the President pro tempore of the Senate should act as President when there was neither President nor Vice-President, what argument did he use in order to persuade the Senate to change that law and adopt the present? Here is part of what he said. In speaking of the inconvenience which might arise under the provisions of the act of 1792, the senior Senator from Massachusetts said:

> It is inconvenient, also, because it would be almost impossible for the President of the Senate to continue to perform the functions of his office, which is the principal office, to which the Presidency of the United States is made a mere adjunct or appendix in the contingency which is provided for by law. Nothing can be conceived more awkward, more repugnant to our sense of propriety, than for the President of the United States to sit in the chair of the Senate and preside over and listen to discussions in regard to his own nominations, voting upon them himself as an equal in the Senate, and presiding over and listening to the severe criticisms of executive policy which in times of high party antagonisms must be always heard in this Chamber, and ought to be always heard in this Chamber.
> Then the political functions are devolved by the present arrangement upon an officer changeable at the will of this body. The President of the Senate may be removed from time to time by the majority of the Senate, after the Presidential functions have devolved upon the office as before.

Mr. President, nobody rose in his place in the Senate in the reading of that interesting report and during the deliverance of that interesting speech to deny the correctness of the conclusions of the Senator from Massachusetts. Everyone seemed to acquiesce in the proposition that the President pro tempore of the Senate did not relinquish his office as Senator because the duties of the President of the United States were devolved upon him by the Constitution of the United States or by the law enacted in pursuance of the Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. Nor suspended.

Mr. GRAY. Nor suspended. The word "suspension" was never suggested.

Why should we not apply this reasoning to the State of Delaware? Is it because the State of Delaware is weak and small and the Government of the United States is great and large, as the Senator from New Hampshire seemed to wish to have us think yesterday afternoon? Why does not the logic of that situation apply to this? Why heap contumely upon the little State of Delaware because her people have during all these years put a construction upon her constitution precisely the same as that put upon the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States in a similar regard by the Senate of the United States from 1792 to the present time? Are we amenable to that criticism? Are we doing anything more than asking for a continuity of the logic and the judgment and the propriety which ought to obtain in all public affairs and in all public conduct, whatever may be the occasion which calls it forth?

I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say the other day in an interesting interruption which he made to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi that there was a difference, and I listened very attentively to learn what that difference was, and lo, it was this: That whereas the succession provided for by the statute of the United States was in the second degree, and if I did not misunderstand him, because the contingency of a President pro tempore being called upon to act as President was very remote, never having occurred in a hundred years, it did not make much difference whether the inconvenience that he depicted there arose or not; but if it had been in the first degree, as it was in Delaware, then there was a great difference. I say in all respect I was unable to comprehend that explanation of difference, and did not at all understand why you can make a rule of interpretation of a constitution to depend upon the remoteness or the probability of the happening of the event provided for.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Delaware will pardon me, I do not think he quite understood my statement.

Mr. GRAY. Possibly not.

Mr. HOAR. I can not repeat the words, of course, at this distance of time, but my statement was in substance that where the event was so exceedingly unlikely to happen the inconvenience of having an officer created who should be held ready at all times for the succession and have nothing or little else to do would outweigh the public inconvenience which might happen perhaps once in a thousand years of the other arrangement. My proposition applied to cases under our national and State constitutions of express enactment or of affirmance in the Constitution of the inconsistency of the two offices, as was done in Delaware. Our framers of the Constitution provided that executive offices should not be held by legislative officers, and that where the supreme executive office was vacant and a legislative officer was to succeed his functions as a legislative officer ended and stopped. That is what they did when they were providing for the probable case of the first succession or first vacancy.

Then there is another case which, so far as I know, never happened in the United States. Certainly it never happened in the Union where within the brief term of the executive office both the offices should be vacant, as in the case of President and Vice-President of the United States. There they have not established and provided a salary for the person to whom all these constitutions apply, but they say you may fix that any way, if that comes up, by legislation, and Congress shall provide for the officer who shall succeed.

Our ancestors did it, but if it had been an original question I should have thought it exceedingly doubtful whether, in the selection of the officers to succeed, the First Congress had the right to select the two legislative officers, because of the repugnance which our Constitution makers felt against the exercise of one of these offices by the other. But our ancestors did it, and we have repealed it.

Mr. GRAY. Now, Mr. President, to clinch the argument, that necessarily makes itself in the Pennsylvania precedent to which I have referred, I want to say that the constitution under which that incident took place was a constitution in which the provisions in regard to the exercise of the office of governor by the speaker were precisely the same as they were in Delaware. The prohibitions were just the same, and we have seen what its interpretation was by the people and by the legislature of Pennsylvania, that it was precisely what it has been in Delaware. That constitution has been changed. The constitution was adopted in 1838, but it was changed in 1873. Our constitution has not been changed. But what did they do when they changed it? Here is what they did:

> SEC. 14. In case of a vacancy in the office of lieutenant-governor * * * the powers, duties, and emoluments thereof for the remainder of the term, or until the disability be removed, shall devolve upon the president pro tempore of the senate; and the president pro tempore of the senate shall in like manner become governor—

They did not any longer say "he shall exercise the office of governor," but they ex industria changed the law and said "he shall become governor"— > if a vacancy or disability shall occur in the office of governor; his seat as senator shall become vacant whenever he shall become governor, and shall be filled by election, as any other vacancy in the senate.

They were confronted with that, and they came to the conclusion that it would be better probably not to leave the duties of senator upon the speaker exercising the office; they were too many and too conflicting; and so they provided by express constitutional enactment that he should become governor, and when he becomes governor his office as senator shall become vacant, but shall not be left vacant; it shall be filled. There was no suggestion of suspension, no suggestion of the unvacant vacancy of an office with no officer to fill it, but a careful protection and guarding of the interests of the people.

The Senator from Oregon speaks of his private or real opinion. You see the Senator from Oregon (and I say it with due respect to his great abilities and his character) is compelled in this case to have a real opinion and an argumentative opinion. His real opinion, he says, in answer to a question from the Senator from Mississippi, is that the exercise of the office of governor by the speaker of the senate works a vacancy in the office of both speaker and senator. Yet in his interruption of the Senator from Mississippi he says he believes that in the case mentioned there is no place subject to occupancy, and that during the speaker's exercise of the office of governor the senate of Delaware consists of 8 members and not of 9 members.

Here are two statements of what the Senator believes to be the real interpretation of the constitution of Delaware. He says his real belief is that the exercise of the office of governor by the speaker works a vacancy. He also says that he believes in the case before the Senate there was no place subject to the occupancy in the senate of Delaware, and that during the speaker's exercise of the office of governor the senate of Delaware consisted of only 8 members and not of 9 members. Now, if that were so, how could there be a vacancy? If there was no ninth place to be filled, then there was no vacancy in that ninth place. That ninth place was the place occupied by Speaker Watson. He says he believes that when he exercised the office of governor he vacated that place. The place is still there capable of being filled by election; there were still 9 seats, but now he says in his interlocution with the Senator from Mississippi that he believes there were only 8 places. Therefore there was no place, vacant or otherwise.

You see, Mr. President, when you leave the plain text of the constitution and set up paraphrases of it in your argument from artificial premises, even such an acute logician as the Senator from Oregon is conceded to be is necessarily led into confusions and contradictions of this kind; and I might point out others in the course of his able and ingenious argument.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, it does seem to me the Senator is rather hypercritical in his review of what I said on that subject. I have said, and said it a great many times during this discussion, that two views might be taken of this constitution. One is that on the accession to the exercise of the office of governor by the speaker of the senate the place became absolutely vacant; the other is that the right to exercise the function of senator and speaker were simply suspended. In the one case, of course, there would be no vacancy to be filled so far as that is concerned, but that being true, the right upon the part of the person exercising the office of governor to exercise the functions of senator and speaker would be absolutely suspended, while in the other case there would be a vacancy that would be subject to be filled.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator, as I say with due respect, falls between the two horses that he has attempted to ride.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Not at all.

Mr. GRAY. I am glad to hear you are not injured by the fall. When we have a constitutional convention in Delaware we may put into the constitution a provision such as they have in Pennsylvania; but it is proposed now by Senators upon the other side that this Senate shall anticipate the meeting of a convention in Delaware and write a new constitution for that State.

Mr. President, I am taking up certainly more time than I intended, more perhaps than I ought to take. The Senators upon the other side of this question contend that apart from the express constitutional provision on the subject there is an inherent incompatibility between the exercise of the office of governor and the exercise of the function of senator. I am sorry that it is my duty, but so it is, at this point to call attention to a mode of argument which I can not permit to continue any longer. The Senator from Oregon, with great astuteness, recognizing the difficulty of his case and riding these two horses that I have spoken of——

Mr. GEORGE. Going in opposite directions.

Mr. GRAY. Has all along been referring to the two constitutional prohibitions, one of which says that nobody holding an office under the State shall be senator or representative, and the other saying that no person holding an office under the State shall exercise the office of governor. The force and effect of those prohibitions are measured by their language. They prohibit because they are in the constitution. They are of effect because they have been given expression to by the framers of that constitution. They are to be measured by their own language. I have discussed them, and I think I have demonstrated what has been more clearly demonstrated before by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], that they have no application and can have no application to the exercise of the office of governor by the speaker of the senate. I take it it is not contended any longer that they do in that sense. But, Mr. President, there has been all through the argument on the other side an attempt to run these prohibitions in, and to attract attention to them, and at the same time allude to what is called an inherent incompatibility between the executive and legislative offices. They have evidently been of the mind that neither of these arguments was by itself sufficient, but that they could in some way combine them and get the united force of both; that there was a sort of chemical union to take place between these two arguments, and, like some medicines, they were to be well shaken before taken.

But, Mr. President, the argument founded upon the prohibitive clauses of the constitution stands by itself and can only be dealt with apart and by itself, and the argument on inherent incompatibility is independent of them and must be dealt with by itself, and we can not combine them. If these clauses do not apply, as I submit I have shown they do not, let us consider whether there is anything in the doctrine of inherent incompatibility. The Senator from Oregon, and the Senator from New Hampshire even more emphatically and at greater length, dwelt upon what I call the inherent incompatibility of legislative and executive offices, which the Senator from New Hampshire says is a great doctrine of American public law.

Now, let us see just what he means by a doctrine of American public law. It is true that offices may be incompatible with each other, and the Senator from Oregon has shown, what is entirely admitted by me and by I think all who have argued on this side, that there are certain offices which, being incompatible with each other, the acceptance of the second vacates the first. That is true; but what are those offices to which he has referred? They are offices which by the nature of their duties are either physically incapable of being performed by the same person or whose duties are the one subordinate to the other. The instances given are all recollected—I need not refer to the cases—the instances given are those most frequently mentioned, those of an inferior judge being elected to a superior judgeship which has a supervisory jurisdiction over the inferior judge. Manifestly there is something in the very constitution of organized government which forbids that the judge who supervises should be the same one who is supervised. So an accounting officer can not be elected and made the accountant; he can not be permitted to account to himself; and it will be found that all the cases referred to are of that nature. I do not pretend to have gone over them all, but they are all of that character.

Then, what is this incompatibility between legislative and executive offices? There is, it is true, in all American constitutions of government a separation of the three departments of government—legislative, executive, and judicial—and a pretty steady observance of the lines of demarcation between those departments. But what does it mean? Does it mean that there is never a point where the one impinges upon the other; that there is never any necessary interlacing of two departments, or that it is incompatible or impossible that one man exercising or holding a position in one department should never be permitted to perform a function of another? Not at all. That is not the American doctrine, because if it were contended that it was it could be very easily demonstrated that no writer of approved authority has ever so considered it.

There is no such American doctrine as that executive and legislative offices are in themselves incompatible. It is true that one department must not be allowed to encroach upon another, but that does not mean that a member of a legislature can not temporarily or otherwise exercise an executive or a judicial function.

What do you mean by the independence of the three great departments of the Government? Story explains it, Madison explains it, Webster explains it. It means that one great department of this Government shall not encroach upon the powers and prerogatives of any other; that the Executive of the United States, for instance, shall not be permitted to assume a legislative power; that he shall not be permitted to dispense with law which has the sanction of legislative enactment, as Mr. Webster so eloquently and clearly and forcibly demonstrated in his great speech on protest against the action of Andrew Jackson in regard to the removal of the deposits. That the legislature shall not exercise a judicial function; that they shall not undertake to decide a case which has arisen under a law of their own enactment; that the judiciary department shall not undertake in interpreting the laws to legislate or enact a law. That is all that it means and all that it can mean in the history and practice under American constitutions and under American forms of government.

Mr. President, let me read from Mr. Madison a short extract. He certainly will be considered an authoritative expounder of our form of Government. Commenting upon the doctrine of Montesquieu, he says:

> From these facts, by which Montesquieu was guided, it may clearly be inferred that in saying "there can be no liberty where the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person or body of magistrates," or, "if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers," he did not mean that these departments ought to have no partial agency in or no control over the acts of each other. His meaning, as his own words import, and still more conclusively as illustrated by the example in his eye, can amount to no more than this, that where the whole power of one department is exercised by the same hands which possess the whole power of another department the fundamental principles of a free constitution are subverted.

Of course, if the Executive exercised a legislative power in any one instance, then he would be exercising the whole power of one department.

This would have been the case in the constitution examined by him if the king, who is the sole executive magistrate, had possessed also the complete legislative power or the supreme administration of justice, or if the entire legislative body had possessed the supreme judiciary or the supreme executive authority. This, however, is not among the vices of that constitution. The magistrate, in whom the whole executive power resides, can not of himself make a law, though he can put a negative on every law; nor administer justice in person, though he has the appointment of those who do administer it. The judges can exercise no executive prerogative, though they are shoots from the executive stock; nor any legislative function, though they may be advised with by the legislative councils. The entire legislature can perform no judiciary act, though by the joint act of two of its branches the judges may be removed from their offices, and though one of its branches is possessed of the judicial power in the last resort. The entire legislature again can exercise no executive prerogative, though one of its branches constitutes the supreme executive magistracy; and another, on the impeachment of a third, can try and condemn all the subordinate officers in the executive department.

The reasons on which Montesquieu grounds his maxim are a further demonstration of his meaning. "When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person or body," says he, "there can be no liberty, because apprehensions may arise lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws, to execute them in a tyrannical manner." Again: "Were the power of judging joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary control, for the judge would then be the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with all the violence of an oppressor." Some of these reasons are more fully explained in other passages; but briefly stated as they are here, they sufficiently establish the meaning which we have put on this celebrated maxim of this celebrated author.

Mr. Madison in the same essay was more practical still, and in establishing his contention as to what was meant by the limitation between the departments of the Government he instanced the frame of government of the different States, and among others instanced the government of Delaware, the very one with which we are now concerned, and said that—

In Delaware the chief executive magistrate is annually elected by the legislative department—

That is in the constitution of 1776—

The speaker of the two legislative branches are vice-presidents in the executive department. The executive chief, with six others, appointed three by each of the legislative branches, constitutes the supreme court of appeals; he is joined with the legislative department in the appointment of the other judges. * * * The principal officers of the executive department are appointed by the legislative; and one branch of the latter forms a court of impeachments. All officers may be removed on address of the legislature.

I suppose that the Senator from New Hampshire, when he talked about that great principle of separation of the three great departments of the Government, meant just what Mr. Madison said, although he did not know perhaps that he was so clearly in accord with him. But I do not think the Senator from New Hampshire had allowed himself, as Mr. Madison had allowed himself, to make that practical application of that great doctrine and show not only what it meant but what it did not mean, and to show clearly that it did not mean what the Senator from New Hampshire seems to have thought yesterday that it might mean, the prohibition of any exercise by a legislative officer of any executive function whatever; in other words, that there was a common law, as he said, in that regard, the extent of which was necessarily undefined, but which the Senator from New Hampshire so defined as to meet this case, a common law which forbade any legislative officer ever exercising an executive function without vacating the legislative position. He said that is so universal, is so mandatory and imperative, it does not need to be put in express words in a constitution; it operates propria vigore, it surrounds us by an atmosphere and paralyzes any attempt to do otherwise than obey its mandate.

Mr. President, Madison did not think so. Madison limits that great American doctrine; he distinguishes it; he makes a line of demarcation which excludes the very case we are considering, which the Senator from New Hampshire includes.

The Senator from Oregon has also quoted at great length, as have the counsel for Mr. Du Pont, some eloquent passages from Mr. Webster's speech in the Senate on the occasion to which I have referred, on the necessity of preserving the great lines of demarcation between the three great departments of the Government. Admitting all that he so eloquently said, the Senator did not quote all that he said, and we find that he meant exactly what Mr. Madison meant, he meant exactly what I mean in this contention I am making to-day—that while the three departments of the Government are outlined in every American constitution, unless we find express prohibitive words to that effect there is no inhibition by any such general doctrine upon a legislative officer exercising temporarily, at the command of the constitution, an executive office.

Mr. Webster's speech was made upon an occasion which is very well known. There was no charge of any incompatibility in that case of functions with which the President was supposed to be invested. The charge was made against the President that he was, without possessing any authority to do so, setting aside an act of Congress, and that he was usurping legislative power. The question at issue was defined by Mr. Webster in these very words in the speech which the Senator quotes:

The legislature had fixed a place by law for the keeping of the public money. They had, at the same time and by the same law, created and conferred a power of removal, to be exercised contingently. This power they had vested in the Secretary (of the Treasury) by express words. The law did not say that the deposits should be made in the bank unless the President should order otherwise; but it did say that they should be made there, unless the Secretary of the Treasury should order otherwise. I put it to the plain sense and common candor of all men, whether the discretion thus to be exercised over the subject was not the Secretary's own personal discretion; and whether, therefore, the interposition of the authority of another, acting directly and conclusively on the subject, deciding the whole question, even in its particulars and details, be not an assumption of power? The Senate regarded this interposition as an encroachment by the Executive on other branches of the Government; as an interference with the legislative disposition of the public treasure. (4 Webster's Works, 108-109.)

There was real occasion for Mr. Webster's eloquent invective in that case from his point of view. There had been a law which directed that the deposits should not be removed from a certain place designated by law except by the personal order of the Secretary of the Treasury. The President, ignoring the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, against his discretion and against his will, directed the removal of those deposits and thereby encroached upon the legislative power, dispensed with an act of Congress—so Mr. Webster said—and for that he was denouncing his conduct, and he was making a beautiful apostrophe in one part of his speech of the necessity of preserving the lines of demarcation between the legislative and executive branches of the Government. But here is something more which Mr. Webster said, to show that he did not often get confused in these matters of constitutional exposition:

The separation of the powers of government into three departments, though all our constitutions profess to be founded on it, has, nevertheless, never been perfectly established in any government of the world, and perhaps never can be. * * * Thus the Constitution (of the United States) says that all legislative power therein granted shall be vested in a Congress, which Congress shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives; and yet, in another article, it gives to the President a qualified negative over all acts of Congress. So the Constitution declares that the judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as Congress may establish. It gives, nevertheless, in another provision, judicial power to the Senate; and, in like manner, though it declares that the executive power shall be vested in the President, using, in the immediate context, no words of limitation, yet it elsewhere subjects the treaty-making power and the appointing power to the concurrence of the Senate. The irresistible inference from these considerations is that the mere nomination of a department, as one of the three great and commonly acknowledged departments of the Government, does not confer on that department any power at all. Notwithstanding the departments are called the legislative, the executive, and the judicial, we must yet look into the provisions of the Constitution itself in order to learn, first, what powers the Constitution regards as legislative, executive, and judicial; and, in the next place, what portions or quantities of these powers are conferred on the respective departments, because no one will contend that all legislative power belongs to Congress, all executive power to the President, or all judicial power to the courts of the United States. (4 Webster's Works, page 123.)

Now, the Senator from New Hampshire, differing from Mr. Webster in this respect, says that we do not need to look into the constitution at all. He says that whether there is any express provision in the constitution of Delaware or not declaring a vacancy in the office of senator or a suspension of the office when the senator exercises the office of governor this common American public law operates to create that vacancy or to create that suspension, irrespective of what the constitution itself says.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator does not wish to misquote me. I do not mean irrespective of what the constitution says if the constitution of Delaware expressly allows or directs the exercise of the functions of two offices at the same time; but I do say that that principle of public law prevents the exercise of that office in Delaware in the absence of an express provision of the constitution of Delaware allowing it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me, I will go a step further, and say that if the constitution of Delaware by fair inference allows it—it is not even necessary that it should be expressed—but even if by fair construction, inferentially, it appears that that power was granted by the men who framed the constitution, then I assume it would exist.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Oregon is right. I stated in my proposition of yesterday that while this is a fundamental principle of constitutional law, an express provision in the national or State constitution would change it; and if either by express provision of the Delaware constitution, or by necessary inference therefrom, the same person may exercise the functions of two offices at the same time, then he may do it. But our contention is that the constitution of Delaware does not make any such provision, either expressly or by necessary inference.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. But, on the contrary, prohibits it.

Mr. GRAY. You see when you take the first wrong step the second necessarily follows, and you finally find the next step negativing the proposition of public law, and the Senator from Oregon says also it can be negatived by an inferential proposition.

Mr. CHANDLER. A necessary inference.

Mr. GRAY. So we go. If there is an end in view, we will make an argument which will reach it; if there is no express provision, we will make an inference that will do it. Mr. Webster, on the contrary, says:

Notwithstanding the departments are called the legislative, the executive, and the judicial, we must yet look into the provisions of the Constitution itself in order to learn first, what powers the Constitution regards as legislative, executive, and judicial; and, in the next place, what portions or quantities of these powers are conferred on the respective departments.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly. That is just what I say.

Mr. GRAY. Well, I do not think it is just what you say. I think it is entirely different from what the Senator from Oregon says. He says if the constitution of Delaware provides that a legislative officer shall exercise temporarily any executive function, that there is a public law so well understood, so pervasive, so universal, and so American that it vacates the legislative office.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Madison says that you must look to the constitution itself to see what participation the legislative officer may have in executive functions, and you must be governed by that, and that alone.

Mr. Madison, in No. 47 of the Federalist, also says:

In a government where numerous and extensive prerogatives are placed in the hands of an hereditary monarch the executive department is very justly regarded as the source of danger and watched with all the jealousy which a zeal for liberty ought to inspire. * * * But in a representative republic, where the executive magistracy is carefully limited, both in the extent and the duration of its power, and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly which is inspired by a supposed influence over the people with an intrepid confidence in its own strength, which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude, yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions by means which reason prescribes, it is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy and exhaust all their precautions.

Mr. President, there is a very startling difference between the Senator from Oregon and Mr. Madison in regard to the source of danger to our Government and to our people. He seems to think that in obeying the mandate of the constitution of Delaware the speaker of the senate, exercising the office of governor, should vacate the office of senator from the county which he represents, or otherwise all the dangers which the Senator from Oregon has conjured up in his heated imagination to affright the Senate from its propriety and from its duty will come down upon the heads of the American people, that this is a frightful invasion, a frightful encroachment of the executive upon the legislative power; whereas Mr. Madison, on the other hand, thinks that in this country, where the executive is so limited, that encroachment of the legislative upon the executive is the source of danger and the source of apprehension against which safeguards should be made.

But, Mr. President, in neither case is there any place for the heated imaginings of the Senator from Oregon. The people of Delaware are in no danger in pursuing the paths which have been pursued by their forefathers for a hundred years; they are in no danger when they interpret their constitution in consonance with the views of Madison and Webster, nor are the people of the United States when we shall determine that a Senator of the United States, to be elected by a legislature, shall be elected by the whole body of the legislature elected by the people for that purpose, for when we elect a legislature we take into account the fact that they are to perform that high electoral duty and to provide a representative in this body for the State.

Mr. President, to come back to the doctrine of inherent incompatibility, I think I have shown that the doctrine of inherent incompatibility maintained by the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from New Hampshire, as well as by the Senator from Michigan, is a very different one from that maintained by Webster and by Madison. I might go further, if it were necessary, and show what Mr. Story says in his Commentaries on the Constitution as to how far incompatibility may be argued from the separation of the three great departments of the Government. Says Mr. Story, in section 525 of the first volume of his Commentaries:

But when we speak of a separation of the three great departments of government and maintain that that separation is indispensable to public liberty, we are to understand this maxim in a limited sense. It is not meant to affirm that they must be kept wholly and entirely separate and distinct and have no common link of connection or dependence the one upon the other in the slightest degree. The true meaning is that the whole power of one of these departments should not be exercised by the same hands which possess the whole power of either of the other departments, and that such exercise of the whole would subvert the principles of a free constitution. This has been shown with great clearness and accuracy by the authors of the Federalist.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it would be convenient to the Senator from Delaware to finish his argument to-morrow, I should like to have a brief executive session.

Mr. GRAY. If it be any accommodation to the Senator from Ohio or the Senate, of course I will yield with pleasure to the suggestion; but I will remark that I have not a great deal more to say, and if I may be permitted to go on in the morning, I will undertake to not trespass upon the patience of the Senate at very great length.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PEFFER. Before that motion is put, I wish to have it understood that it shall not interfere with the bond sale investigation resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to disarrange the matter in charge of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PEFFER. With that understanding, I have no objection to an executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MEDICAL AND DENTAL COLLEGES.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yesterday I asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a medical bill to which there was objection. I now ask for the consideration of a bill to which there will be no objection. It is the bill (H. R. 5488) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of medical colleges in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CALL. I think that bill ought to receive careful consideration. The Senate is very thin. I have here a protest——

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill has received the consideration of the Committee on the District of Columbia in the House. It has passed the House. It has received the careful consideration of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate. It has been unanimously approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and by the medical and dental associations of the District. It has been on the Calendar for a couple of months. It has had all the consideration it can possibly have.

Mr. CALL. All that does not make the Senate of the United States, and it is incumbent upon Senators to consider the bills that are brought here and that they shall have the approval of their own judgment. I do not know anything about this measure except that I do not think it is wise that any inquiry into any subject of human knowledge shall be confined to any designated people. The human mind should be free to make its investigations into all subjects, and this bill imposes a penalty upon particular forms of teaching and instruction.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator——

Mr. CALL. Wait one minute. Yes; that is what this bill does. It makes it a crime for men to teach such convictions as they may have which are not approved by certain persons.

I know nothing about the merits of these different schools, but anything which suppresses human inquiry and the liberty of human thought and the teaching of any doctrines that are not themselves against public order ought not to be permitted. I have here a paper which has been brought to me, and I want to read it. It is from some association existing here, signed by W. W. Hubbell, president of the University of Science.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Florida knows that no such university exists, does he not?

Mr. CALL. Suppose it does not, and that only Mr. Hubbell exists?

Mr. GALLINGER. He is the only one who does exist in connection with it.

Mr. CALL. Very well; this Mr. Hubbell has a right to teach anyone else if he can convince the judgment of people that what he teaches is right, and he ought to be permitted to do it. He says here——

Mr. GALLINGER. He can do that in his individual capacity, I will say to the Senator, even if this bill passes.

Mr. CALL. Not at all. If he sets up a school you punish him. Not only that, but you authorize arbitrary punishment. You authorize information to be filed without any inquiry by a mandatory order. What for? For teaching his opinions upon the subject of medicine. He says here:

The bills and efforts now being made in Congress, really tending to establish medical monopolies in the old schools of medicine, on pretext of examinations, after graduates have passed the ordeal of institutions incorporated by law.

Is not that true? Can a man who comes here with a diploma from some of the incorporated institutions in a State practice medicine without being permitted by this board to which you refer?

Mr. GALLINGER. I confess I do not understand the Senator's question; so I will not undertake to answer it.

Mr. CALL. I will read it again. This man says:

The bills and efforts now being made in Congress, really tending to establish medical monopolies in the old schools of medicine, on pretext of examinations, after graduates have passed the ordeal of institutions incorporated by law, not only tend to discourage and defeat young men in their efforts to acquire knowledge, but are practically a money-making imposition upon the inalienable rights of the people to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," as free and independent, with natural right of choice in the advancement of science in medicine; and we call upon all in favor of our "educational" system to oppose all such monopolies, in Congress and in the States, by defeat and repeal; and maintain the rights of ourselves and our children as free American citizens.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is reading the opinion of a gentleman concerning the bill to which he objected yesterday. If he will confine himself to this bill and discuss the question——

Mr. FAULKNER. This is a mere dental bill.

Mr. CALL. A dental bill?

Mr. FAULKNER. A dental bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is an entirely different bill, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CALL. I beg pardon.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me to state what this bill is, I know he will not object.

Mr. CALL. Is not the argument true about dentistry as in regard to medicine?

Mr. GALLINGER. We passed in the last Congress a bill regulating the practice of dentistry. The Senator from Florida forgot to object to it. That act is on the statute books now. Under the general incorporation act of this District (and I presume no such authority is lodged in the general incorporation act of any State in the American Union) any two, three, four, or five men can organize a college for the teaching of medicine, dentistry, or any other of the learned professions. The result is that we have had two or three colleges that have brought scandal upon the professions in this District, and all the bill contemplates is that the Commissioners shall approve those colleges before they continue to impart the knowledge that they claim to impart. That is all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the incorporation and regulation of medical and dental colleges in the District of Columbia."

Mr. CALL subsequently said: I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 5488) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of medical colleges in the District of Columbia was passed. I wish to examine the bill and have not had an opportunity to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 8109) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HANDBOOK OF EXPERIMENT STATION WORK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 additional copies of Bulletin No. 15 of the Office of Experiment Stations of the Department of Agriculture entitled Handbook of Experiment Station Work, of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the members of the Senate, 4,000 copies for the use of members of the House of Representatives, and 4,000 copies for the use of the Secretary of Agriculture.

SALMON FISHERIES OF ALASKA.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2022) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the protection of the salmon fisheries of Alaska."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Fisheries with amendments, in line 8, after the word "fences," to strike out "traps, pound nets"; in the same line, after the word "any," to insert "such"; in line 12, after the word "salmon," to strike out "or salmon trout"; in line 20, after the word "salmon," to strike out "or salmon trout"; in line 22, after the word "Alaska," to insert "except only for purposes of propagation"; in line 24, after the word "net," to insert "trap, pound net"; in line 32, after the word "waters," to insert "except Cook Inlet, Prince William Sound, Bering Sea, and the waters tributary thereto"; in line 33, after the word "from," to strike out "noon on Saturday," and insert "midnight on Friday"; in line 34, after the words "six o'clock," to strike out "postmeridian" and insert antemeridian"; in line 36, after the word "appliances," to insert "except by rod or spear"; in line 37, after the word "salmon," to strike out "or salmon trout"; in line 39, after the words "in the," to strike out "morning" and insert "evening"; in line 40, after the words "in the," to strike out "evening" and insert "morning"; in the same line, before the word "day," to strike out "same" and insert "following"; in line 43, after the word "aside," to strike out "certain" and insert "any"; in line 50, after the word "increase," to insert "Provided, however, That such power shall be exercised only after all persons interested shall have been given a hearing, of which hearing due notice must be given by publication: And provided further, That it shall have been ascertained that the persons engaged in catching salmon do not maintain fish hatcheries of sufficient magnitude to keep such streams fully stocked"; in line 60, after the words "salary of," to strike out "ten" and insert "one thousand eight hundred"; in line 61, after the word "per," to strike out "day" and insert "annum"; in line 62, after the words "salary of," to strike out "eight" and insert "one thousand six hundred"; in line 63, after the word "per," to strike out "day" and insert "annum"; and in line 75, after the words "fine of," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "two hundred and fifty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved March 2, 1889, and entitled "An act to provide for the protection of the salmon fisheries of Alaska," is hereby amended and reenacted, as follows:

"That the erection of dams, barricades, fish wheels, fences, or any such fixed or stationary obstructions in any part of the rivers or streams of Alaska, or to fish for or catch salmon or salmon trout in any manner or by any means with the purpose or result of preventing or impeding the ascent of salmon to their spawning ground, is declared to be unlawful, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to remove such obstructions and to establish and enforce such regulations and surveillance as may be necessary to insure that this prohibition and all other provisions of law relating to the salmon fisheries of Alaska are strictly complied with.

"SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful to fish, catch, or kill any salmon of any variety, except with rod or spear, above the tide waters of any of the creeks or rivers of less than 500 feet width in the Territory of Alaska, except only for purposes of propagation, or to lay or set any drift net, set net, trap, pound net, or seine for any purpose across the tide waters of any river or stream for a distance of more than one-third of the width of such river, stream, or channel, or lay or set any seine or net within 100 yards of any other net or seine which is being laid or set in said stream or channel, or to take, kill, or fish for salmon in any manner or by any means in any of the waters of the Territory of Alaska, either in the streams or tide waters, except Cook Inlet, Prince William Sound, Bering Sea, and the waters tributary thereto, from midnight on Friday of each week until 6 o'clock antemeridian of the Sunday following; or to fish for or catch or kill in any manner or by any appliances, except by rod or spear, any salmon in any stream of less than 100 yards in width in the said Territory of Alaska between the hours of 6 o'clock in the evening and 6 o'clock in the morning of the following day of each and every day of the week.

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his discretion, set aside any streams as spawning grounds, in which no fishing will be permitted; and when, in his judgment, the results of fishing operations on any stream indicate that the number of salmon taken is larger than the capacity of the stream to produce, he is authorized to establish weekly close seasons, to limit the duration of the fishing season, or to prohibit fishing entirely for one year or more, so as to permit salmon to increase: Provided, however, That such power shall be exercised only after all persons interested shall have been given a hearing, of which hearing due notice must be given by publication: And provided further, That it shall have been ascertained that the persons engaged in catching salmon do not maintain fish hatcheries of sufficient magnitude to keep such streams fully stocked.

"SEC. 4. That to enforce the provisions of law herein and such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may establish in pursuance thereof, he is authorized and directed to appoint one inspector of fisheries, at a salary of $1,800 per annum, and two assistant inspectors, at a salary of $1,600 each per annum, and he will annually submit to Congress estimates to cover the salaries and actual traveling expenses of the officers hereby authorized and for such other expenditures as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the law herein.

"SEC. 5. That any person violating the provisions of this act or the regulations established in pursuance thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment at hard labor for a term of ninety days, or both such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court; and, further, in case of the violation of any of the provisions of section 1 of this act and conviction thereof a further fine of $250 per diem will be imposed for each day that the obstruction or obstructions therein are maintained."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RITA STINE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 2813) granting a pension to Rita Stine; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that that bill may now be considered. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is familiar with all the facts in the case. A like bill was passed by the Senate and sent to the House of Representatives, giving the claimant therein mentioned, a helpless blind girl, $12 a month. The other House has passed not the Senate bill, but a House bill in the exact language of the Senate bill, except the pension is $17 a month. I hope the bill may be considered and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope the bill may be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place the name of Rita Stine, of Memphis, Mo., invalid and helpless orphan daughter of George W. Stine, late lieutenant of Company I, Twenty-first Missouri Volunteer Infantry, upon the pension roll, and to allow her a pension of $17 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAYS OF GRACE ON PROMISSORY NOTES, ETC.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5105) to abolish days of grace on promissory notes, drafts, etc., in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOAR. I object to the present consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts objects to the present consideration of the bill.

LEWIS C. SCHILLING.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2224) granting an increase of pension to Lewis C. Schilling.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lewis C. Schilling, late a private in Company A, Fourth Ohio Cavalry Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of the amount he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

RIBBONS OF HONOR.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 85) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the acts of July 12, 1862, and March 3, 1863.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. When that joint resolution was before the Senate on a prior occasion I objected to it, not having been able to read the report; but I find the report provides—it does not appear upon the face of the joint resolution—for a distinctive ribbon, which is to be supplied when one is destroyed, and it will be designated by the Secretary of War, and not such an one as the holder of one of the medals might obtain in any other way. Therefore I make no objection to the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution has been heretofore considered as in Committee of the Whole and amended, and the amendment concurred in by the Senate. It is still open to amendment.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHOUP. I now move that the bill (S. 2512) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the joint resolution approved July 12, 1862, and the act approved March 3, 1863, being precisely the same as the joint resolution which has just been passed, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1537) to provide for the private sale of public lands in Missouri.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the actual settlers shall have a preference right under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may prescribe.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all public lands within the State of Missouri which have not heretofore been offered at public sale shall hereafter be subject to disposal at private sale in the manner now provided by law for the sale of lands which have been publicly offered for sale: Provided, That the actual settlers shall have a preference right under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MERCHANT MARINE ENGINEER SERVICE.

Mr. SQUIRE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3013) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to improve the merchant marine engineer service, and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve.

This is a bill which had been reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment was adopted as in Committee of the Whole some time since as a substitute for the original bill. The question now is, Shall the bill as amended be reported to the Senate?

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HILL. What is the precise amendment—the precise change?

Mr. SQUIRE. The precise amendment is in line with the bill as passed by the Senate originally.

Mr. HILL. What is the precise change?

Mr. SQUIRE. Let the bill be read. The precise changes are to conform to the bill as amended in committee, and passed by the Senate originally.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object to the further consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is objection, and the bill goes over.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WARREN. I appeal to the Senator from Maryland to withdraw his motion to adjourn until I can ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I withdraw the motion, Mr. President.

HEIRS OF STERLING T. AUSTIN.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 682) for the relief of the heirs of Sterling T. Austin, deceased.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Florine A. Albright and Missouri A. Pollard, heirs of Sterling T. Austin, deceased, $59,287, being the proceeds of the sale of 360 bales of cotton, the property of Sterling T. Austin, seized by the civil and military authorities of the United States and received into the Treasury, as found by the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HILL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 16, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The views of the minority will be printed, to accompany the report of the committee.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—MOORMAN VS. LATIMER.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have been directed by the Committee on Elections No. 3 to call up for present consideration and move the adoption of the resolutions reported by the committee in the case of Moorman vs. Latimer, from the Third Congressional district of South Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That Robert Moorman was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Third district of South Carolina, and is not entitled to the seat as such Representative.

Resolved, That A. C. Latimer was elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Third Congressional district of South Carolina, and is entitled to retain his seat as such Representative.

Mr. BELL of Texas. This is the unanimous report of the committee; there is no controversy over the matter, and I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BELL of Texas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOHN B. BESLER.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5258) granting an honorable discharge to John B. Besler.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of, and grant an honorable discharge to, John B. Besler, late a private in Company M, First Regiment Connecticut Heavy Artillery, now a resident of New Haven, Conn.

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask if this bill has been considered at a Friday-night session?

Mr. SPERRY. It has not been.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would ask that the report accompanying this bill be read, Mr. Speaker.

The report (by Mr. Tarsney) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5258) for the relief of John B. Besler, having considered the same, respectfully report:

The committee have examined the evidence presented with this case, and on the showing made consider the claimant entitled to the relief asked for under the provisions of this bill.

The affidavit of Capt. F. A. Pratt, printed herewith as a part of this report, and fully corroborated and sustained by numerous other affidavits and statements of this soldier's officers and comrades, conclusively shows that the action of the court-martial, by which the soldier was submitted to a cruel and unusual punishment, was erroneous and unjust, not founded upon fact, and when imposed upon an innocent man, as in this case, to satisfy the malice of an ignorant officer, can only be properly characterized as inhuman and barbarous. We believe that relief can not be granted to this unfortunate and deserving man with sufficient speed.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Hon. N. D. SPERRY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the case of John B. Besler, of New Haven, Conn., who in the civil war was a private in M company, First Regiment Connecticut Heavy Artillery, and dishonorably discharged, and who now asks that the records be changed, and that he may have an honorable discharge, for your information and those who are to have the consideration of the matter, I respectfully submit the following:

At the breaking out of the war John B. Besler was an industrious young mechanic, of good habits and reputation, living in New Haven, Conn., where he had been working for several years in carriage factories. During the winter of 1861-62, with several of his companions and fellow-workmen, he enlisted in Company M, First Regiment Connecticut Artillery. In the spring of 1862 this regiment went to Yorktown and had charge of the siege train there. The work was day and night, in rain and mud, and of the hardest kind. The record shows more heavy ordnance and ammunition moved and put in position than had ever been before done in the same length of time.

At some period during this time Besler, who had up to that date been a most willing and excellent soldier, made complaint of lameness in back and legs as resulting from the work and exposure. The surgeon declined to believe him or excuse him, and returned him for duty in his company, where he was favored somewhat and put on light duty, which, I am informed by the then first sergeant, he appeared to do cheerfully and as well as able. He was very soldierly in appearance, keeping his uniform and equipments in the best of order, so much so that for that reason he would be selected from the new guard as the orderly for the day for the colonel commanding or the adjutant nearly every time he was on the guard detail. This I know from the fact that I was at that time the regimental adjutant. He came on as a member of the guard very frequently. This, I learned, was because men of his company would, by permission of his first sergeant, exchange their place in the guard detail for his place on the working detail, they believing he was not able to work. As his trouble became more acute, he again went to the surgeon, who again refused to believe him; told him there was nothing the matter with him, that he was "playing off." This Besler resented in strong language, not politic or proper from a subordinate, but natural under the circumstances from one who had any pride or manhood. The surgeon ordered him to duty and to be punished, and an antagonism was here established. Besler continued to do light work in his company.

Arriving at Harrisons Landing, he was again before the surgeon, with no better result. In October, 1862, I was appointed captain of M company, and took command at Fort Ward, Va. Besler was with the company, apparently not able to do duty, but not excused by the surgeon. I then heard his statement, made investigations, and, believing him, made his duties as light as possible. In December, 1862, M company was detached from the regiment and sent to Fredericksburg for special service. Besler was left at regimental hospital near Fort Ward, and was never again with his company. The surgeon was a cold, unsympathetic man of tenacious opinions, likely to be intensified by opposition, no doubt honest in believing Besler was deceiving; but undoubtedly wrong and strongly prejudiced in the case. The troubles Besler complains of, as I know from my own experience, can be very severe and yet so obscure that a doctor can not determine them without taking the statement of the sufferer. During the winter and spring of 1862 and 1863 the surgeon treated Besler at the regimental hospital with great severity, and finding that he would not admit that he was well and able to return to duty, had charges preferred against him of feigning sickness for the purpose of getting out of service. In such a case there could be but little evidence before the court-martial on the part of Besler. The surgeon's opinion was accepted. The sentence of the court-martial was that Besler be dishonorably discharged and drummed out of the service with loss of all pay.

After the sentence and before its execution comrades in his regiment, believing him wronged, contributed some $60, offered to get him citizen's clothing and a pass that he might leave and escape the indignity of the execution of the sentence. He replied that he would remain and suffer the sentence; that they might falsely charge that he had played off, but should never truthfully say he deserted. Urged to take the money after being drummed out and to see what he could do to get righted in Washington, he did so, remaining some days in Washington. He secured an interview with Secretary Stanton, who rescinded the order stopping the pay and suggested that Besler have some one take hold to set the matter right; that he (Stanton) had no time to investigate it. Not knowing how to proceed further in the matter, Besler returned to New Haven. He continued to be lame and suffer in health as in the Army; has never been able to resume his old occupation as carriage maker, although has tried for a few days at a time, only to find that he was not able. He has occupied himself more or less in light occupations, securing a fair living, remains a good citizen of good habits, has the respect and sympathy of his old comrades in the company and regiment, many of them living in New Haven, men who worked with him before the war, when he was able and well, and who contrast his condition since his discharge, a clear and convincing object lesson that doctors do make mistakes.

My home is in St. Louis. I have not seen Besler for nearly thirty years until about ten days ago. I then went to New Haven with the purpose of seeing him and investigating. I made it my duty to see of his old comrades, members of M company, men in good positions who were as members of Company M, and now reliable men. Not one did I find that was not strongly in sympathy with Besler and the belief that he had been greatly wronged by the court-martial. I could not learn there was a member of the regiment living in New Haven that did not believe this. The record of the First Connecticut Heavy Artillery, the first three years' regiment (then the fourth volunteer company) mustered in the war, is not such as to credit the belief that any considerable number could have been found then or now of its members who would give aid or sympathy to cowards or shirks.

The investigation confirms most fully my conviction that this man has been greatly wronged. That in addition to suffering in health from harsh treatment and disgraceful humiliation in his regiment and before his comrades in the field, he has ever since and still stands before the world, before his comrades, before his children, with the record of a shameful and disgraceful discharge as his war record. To in part undo this wrong, the record can not be changed too quickly. Justice to Besler demands this if he has been wronged, and certainly our Government can not wish to continue a wrong committed by mistake. That this has not been before brought to the attention of proper authorities is by reason of Besler's not knowing how to proceed. If I can be of any further assistance in this matter, you will oblige me by giving me the opportunity.

Very respectfully, F. A. PRATT,
Late Captain M Company, First Connecticut Heavy Artillery.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington:

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 17th day of February, 1896.
[SEAL.] JOHN H. ROGERS,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON, February 17, 1896.

I have known Captain Pratt for many years as a gentleman of excellent character and fine military record.

J. R. HAWLEY.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TALBERT. I understood the gentleman to state that the bill had been considered at a Friday night session?

Mr. SPERRY. No; I said that it had not been.

Mr. HULL. It would not come under the provision of the rule for Friday night sessions. It is not a desertion case and could not be considered at a Friday night session.

Mr. TALBERT. My idea was that this is one of those cases that could come up under the rule at the Friday night sessions.

Mr. HULL. Not at all. This is a court-martial case, and the Friday evening session would have no jurisdiction over it.

Mr. TALBERT. Well, that is a distinction without a difference. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPERRY. I hope the gentleman will not object. Let me suggest to him that this has been unanimously reported from the committee.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina having withdrawn his objection to the bill for which I asked consideration, I move that the bill be put on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina. Has the gentleman withdrawn his objection?

Mr. TALBERT. I have.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. SPERRY. I call for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again read the report.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. BARTLETT of New York said: Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied.

The SPEAKER. Objection is withdrawn. Is there further objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Joint resolution (S. R. 131) relative to the improvement of the harbor of Erie, Pa.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

ARMINDA STUCKER.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, H. R. 5853, granting a pension to Arminda Stucker, of Gallatin, Mo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Arminda Stucker, widow of John H. Stucker, late a soldier in Company B, Grundy County Battalion Missouri State Militia.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

Add after the word "Militia," at the end of the bill, the words "at the rate of $12 per month."

The report (by Mr. CROWTHER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5853) granting a pension to Arminda Stucker, widow of John H. Stucker, late sergeant Company B, Grundy County Battalion Missouri State Militia, having carefully examined and considered all the facts and circumstances presented, respectfully report as follows:

John H. Stucker enlisted September 21, 1861, and served as sergeant in Company B, Grundy County Battalion Missouri State Militia, until April 23, 1864. In October, 1862, he was sent with others to Alpha, Mo., to disarm some rebel bushwhackers who were rendezvoused in that locality, and who resisted the disarming, and he received a gunshot wound entirely disabling the left hand and arm.

He filed a claim for pension on account of this injury July 19, 1875, which was rejected on the ground that the soldier was not in the United States service.

This battalion was one of the organizations of Missouri militia called into service by Governor Gamble, and the Auditor of the War Department certifies that the soldier enlisted September 21, 1861, and continued in service until March 18, 1862. Soldier claimed, and supported it by good testimony, that the Grundy County Battalion continued in service until April 23, 1864, as Company B, Eighteenth Missouri State Militia.

Soldier was pensioned February 22, 1887, at $30 per month, by special act of Congress, for gunshot wound of left hand and resulting total disability therefrom, under certificate No. 355927.

Soldier died August 10, 1894, from paralysis of left side, complicated with kidney disease or uræmic poisoning. Dr. D. F. Hanna, a reputable and skilled physician, testified that he treated the soldier some three months before his death for above-named complaints, and says:

"In my opinion the gunshot wound was the indirect cause of death."

Widow was married to soldier January 7, 1864, neither having been previously married, and lived with him until death and cared for him, and has remained his widow, and is now in needy circumstances. Her claim for pension was rejected on the ground that War Department records failed to show soldier to have been in the United States service.

Your committee append the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions
